§ Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada. By Clarence King. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

* Draft Outlines of an International Code. By David Dudley Field. New York: Diney & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

† Second Report of the Commissioners to Review the Laws for the Assessment and Collection of Taxes in the State of New York; with a Code of Laws relative to Assessment and Taxation. David A. Wells, Edwin Dodge, George W. Caylor, Commissioners. Albany: The Argus Company. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

outdoor life, with a sufficiency of peril and hardship to give it interest, with true manly heartiness, and his style, if now and then a little lax and flippant, is unaffected and intelligible in comparison with that of the generality of American narratives of Western exploration and adventure.

Bits of Travel*, by H. H., were picked up chiefly in Germany, the Alps, and Northern Italy. The style is rattling and lively, and the letters really resemble those that a clever vivacious woman might write if she had no one to talk to, and were consequently compelled to vent herself on paper.

Brigham's Destroying Angel† is the title given by Mr. Beadle, and perhaps by others, to one Bill Hickman, a Mormon who by his own account was concerned in the death of a considerable number of persons obnoxious to the Government of the Saints; and the volume before us professes to be his autobiography. It is clearly not written by Hickman, but may have been, as it professes, mainly taken down from his lips. It is rambling and incoherent, and certainly does not give the impression of perfect sincerity; but it is probable that in many cases the services of Hickman were employed in carrying out the rude justice common in the West in a manner modified by the despotic constitution of the Saints. Lynch law under republican forms would not shock Mr. Beadle; Lynch law administered by a despot, though that despot's power rests entirely on the suffrages of his people, takes so different an aspect that he can see no resemblance between the two. If the story be true, the Mormon Government must have sanctioned several wanton murders. But it must be remembered that Mr. Beadle writes as a bitter enemy of the Mormons, and that Hickman has never been confronted with any of those whom he accuses.

We have on our list two school-books of some merit—a Kindergarten‡ manual in English and German, from which many teachers of young children might gather very useful hints, and a First Book of Botany§, which describes the principal parts of a plant and their most familiar forms, and illustrates each of its definitions by outline sketches in a manner which cannot fail to render them for the most part clearly intelligible to an attentive and reasonably clever child. It is intended to be used with actual object lessons, real plants being substituted ultimately for the sketches used in the first instance.

Dead Men's Shoes|| is a "romance" of domestic life, of which the scene is laid in the South, and matrimonial squabbles, provoked by a violent assertion of woman's right—but for fear of the authoress we should call it insolent—form a conspicuous feature.

Awful¶ is a little satire on the misuse of a very grave and significant word by young America, male and female; the remaining pieces in the book are decidedly inferior, and sometimes sink to the level of nursery doggerel.

* Bits of Travel. By H. H. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

† Brigham's Destroying Angel; being the Life, Confession, and Startling Disclosures of the Notorious Bill Hickman, the Danite Chief of Utah. Written by Himself. With Explanatory Notes by J. H. Beadle, Esq., of Salt Lake City. Illustrated. New York: Croft. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

‡ The Kindergarten. A Manual for the introduction of Froebel's System of Primary Education into Public Schools, and for the use of Mothers and Private Teachers. By Dr. Adolf Dorn. Second Edition. New York: E. Steiger. London: Trübner & Co. 1871.

§ The First Book of Botany. Designed to cultivate the Observing Powers of Children. By Eliza A. Youmans. New York: Appleton & Co. London: Trübner & Co., and Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

|| Dead Men's Shoes. A Romance. By Jeanette R. Edermann, Author of "Forgiven at Last." Philadelphia: Lippincott & Co. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

¶ "Awful," and other Jingles. By P. R. S. New York: Putnam & Co. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsagent, on the day of publication.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Communications relating to Advertisements should likewise be addressed.

Now ready, VOLUME XXXII., bound in cloth, price 10s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also, Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 801, APRIL 27, 1872:

The Alabama Controversy. The Government and Mr. Fawcett.
Germany and France. Protestant Alarms and Catholic Grievances.
The Re-opening of the French Assembly.
Mr. Canclès's Motion. Cuban Negroes and Roumanian Jews.
Ballot and Handouts.

English Loyalty. Sweet Anxiety.
The Pope and the French Catholics. The Times on Switzerland.
Revolt in the Kitchen. The British West Indies. Railway Reform.
The Water Colour Exhibitions. The Italian Opera.
Newmarket Craven Meeting.

Sir George Jackson's Diaries.
Mr. and Mrs. Fawcett's Essays. Governor's Indian Folk-Songs.
Blair's Key to Church History. A Cast of the Dice.
Cook's Hand-book of British Fungi. The Rajah of Koolipoor.
Without Kith or Kin. American Literature.

CONTENTS OF No. 860, APRIL 20, 1872:

The Position of the Government—The Geneva Arbitration—The Battle of the Ballos Hill—Spain—The Appellate Jurisdiction Bill—The International Society—France—Sir Massey Lopes's Resolution—The Liquor Trade.

Candour—M. Rénier and the French Stage—The Voluntary Choir—The Savings of the People—Modern Prophecies—The Martyred Horry—History Made to Order—Some Economical Aspects of the Labourers' strike—Legal Infants—The Theatre.

Gutzot's History of France—Bain's First English Grammar—Memoir of Joshua Farrer—Erewhon—Father Gerard—A Man's Thoughts—Cranston's Tibullus—A retrospect of the Autumn Manœuvres—Two Minor Novels—German Literature.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LONDON INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, 1872.—SEASON TICKETS now on Sale at the Albert Hall Ticket Office, and at the usual Agents. For a Gentleman, 12s. For a Lady, 7s. For a Youth under fifteen years, 5s.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of ART and INDUSTRY, 1872, at Kensington will be OPENED to the Public on Wednesday, May 1, 1872. The Prices of Season Tickets will be: For a Gentleman, 12s.; for a Lady, 7s.; for a Youth under fifteen years of age, 5s.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—On Saturday, April 27, an EVENING RECEPTION will be held by H.R.H. the DUKE of EDINBURGH, K.G., in the Royal Albert Hall and Picture Galleries.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—The Owners of SEASON TICKETS will be entitled to ADMISSION to the Exhibition on ALL OCCASIONS when open to the public.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—Only SEASON TICKET HOLDERS will be admitted to the PRIVATE VIEW on Monday, April 29.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—Only SEASON TICKET HOLDERS will be admitted to the PRIVATE VIEW on Tuesday, April 30.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872 will be OPENED to the public on Wednesday, May 1. Admission, 10s.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—On Wednesday, 1st, and Thursday, 2nd May, the ADMISSION will be free each day.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—On Friday, May 3, the ADMISSION will be 5s.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—On Saturday, May 4, the ADMISSION will be 5s.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—From May 6 to September 30 the PRICES of ADMISSION to the LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872 will be: On Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, 1s.; on Wednesdays, 2s. 6d.; except on certain reserved days, which will be duly advertised.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Under the Patronage of HER MAJESTY the QUEEN, and with the sanction of their Royal Highnesses the PRINCE and PRINCESS of Wales, the Directors have the honour to announce that a GRAND FESTIVAL in CELEBRATION of the RECOVERY of G.R.H. the PRINCE of WALES will take place on Wednesday, May 1. With a view to give fitting expression to the feelings which have prompted this National Celebration, the Directors have commissioned Mr. AUGUST STUBBS to compose a GRAND TE DEUM for soprano, solo, chorus, and orchestra, to be performed by a force of vocalists numbering 2500 performers. The solos will be given by Madlle. Titiens, Signor Lancelli, and Signor Foli. The second part of the Concert will be of Miscellaneous Music. There will be a great Display of Fountains, with Military Band on the Terrace, and afterwards a Grand Display of Fireworks with devices appropriate to the occasion. The Palace will be open on this occasion at 12 noon. The Te Deum will commence at 4. The price of Admission to the Festival will be 5s. on the day, or 7s. 6d. by Tickets purchased up to Tuesday next. Single Stalls, 5s. and 1s. 6d., at the Ticket Office, Crystal Palace, and of all Agents.

MUSICAL UNION.—SECOND MATINEE, Tuesday, April 30. Rendano, from Naples, Pianist (first time) with Meurici, Wiener, Walsingham, Lascier, and Lazarus. Quartet, D minor, Schubert; Quintet, E flat, Wagner. Schumann; Allegro and Adagio, Clarinet Quintet of Mozart, 12 Songs; Violin Solo, Ballad; Piano Solo, Handel, Chopin, and Mendelssohn. Single Tickets, 10s. 6d.; and Family Tickets (for three) one guinea, at Lamborn Corks, and at St. James's Hall. Members can pay 2s. Visitors at Regent Street entrance; also their Subscription to Mr. Austin, Cashier.

J. ELLA, Director, 9 Victoria Square.

MR. ADOLPHE SCHLOSSER'S EVENING CONCERT, on Wednesday, May 8, at the Hansover Square Rooms, at half-past Eight. Vocalists: Madlle. Carola and Monsieur Valdes. Instrumentalists: MM. Strauss, Wagner, Berlioz, Danbert, W. Macchren, Danreuther, Berenger, and Schlosser, Conductor, Mr. Berlioz. Italian Half-past Eight, at St. James's Hall. Single Tickets, 10s. 6d.; and Family Tickets (for three) one guinea, at Lamborn Corks, and at St. James's Hall. Members can pay 2s. Visitors at Regent Street entrance; also their Subscription to Mr. Austin, Cashier.

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-COLOURS.—The SIXTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION is now OPEN, at 5 Pall Mall East, from Nine till Seven. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

ALFRED D. FRIPP, Secretary.

ELIJAH WALTON'S ENTIRE COLLECTION of OIL and WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS, now ON VIEW, at his GALLERY, 4 Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, Westminster. Admission, 1s. Open Daily from Ten till Five.

DORE GALLERY.—GUSTAVE DORE, 35 New Bond Street. EXHIBITION of PICTURES (including CHRISTIAN MEYER'S "MONASTERY TRIUMPH OF CHRISTIANITY," "FRANCISCA DE ALMEIDA," &c.) 2s. to 6s. Admission, 1s.

UNDERGROUND JERUSALEM.—An EXHIBITION of WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS by WILLIAM SIMPSON, illustrating the Recent Excavations, Pall Mall Gallery, 4 Pall Mall (Mr. Thompson's). 2s. to 6s. Admission, including Descriptive Catalogue, 1s.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 862, Vol. 33.

May 4, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE AMERICAN COMPROMISE.

IT has been known for some days that negotiations are proceeding for the purpose of rendering the arbitration at Geneva practicable; and Lord GRANVILLE and Mr. GLADSTONE have stated that, although the last American despatch is unsatisfactory, there is still a prospect of an amicable solution. It was in the power of the American Government at any time to escape from the consequences of its own error, by withdrawing the objectionable part of the original Case. The consent of the Senate was not required to a proceeding which would have been undeniably consistent with the terms of the ratified Treaty. The PRESIDENT might at his pleasure, without further reference to the Senate, have originally confined the claims to the losses caused by the depredations of any one of the Confederate cruisers; and even those who strain the words of the Treaty to include the so-called indirect claims, contend, not that the American Government was bound to prefer them, but that it was entitled to submit them to the Arbitrators. The simple correction of a mistake which is now universally admitted would have been far more dignified than any circuitous evasion of the difficulty which has arisen. It would not have been necessary even to confess that the indirect claims were improperly included in the Case. The American counsel might have been instructed to state that for sufficient reasons they intended to confine themselves to the direct claims, and that they asked for no award on the other demands advanced in the original Case. The same object might have been still more satisfactorily attained by a diplomatic communication to the English Government pledging the United States to abstain from pressing the disputed claims. If, nevertheless, the American Government prefers some more complicated method of settlement, it is desirable to facilitate, as far as propriety and security allow, a virtual retreat from a false position; but the utmost caution will be required in settling the terms of any diplomatic arrangement, and it is absolutely necessary to take care that no fresh concession is extorted as the price of a simple act of justice. It would be satisfactory to learn that a newspaper Correspondent who attributed the initiative to Sir EDWARD THORNTON was utterly mistaken. The English cause has already been sufficiently damaged by excessive eagerness for a termination of the controversy. The harsh terms of the Treaty, and the refusal to recognize the Fenian claims, which has been justly resented by the Canadians, may be largely attributed to the profuse liberality of the English Commissioners. The general satisfaction which was expressed in England at the supposed termination of the long-standing quarrel evidently tempted Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS and his employers to try the national patience somewhat further by the offensive vituperation of the Case, and by the monstrous demand for some hundreds of millions sterling. It was not until the general indignation expressed itself in a firm resolution to withdraw from the arbitration, that the Americans began to suspect that their astute agents had at last overreached themselves. It is not the business of an English Minister to check a tardy resipiscence by once more betraying anxiety for the maintenance of a Treaty which has only been endangered by the grasping proceedings of the adverse litigant. It will probably be found that the overture for fresh negotiations proceeded from the American Government.

The tenor of the rumoured proposal for a compromise is not a little surprising. According to several telegraphic statements, the American Government proposes to abstain from insisting on the indirect claims on condition of a formal agreement on the part of England to advance no analogous pretensions in the contingency of a war in which the United States would be neutral. It would be as reasonable to give a formal undertaking that in any future war prisoners should not be mutilated or sold as slaves. It is quite as likely that an English Government would slit the noses of American captives as that it would ask a neutral who had allowed a cruiser to escape from his ports to pay the cost of two or three years of a war with which he had no concern. Before Mr. SUMNER made his famous speech there was no reason to suppose that any human being could have held England responsible for the alleged prolongation of the civil war; and even Mr. SUMNER founded his claim for damages rather on the recognition of Confederate belligerency than on the escape of the Alabama. A formal disavowal of a ridiculous doctrine would almost amount to a confession that it had at some time been directly or indirectly countenanced. There is a still graver objection to the suggested undertaking in its tendency to confuse the character and meaning of the recent English protest. The nation has resolved that there shall be no arbitration on the consequential damages, not because they are absurdly unjust, but on the definite and single ground that they are not covered by the letter or the spirit of the Treaty. A condemnation of the principle of indirect claims would involve the acceptance of a new and irrelevant issue. It is also important to remember that the distinction between direct and indirect claims is wholly vague and popular. The American negotiators have already, with characteristic adroitness, entangled the English Government in an admission that the claim for the cost of American ships of war is included in the terms of the Treaty. The assumption was allowed to pass in the discussion which is recorded in the Protocol of the 10th of May; and the English Government has honourably determined to submit to the results of its own timidity or negligence; yet the claims for the expenses of the American navy are as indirect as the demand for the costs of the war, though they may be less remote and less preposterous. It is impossible to foresee the violations of neutrality which may hereafter furnish belligerents with causes of complaint, or to anticipate the more or less direct nature of the damages which may be claimed by an injured party. There can be no doubt that a litigious neutral would take advantage of the supposed declaration to contend that none of the consequences of her acts were sufficiently direct to involve her responsibility. There is no more fruitful source of error than the use in legal documents of phrases which have no definite or legal meaning. Recent experience shows the strong probability of misunderstandings when any contract with the United States involves a possible ambiguity. It is evident that the two communities attach different meanings, not only to words, but to silence which may have been supposed to imply a tacit understanding.

It will also be the duty of the English Minister to watch with scrupulous vigilance the possible bearing of any diplomatic agreement on the arbitration which it is intended to facilitate. The ingenious lawyer who quoted, as English admissions of guilt, the impassioned advocacy of the Federal cause by Mr. COBBEN and Mr. BRIGHT, would not be restrained by superfluous delicacy from twisting an agreed abandonment of the consequential damages into an admission that the remaining claims were well founded. In the telegraphic version the reported compromise consists of a declaration that indirect damages are not to be incurred in respect of vessels escaping from neutral ports under circumstances similar to those which related to the Alabama. It would seem to follow that direct damages were incurred, although the English Case disputes the liability for any compensation. It is scarcely probable that either English or American Correspondents have ascertained the exact words of the proviso which they communicate, although there is no reason to doubt the substantial accuracy of their information. It is possible that they may have been entirely misinformed; but on the whole it may be conjectured that the American Government is disposed to give way, if it can obtain an ostensible price for the concession. It is not altogether reasonable that England should be forced to buy exemption from injury; but if the sacrifice is merely nominal and verbal, it will be prudent as well as generous to yield. Any surrender of the points for which the nation has during several months been contending would be universally and justly condemned. It is still difficult to understand why, if a compromise was to be effected, Mr. Fish refused, in his despatch to General SCHUCK, all modification of the American Case. If arbitration is still in any way practicable, it is better that the Treaty should at the last moment be rescued from extinction. There were those who feared that it partook of the nature of an abject submission; but the apology and the approval of the new rules of international law cannot now be recalled. If English pride has been humiliated, it is better to secure the consideration for which excessive concessions were made. It was a matter of course that Lord Russell should postpone his motion in the House of Lords; nor will either House of Parliament embarrass negotiation by premature interference. The Ministers ought not to complain that they will hereafter be required to render a strict account of their negotiations. They can scarcely be so weak as to conclude, in conformity with the recommendation of one of their advisers, any Treaty which will be binding on England while on the American side it will require the ratification of the Senate. There is in truth no need of any new Convention, inasmuch as the American Executive has absolute and ultimate control of its own proceedings in the litigation. Another reported proposal needs only to be mentioned that it may be summarily condemned. A mere undertaking on the American side not to claim money compensation for the pretended prolongation of the war would be a recognition of the American version of the Treaty. The possible award by the Arbitrators of a gross sum might be attributed in part to the indirect claims if they are in any way included in the reference. The solution of the problem is not impracticable, but it will require the exercise both of wisdom and firmness.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

THE ladies have had their outing this week, but not with any great success. Their claims do not meet with increasing sympathy in the House of Commons. Two years ago the Bill for removing their electoral disabilities actually got through a second reading; last year more than a hundred and fifty members espoused their cause; but this year the number of their supporters has fallen off, and the number of their enemies has increased. The saddest stroke perhaps for enthusiasts in the cause was that member after member got up and said that, whereas on previous occasions he had supported the Bill, he must now oppose it; and the reason for this change of opinion was the disheartening one that the speakers conceived themselves to have meanwhile ascertained that women generally did not wish to have the franchise. Mr. OSBOURNE MORGAN declared that in four years he had only met two women who wished to have a vote, or who would vote if they were allowed. The Attorney-General for IRELAND seems to have been converted into an opponent of the Bill by a lady to whom he devoted in a former year that he had been spending the afternoon in helping to enfranchise her sex, and who replied that he might have been better employed. Mr. EASTWICK, who seconded the motion for the second reading, and who in doing so made an almost exhaustive speech against the principle of the measure, owned that women in some portions of the United States who might have the franchise if they liked were either profoundly indifferent to it or positively refused to have it. This was the most fatal argument against the Bill. If the ladies do not really wish to vote, why on earth should men, who would be most seriously inconvenienced by their voting, make them have votes? No one can prove that women do or do not wish to have votes, but the balance of probability against their really wishing it seems very great. The only women who ever dream of even asking themselves whether they would like to have votes are, we may safely answer, among the classes who, speaking according to a humble standard, may be called educated. The bulk of such women have at any rate very strong inducements not to wish for the suffrage, and very slight inducements to make them wish for it. They of course feel the objections more or less strongly which are grounded on religion, custom and habit, and on the current theories of what women can do and ought to do. But we may put these aside for the moment, and attend only to minor considerations, which are sure to weigh with women powerfully, and which account for a great part of that dislike of, or indifference to, the proposed change which so long as it lasts makes the Bill an absurdity. In the first place, most men dislike the Bill, and most women want to please men. This may not seem a very high motive, but it is a very operative one. In the next place, if women had to take an active part in politics, the case of conversation and the pleasure of social intercourse would be greatly diminished. Politics are real business, and if they are to be discussed, they must be discussed on the basis of being real business; but the whole charm of the social intercourse of the sexes would be at an end if politics were talked of between them in a business-like way. Far stronger, however, than all other arguments of this minor kind with most sensible and respectable women must be the connexion, whether accidental or otherwise, between the women who say they want votes and the women who have heralded their political enfranchisement by making themselves publicly prominent in the discussion of the loathsome subject of the Contagious Diseases Acts. If a lady can, by disclaiming any wish to have a vote, tacitly mark herself off from these immodest disputants, she may very naturally wish to do so. These are not very grand or high-sounding reasons for a desire to keep aloof from the franchise; and most women have better ones; but they are reasons which have practically a great amount of effect; and the important point is that women do not want to have votes, and that therefore it is ridiculous to think of giving them votes, whatever may be the reasons by which, consciously or unconsciously, they are led to this conclusion.

The friends of the ladies, however, do not rest their cause on matters with which women who are in comfortable easy circles have much to do; and it is to the philanthropical and benevolent instincts of the sex that they make appeal. They say that women are wronged, and that the only way of getting their wrongs redressed is to give them votes. Mr. JACOB BRIGHT, who is their spokesman, has an exceedingly poor opinion of the House of Commons, and he declares that the only way to get the House to pay any attention to any subject of public interest is to force it to do so. Women have no votes, and are trampled on; if they had votes, members would have to take notice of the wishes and grievances of a large number of energetic constituents, and must bring in, support, and carry Bills in the interest of women. Once more the invaluable Mr. EASTWICK comes to our aid. He has had to form some sort of plausible theory to account for the acknowledged indifference of American women to the franchise, and one solution that much commends itself to him is that in America women have got all they want without having the franchise. This is very consoling. For if the Americans, without giving women votes, have accorded to the sex all that it can fairly ask, we may hope to do the same. The three great wrongs of women, we understand, are that they do not when married retain a separate control over their property, that men who beat women are not punished with sufficient severity, and that, in that terrible matter on which emancipated women love to dwell, the sexes are not treated with equal delicacy. On this last point we do not care to dwell. It is one of those subjects which it is impossible to argue out honestly and fairly so long as there is a probability of modest, innocent women reading what is written or hearing what is said. But a House of Commons must be a very poor and misguided assembly if it cannot deal with such simple subjects as the property of married women and the proper punishment of men who strike women. It so happens that in this Session two Bills have been brought in designed to remedy the grievances under which on those heads women are supposed to be suffering; but Mr. JACOB BRIGHT discountsenances these insidious and base attempts to show that men can do, and are now willing to do, all that women would, as it is alleged, force men to do if women might vote at Parliamentary elections. He does not like his pet case being taken out of his hands. But the House of Commons naturally and justly does not approve of this way of treating it. Parliament would, it is honestly felt, pass any conceivable Bill for the protection of the persons and property of women if those who advocated the Bill would but say what it is precisely that they desire, and could prove by fair argument that the balance of advantage would be found in their having their way. What the friends of the ladies really dislike is that, when proposals on behalf of women are made in the House of Commons, they are tested by the standard of experience and good sense, and that the difficulties of real life are allowed to stand in the way of enthusiasm and sentiment. Mr. BRIGHT, if he has anything on these heads to suggest, means that the property of married women not settled on them should not be liable to the debts of their husbands, and that men who beat or ill-use women should be severely punished. There is much to be said in favour of these propositions, and a little more than Mr. BRIGHT would allow against them. Still it might perhaps be easy to show that the property of married women might be made more secure, and that men who beat women should be more severely punished than they are now. We will suppose that this could be shown after free and fair discussion to the satisfaction of reasonable men and women. But it is a most extraordinary assumption to declare that what could thus be demonstrated would never be accepted by the House of Commons, and that in order to get such simple and tiny changes in the law carried out, it is necessary to alter the whole constitutional system of England. This is like vowing that the only way to taste roast pig is to imitate LAMB'S CHAMPAIGN, and burn the house about the porker's ears.

The Bill introduced by Mr. JACOB BRIGHT was to all appearance a harmless little Bill. It only proposed to enable women who can vote at municipal elections to vote also at Parliamentary elections. The number of women, according to the supporters of the Bill, who would vote under it, was totally insignificant—so small, indeed, that it was difficult to see how they could do much to alter the law as regards the property of married women, or the punishment of brutal men who strike the women dependent on them. But it was allowed on all hands that this was only the thin edge of the wedge, and that, if this tiny fraction of the female population was to be allowed to vote, the whole body would gain their rights sooner or later. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, for example, spoke with the greatest admiration of Queens ELIZABETH and ANNE, and asked how it was possible to contend that women who had made such excellent Sovereigns should be regarded as unworthy to vote for members of Parliament. If Queen ELIZABETH was a warrior, Queen ANNE was a wife and the mother of a large family, and as they were both such excellent Sovereigns, one had as much claim to vote as the other. Then, again, if the true theory is that those who have special wants and grievances should have a direct influence on the House of Commons by contributing to return members, it is the married women, and not the old maids, who stand most in need of that instrument of political correction. It is the property of married women that is stated to be in danger, and it is not old maids who are liable to black eyes and bruised cheeks at the hands of cruel men. Married women might, by a bold action, be supposed to be likely to be too much under the influence of their husbands; but then it was replied that we are going to have the Ballot, and under the Ballot women cannot be under the influence of their husbands; for, although they might promise to vote as their husbands wished, their husbands would never be sure that their wives would not secretly vote contrary to their promises, and this is the way in which all intimidation is to be prevented. If women are to rule at all, married women must certainly be allowed to vote as well as the less fortunate of their sex. But then this leads us into a difficulty, for exposing the full force of which we have again to thank Mr. EASTWICK. The American women do not care to vote, he said, and one main reason of this is, that there are so many voters in an American election that it is no pleasure or pride to be one among many thousands unnecessarily added to the electoral body. There is much force in this. Our electoral body is not very large in proportion to the whole population, and yet it contains many voters who do not care whether they vote or not, and who feel no very strong impulse or obligation to vote one way rather than another. If the number of voters were doubled, as it must be if women, married or unmarried, were allowed to vote, the indisposition to vote, which may not improbably be increased largely by the introduction of the Ballot, would assume very serious proportions. If women voted freely, not only would the enlargement of constituencies diminish greatly the indifference among men to the franchise, but the very fact that women exercised a preponderance in elections would make men despise the whole system of electoral representation. There would not, as has been very well pointed out in the Poll-Moll Gazette, be any real strength or physical preponderance in the majority that decided elections. Strong, turbulent, passionate men would revolt against the notion of the whole issue of the country being concentrated in the hands of those who had no strength to support their decisions. It would be as if the English in India were outvoted by the Bengalees; and such a state of things is one in which orderly government is impossible. The first condition of true representative government is that the electors should feel confident that the strength of the country is with them, and that the representative body elected is as good a one as the country can furnish. Men outvoted by women could never believe either the one thing or the other, and it is therefore scarcely too much to say that to give the franchise to women would be not only to upset the basis of our present social system, but also to plunge the country in anarchy and confusion.

THE CARLIST INSURRECTION.

THE Carlist insurrection in Spain can only be alarming on the ground that an apparently hopeless enterprise may perhaps imply the existence of some unknown prospect of success. Whatever may have been the case during the civil war of thirty years ago, it is certain that the Carlists have little popularity or influence beyond the limits of the Northern provinces. Even the clergy are divided between the claims of the male heir of the crown of the BOURBONS and the son of the QUEEN, who was at all times equally ready to postpone her duty to the interests of the Church and to her own questionable pleasures. For many years before the Revolution of September the Carlists were unable to profit by the numerous mutinies and insurrections which from time to time disturbed public tranquillity. It was not until the chiefs of the army and navy, as well as the principal political leaders, had been alienated from the dynasty that it became possible to dethrone ISABELLA II.; and among the managers of the movement not one professed the obsolete Legitimist faith. The father of the present claimant had paragonically abdicated for himself and his descendants the pretensions which are now advanced by the titular Duke of MADRID. It is true that, according to the strict principles of legitimate royalty, an abdication is invalid against the rightful heir; but the timidity of Don JUAN is not likely to have increased the popular devotion to his family. If it is true that DON CARLOS has remained up to this time in safety at Geneva, it would seem that he inherits the temperament as well as the rights of his family. CHARLES IV. and FERDINAND VII. had no more distinguished qualities than a ready appreciation of personal danger. The affected deference of Carlist officers to the commands of their "august master" will scarcely produce a strong effect on the modern imagination. The grandson of an unsuccessful Pretender must render himself formidable to the reigning dynasty before he will be heartily accepted as a king even by his most zealous partisans. CHARLES VII. of Spain and HENRY V. of France are perhaps the only remaining believers in absolute monarchy. Both of them claim rights anterior to the national will, and superior to representative institutions. The Duke of MADRID, indeed, "graciously deigned" to permit the electors and candidates of his party to take their chance of success at the poll; but since they have been defeated, he not only appeals to force, but protests against the entire system of election. Soon after the French Revolution the prince who assumed the title of Louis XVIII. was equally obstinate in his refusal to recognize the changes which had taken place in France; but longer experience taught him that it was hopeless, even after the fall of NAPOLEON, to restore the despotic government of his ancestors. The BOURBON exiles of both countries are less advanced than their ancestors, for even FERDINAND VII. invoked the aid of the Cortes to transfer the succession of the throne to his daughter. The Spaniards have perhaps but an imperfect appreciation of the true spirit of constitutional government; but after many years of nominal liberty they are not likely to submit to an absolute monarch. AMABLE, ALCOSO, and the Duke of MONTPESSIER all agree in professing devotion to a Parliamentary system; and the Republicans can scarcely be prepared to substitute for the present King an august master who has an indefeasible right to the loyalty of his subjects.

The details of the Carlist rebellion which have hitherto been published confirm the belief in its insignificance, though it is not necessary to place implicit reliance on the official account. When it is reported that a few scores of villagers have followed their parish priest into the mountains, it might almost be supposed that they were about to wage war with bows and arrows. The Spanish troops may perhaps be inferior in discipline and efficiency to some of the Continental armies; but a regular trained and armed in the modern fashion could have no difficulty in scattering an indefinite number of peasants acting under clerical command. Guerrillas are utterly incapable of offering serious resistance to regular troops; but the Government is probably well advised in despatching a considerable force to the North under a commander of high rank. SERRANO is advanced in life, and it is not known that he at any time displayed conspicuous ability as a soldier; but he may be trusted not to desert the flag for which he is fighting; and he has probably officers under his command who are capable of occupying the insurgent provinces with flying columns, and of compelling the dissolution of armed bands of rebels. It is not the custom in Spain to manage civil war with excessive regard to the lives or property of insurgents; and the King in his speech to the Cortes announced that his Government would not be wanting in the exercise of necessary severity. It is asserted that orders have been given to shoot the Pretender by the sentence of a court-martial if he should chance to become a prisoner; but his friends have good reason to hope that he will be as unwilling as his predecessors to expose himself to unnecessary danger. The Carlist party has never yet been able to detach any part of the army from its fidelity, and the Government will have taken care not to send to the North any troops which might be suspected of disloyalty. It is remarkable that the only officers who are known to have joined in the insurrection were supposed to be adherents of Queen ISABELLA, but there is no reason to suspect a fusion which would be fatal to the prospects of Don ALFONSO. The strange statement that the Republicans have promised to favour the Carlist movement may probably be explained by the unprincipled coalition, during the late election, of all the factions which are hostile to the dynasty; but there is a wide difference between a perverse electoral combination and an armed alliance of two irreconcilable enemies. It is of course possible that the revolutionists in some of the great towns may seek to profit by the absence of the army, but it is incredible that the democrats should concert their measures with the supporters of absolute monarchy. The strength of the Duke of MADRID consists, if it has any existence, in the support given him by a section of the clergy; and the Republicans are the deadly enemies of the priests. The International Society, which has lately succeeded in frightening the Spanish Government, will certainly not employ its organization in promoting the accession of an august master.

It is not impossible that the rash attempt of the legitimate Pretender may tend to confirm the unsteady throne of the obnoxious foreigner. The troops which are employed in chastising the rebels will have learned the habit of fighting for the reigning Sovereign; and the respectable portion of the community will resent the wanton disturbance of internal peace. It is said that some of the principal leaders of the Opposition have assured the King of their support against the insurgents; nor is a coalition impossible, especially as the rival factions and their leaders are divided from one another by no intelligible point of political difference. The French Government may be expected to discharge with readiness and zeal the obligations of neutrality. M. THIERS can have no sympathy with a Pretender whose success would encourage the numerous French partisans of the Count of CHAMORD. A Republican rising or a civil war in the interest of the Duke of MONTPEISIER or of the son of Queen ISABELLA might be thought to have a better claim to French connivance. From every point of view the rebellion appears to be hopeless, yet the possibility of such a movement affords a striking illustration of the pernicious effects of revolution. The Carlists, though they are perhaps the weakest party in Spain, returned to the Cortes thirty-five members, who are now forbidden by their august master to take their seats. Although some of the successful candidates may have owed their seats to Republican support, it is evident that in some parts of the country a considerable minority is still opposed to all the changes and new Constitutions of two generations. Several other factions are equally unwilling to acknowledge the title of the King; though there is no reason to suppose that any of his competitors would have been allowed to occupy the throne with less opposition. The most indispensable condition of freedom and of good government is the willing obedience which is never universally paid to newly established dignities and institutions. The good fortune of Spain, or the sagacity of PRINCE ALFONSO, appears to have raised to the head of the State a Prince of unusual integrity, and of much spirit and ability; yet he can appeal to no general sentiment of loyalty when he is threatened by domestic enemies. It would perhaps be a popular act, in spite of constitutional doctrines borrowed from England, if the young King were to show himself at the head of his army, which would be flattered by his presence. He might justify an active participation in the petty campaign which is about to commence by the experience which he has already acquired in the field against more formidable adversaries. On the other hand, it is possible that his presence may be required at Madrid to regulate the incessant conflict for power of SAGASTA or ZORRILLA, and of their respective followers. The Cortes are chiefly engaged with personal and party struggles which require the control of an impartial moderator. It might also not be prudent to offend SERRANO, who has at present a prospect of acquiring glory on easy terms.

THE BALLOT BILL.

THE Ballot Bill has passed through Committee, and the work of the Commons in regard to it has nearly come to an end. What its fate may be in the Lords no one can pretend to say. The objects of the Bill are to make elections quiet and orderly, to prevent intimidation, and to prevent bribery. The first is undeniably a good object. English elections are too often carried on in a manner disgraceful to the community. They are accompanied by scenes of mob violence, brutal drunkenness, and general anarchy, which are revolting and humiliating to every one who would wish to see members of the first free assembly in the world elected in a fitting manner. A few good old lovers of antiquity may regret the turmoil, the wild nonsense, and the costly sham of nomination days; but by far the majority of quiet sensible men of all parties would like to see elections carried on with decorum and despatch. There is nothing, however, to show that a Ballot Bill is necessary to make elections orderly. The present Bill will, it may be expected, have this effect, and so far it is worth having; but if the same result, or if a result nearly the same, could have been approached in another way, the arguments against secret voting are not met by the allegation that quiet and order at elections will be secured, or at least very largely promoted, by the measure of the Government. If the Bill would really put a stop to bribery and intimidation, it would be worth having at the cost of almost any inconvenience and annoyance. But no Ballot Bill can possibly put down bribery. In large constituencies there is at present scarcely any bribery, and in small constituencies bribery will be just as easy as ever, and far safer. It will be impossible to detect it after it has taken place, and although the candidate will not pay beforehand for a vote which he is not sure of receiving, yet he may be even much more willing to pay afterwards than he is now, because he will only have to pay if he is elected. The agent will not have to find money, for he also will only pay for results, and will not spend a farthing until his principal has been returned, and has cashed up. Any attorney in a corrupt little borough will be able to start any rich man he pleases. Every attorney in the place will have his pocket merchant prince; then the different attorneys will begin to sound each other, and if one reveals that his merchant prince is good for 3,000*l.*, and another reveals that his patron is good for 1,000*l.* more, nothing will be more natural than that they should agree to throw the first CÆSUS over and divide the plunder of the second. The inevitable conclusion is, that under a Ballot Bill small corrupt boroughs must be disfranchised; but as bribery cannot be proved, disappointed candidates will in small boroughs always believe or declare that they were defeated by bribery, and the larger constituencies will resent boroughs presumably corrupt being on an equality with them in representation. Small constituencies will therefore disappear; but as it is chiefly in these constituencies that bribery goes on to any great extent, the prevention of bribery could be accomplished without a Ballot Bill by disfranchising such constituencies. It is a very disputable point whether small constituencies ought to be done away with, and it is one objection to the Ballot Bill that it will do away with them indirectly, and not after a fair and open discussion of the consequences of the change; while, if it is advisable to do away with them, the change could be effected without a Ballot Bill. There remains the prevention of intimidation; and it is, we think, incontestable that a Bill under which voting was perfectly secret would largely diminish intimidation. But the Government Bill, as it now stands, is, on the confession of the Government itself, not a Bill under which the voting will be perfectly secret. Alterations in the Bill have been forced on the Government which have in a great degree changed its character; and it will be open to the Lords to say that, as two of the objects of the Bill could be secured without it, and as it will only very imperfectly fulfil its third object, the matter may be prudently left to stand over, and the opinion of the constituencies may be asked at the next election whether they think it worth while to change so much in order to effect so little.

This week a very important modification of their Bill has been accepted by the Government. The returning officer is to be allowed not only to know how a very large portion of the electors vote, but practically to vote for them. This was a change in their measure against which the Government steadily set their faces for a long time, and the alteration in their views was brought about in a very singular way. When a dissolution takes place there will be, it is known, a very keen competition for the representation of London. At present the Liberals, by the operation of a lucky accident, hold all four seats; but the Conservatives hope to wrest three of these seats from them at the next election. Among the electors are many Jews, and the Jews are, almost to a man, staunch Liberals. But the Jews are forbidden by their religion to work on Saturdays. They might, with the blessing of Heaven, go up to a booth on Saturday and say for whom they wished to vote, but to record their vote in writing would, they believe, be very sinful. What would happen if a cunning Conservative returning officer were to fix Saturday for the next City election? The Liberals would lose the Jew votes. This was so serious a prospect both to the sitting members and the Government, that the senior member for the City proposed, and the Government agreed, that a Jew shall be at liberty to tell the presiding officer at a booth for whom he wishes to vote, and this officer shall be used as a sort of scapegoat, and commit the sin of writing on Saturday for him, so that at once the souls of the Jews and the seats of the Liberals may be made reasonably safe. But directly, at the bidding of the Government, this convenient arrangement had been accepted by the House, it was perceived that a door had been opened to a very wide question. If Jews troubled with religious scruples might use the presiding officer in this pleasant way, why might not ignorant and uneducated Christians use him too? There are scores or hundreds of electors in every constituency who cannot read or write very well, and would like above all things to have the presiding officer or one of his clerks show them what to do, or, still better, fill up the paper for them. If the officer or his clerks, however, may fill up the voting-paper of an elector who is too ignorant to understand how the paper is filled up, the voting is practically handed over to the official who records the vote. The Government did not at all like this, and secured a large majority against it on Monday. But on Thursday Mr. FORSTER, to the great dismay of the ardent supporters of the Ballot below the gangway, capitulated. He has now accepted an amendment that if an elector produces a certificate of his inability to read, the presiding officer shall cause the vote of the elector to be secretly marked on the paper. Mr. FORSTER had said on Monday night that he had no notion how many persons would be able from defective education to fill up a ballot-paper for themselves, and different members undertook on Thursday to enlighten him. Mr. ELLICE stated that in the country districts of the part of Scotland with which he was connected a fourth, or even a third, of the electors would require assistance. Mr. SYNAN informed the House that the county of Cork was a model county in respect of education, but that even in this model county nearly half the male population could not read. Practically, therefore, in a great number of constituencies the result of the election will depend on the honesty of the presiding officer and his clerks. Let us hope they will be always honest men; but will they be believed to be honest? Mr. RYLANDS has so low an opinion of the probable honesty of such persons, that he informed the member for Limerick that he was ready to contest that constituency against him with perfect confidence as to the result if he could "see the deputy returning officers handsomely." As Mr. FORSTER pointed out again and again before his sudden tenderness for the Jews got him into trouble, it is not enough that the elections should be honestly conducted; it must be believed that they have been honestly conducted. The irritation caused by a suspicion widely disseminated that the result of the poll is due to the manoeuvres of officials would be so great and so mischievous that it would scarcely be worth while to undergo the risk of this even to have some sort of security against intimidation. It will be easy for any opponent of the Bill in the House of Lords to show that, in every election where the number of ignorant persons in the constituency is considerable, the result will be in the hands of the deputies of the returning officer; and that if official manoeuvres are not exercised, they will be suspected, and the suspicion will be almost as mischievous as the reality.

The Government had previously been beaten on the question of punishing a voter who showed his voting-paper; but the Bill still provided that he should vote secretly and give in his paper folded up, so that the vote should be concealed to the presiding officer. The Bill does not contemplate his being at liberty to show his vote; it merely does not punish him if he does show it. It is obvious that the right way of making his vote secret is to perfect the machinery of voting, so that the voter shall not be able to show how he is voting or has voted. Mr. EDMUND POTTER accordingly set himself to devise a scheme that should insure this. He framed an amendment with a ground plan attached, showing how a voting compartment was to be constructed. There was something very comical in the whole arrangement, with the constable who was to show the voter into a passage at the beginning of the process, and the constable who was to show him out and lock the door behind him when the process was over. But the mover of the amendment had tried to do carefully and honestly what Mr. FORSTER never seems to have done. He endeavoured to picture to himself how a vote must be given if it is meant to be given secretly. He added detail to detail as he found the difficulties he had to encounter increase, and the consequence was that he was led into a painful elaborateness of petty precautions which made the House laugh at him. But there is quite as much matter for serious criticism in the very imperfect manner in which the Government has dealt with the machinery of voting. A little more cleverness of contrivance would be very much in place on the part of the Government. The Bill as it now stands provides that the voter shall go to a desk and secretly mark his paper, and then fold it up so that no one can see how he has voted, and put the paper in the presence of the presiding officer into the ballot-box. But if, after voting, he shows the front of the paper to some one, there is no direction as to what is to happen. Members of the House of Commons persist in saying, night after night, that since Mr. HARCOURT's amendment was carried the voter has a right to show how he has voted. This is an assertion quite unfounded, for, as Mr. FORSTER time after time replies, the Bill still contemplates, as much as ever it did, that the front of the paper will not be shown. But if the voter chooses, before folding the paper up, to show it to an agent of one of the candidates, and then folds it up, the presiding officer has no power to prevent the voter putting his paper in the ballot-box and the vote counting. A comparatively simple change in the mechanism of voting would, we have little doubt, obviate the possibility of the paper being improperly shown. But the Government has not introduced any such change, and if the voter is allowed to show his paper and then put it in the box, whatever value the Ballot Bill may have is gone.

THE ORLEANIST PARTY.

PARIS has once more asserted its old claim to be called the City of Pamphlets. The preface which M. EDUARD HERVÉ has contributed to M. YRIARTE's Les Princes d'Orléans is a more distinct enunciation of Orleanist views than any that has been put forward elsewhere. The contents of this preface have been expounded and defended from time to time in the Journal de Paris, but there is a necessary incompleteness about newspaper writing which makes its influence only momentary. M. HERVÉ has condensed the essence of many articles into five-and-twenty small pages, and in them the least instructed Orleanist may learn what it is for his soul's health to believe. France, says M. HERVÉ, has found an instant of repose under a Government personified in a single man, and destined to all appearance to die with him. The higher the estimate formed of M. THIERS is, the clearer it becomes that his peculiar faculties are not likely to reproduce themselves in a successor. This is the justification of Orleanism. The present system is essentially provisional, for it is bound up with the life of an old man. The day cannot be far off when France will have to resume her search after constitutional government. In the eyes of most Frenchmen, the Princes of ORLEANS represent the system which gave France thirty-three years of peace, of prosperity, of industrial and commercial progress, of literary and artistic glory, of legal order and wise liberty. A family which represents this happy interlude in eighty years of anarchy or personal government cannot withdraw itself from observation even if it would. M. HERVÉ acknowledges that in assigning this part to the Princes of ORLEANS the public is not entirely just, for the Restoration may claim the first half of that happy and brilliant period. But the Restoration, by one moment of madness, called down upon France and upon itself the misfortunes which are still running their course; and even before this terrible blunder the Restoration was never popular.

France has so great a dread of seeing the work of the Revolution undone that it suspects everything which is connected with the old order of things. Men who date from a period earlier than 1789 must give unmistakable guarantees of their fidelity to modern ideas before they can hope to conquer French suspicions. Up to this point M. HERVÉ has had a clear field before him. He can urge with perfect truth that the Princes of ORLEANS have given the guarantees which France requires, that they have shown themselves to be modern princes. M. HERVÉ sees, however, that to re-establish the constitutional monarchy on the basis of 1830 would be to condemn the monarchical party to a simultaneous struggle with external foes and internal divisions. French Conservatism needs all the strength that union can give it if it is to save France from destruction. In 1830 the consequences of a schism between the elder and younger branches of the Royal House were not clearly foreseen. To-day it is plain to all men that it was the root of the schism which has made the Conservative party so long powerless in the country. It is impossible, therefore, in essaying the re-establishment of constitutional monarchy to dispense with the Count of CHAMBORD. The public, M. HERVÉ confesses, is inclined to dispense with him. It belongs to the statesmen of the Orleanist party, and, above all, to the Princes of the ORLEANS family, to show themselves in this respect wiser and less short-sighted than the public.

Here, then, to all appearance, M. HERVÉ has landed himself in a dilemma. He has shown that the princes who are to set up monarchy again in France must, above all things, be modern princes. He has shown that among the princes who are to set up monarchy again in France the Count of CHAMBORD must of necessity have the first place. How are these contradictions to be reconciled? M. HERVÉ cannot be charged with any want of courage in the presence of difficulties. He gets out of his dilemma by boldly denying that it is a dilemma. "For myself," he says, "I believe that the Count of CHAMBORD is a modern prince. The conscientious and profound meditations by which he has prepared himself for his vocation must long ago have convinced him that, to guide the destinies of his country and his age, he must be a modern prince. Nothing in the ideas, in the wants, in the aspirations of the France of to-day can be unfamiliar or uninteresting to him." M. HERVÉ's description of the Count of CHAMBORD recalls the language which some Liberal Catholics used to employ concerning the Pope. Long and profound meditation, they said, must by this time have convinced him that, if the Church is to direct modern civilization, it must admit much which it has hitherto denied; Pius IX. is not indifferent to the aspirations and the needs of the age; he appreciates and can satisfy them all. We know how far this theory was true of the Pope. Long and profound meditation had convinced him that, if the Church wished to guide modern civilization, it must greatly change its tone; and the fruit of this conviction was that, instead of directing modern civilization, he set to work to anathematize it. He proved that he was not indifferent to the aspirations and the needs of the age by making it clear that he abhorred and hated them. The Count of CHAMBORD's dispositions as regards the part of a modern prince seem to be identical with those of the Pope as regards the part of a Church Reformer. He has studied the requirements of the position which M. HERVÉ insists on assigning to him, and he has given notice that he is not prepared to conform to them. M. HERVÉ confesses that some misinterpreted acts and some misunderstood words have created in the minds of the French public an opinion of the Count of CHAMBORD which is far less favourable than that which he has himself formed. But he does not venture to state the grounds which have led him to a different conclusion from that of the world at large; and when so competent an analyst of political manifestoes as M. HERVÉ can devise no gloss which shall harmonize the letter about "My Flag" with modern ideas, we may be allowed to suspect that his belief that the two can be harmonized is not quite unconnected with his wish that they may be. For the real attitude of the Count of CHAMBORD is a matter of the last importance to the new Orleanist party. So long as he lives there can be no union on monarchical principles except on a basis to which he has consented; and without this union there is no hope of any present resurrection for the monarchy. This is the point on which M. HERVÉ's whole argument depends, and unfortunately it is the conspicuously weak link in the chain. It is of no avail that he insists in the latter part of his preface on the value of hereditary monarchy as the natural guardian of political traditions. Belong he can hope to restore hereditary monarchy in France he must get his hereditary monarch, and it is of the essence of hereditary monarchs that they are found for, not by, their subjects.

If the Count of PARIS were now the head of the BOURBONS, instead of being next in succession to the head, M. HERVÉ's reasoning might have great weight with his countrymen. For eighty years, he says, France has been in the condition which finally brought ruin upon Poland. NAPOLEON I., LOUIS PHILIPPE, NAPOLEON III., M. THIERS, have all been elective kings. France has rejected the element which alone can give stability to a monarchy, just as, in her dislike to a strong Second Chamber, she has rejected the element which can alone give stability to a Republic. She will endure neither a dynasty nor a Senate. With a King of such promise as the Count of PARIS, it might be plausibly argued that to found a dynasty is a less difficult business than to construct a Senate. But what hope can there be in the Count of CHAMBORD? Nations will sometimes wait patiently until an unpopular king shall make way for a popular successor, but is there any instance of their electing an unpopular king in order to ensure that a popular king shall succeed him? The existence of the Count of CHAMBORD is as clear an indication as is often given to a party that its time has not yet come. That which letteth must let until it be taken out of the way. The Count of CHAMBORD could not change to any good purpose even if he would. An interested conversion would lose him his old friends and gain him no new ones. Even from a purely selfish point of view, the true policy of the Orleanist party is to wait for his death, rather than to make fruitless efforts to use him in life. He is not the stuff out of which constitutional kings are made; and M. HERVÉ and his friends will only waste their strength if they try to persuade the French nation to regard him in any other light. It is trying, no doubt, to see opportunities slipping away without being able to seize them, but even this is better than to let the greater opportunity slip in an over-hasty attempt to snatch at the lesser. France will soon have to try her hand, for the twelfth time or so, at the making of a Constitution. If the Orleanists can contribute to the establishment of a stable Republic, they will at least have the consolation of knowing that they have given France the second best blessing that she can enjoy; while, if their preference for monarchy is justified by another Republican failure, they will have united by an exhaustive process the whole strength of the Conservative sentiment in favour of the cause they have at heart.

THE DEBATE ON LORD HATHERLEY'S BILL.

IF anything could reconcile the mind of a genuine law reformer to the not very satisfactory Bill of the LORD CHANCELLOR for the reform of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords and the Privy Council, it would be the still less satisfactory comments of Lord CAIRNS. We may fairly expect from the legal dignitaries who have been promoted to seats in the House of Lords something higher than party taunts and deeper than Nisi Prius criticism. And yet this is all that is to be found in the elaborate speech in which Lord CAIRNS signified the pleasure of the majority of the House of Lords to stifle the project of a Liberal LORD CHANCELLOR. If the Tory champion had pledged himself to the perpetual maintenance of the anomalous jurisdiction exercised by a fluctuating Committee in the name of the House of Lords, we could at least have admired the tenacity of party prejudice. If he had discussed on broad grounds the practicability of establishing a worthier Court of Appeal, we might have listened with respect to the opinions of an ex-Chancellor of some experience and unquestioned ability. But Lord CAIRNS did neither one nor the other of these things. Although every fact on which a judgment can be founded is as well known to him as to thousands of less eminent persons who have matured their views upon the subject, he could hit upon no better device for frustrating a resolution which was as sound in principle as the Bill founded upon it was defective in detail than an idle reference to a Select Committee. Whether the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords and of the Privy Council ought to be maintained with or without reform, whether it is desirable to construct an Appellate Court of higher quality than either of those bodies supplies, are questions on which Lord CAIRNS either has formed no opinion, or else is unwilling to commit himself to a view which might possibly have deprived him of the satisfaction of seeing to piece the project of a central law lord. On the main question, the maintenance or the abolition of the existing system of ultimate appeal, Lord CAIRNS contributed no enlightenment to the House or the country beyond a repetition of the well-worn arguments on the value of which any lawyer of much less than his experience and acuteness ought by this time to have formed a decisive opinion. The House of Lords, he says, is not just now much in arrear with its judicial business. And why? One reason which he did refer to is the satisfactory character of the Intermediate Courts of Appeal, especially in England. Another more potent reason on which he was silent is the monstrous expense of an appeal to the House of Lords. But for this the numbers of appeals would be multiplied tenfold, and it would no longer be possible to boast that the intermittent sittings of the House of Lords sufficed for the work to be done. Nor could this defect be easily remedied, for, as Lord CAIRNS himself observed, it does not follow that ex-Chancellors who give up gratuitously a fraction of their leisure during the Session would be ready to undergo continuous labour during the recess. Another argument of about equal weight was that at the present moment there is a Scotch law lord and also an Irish law lord in the House. If the sufficiency of the tribunal depends on such circumstances as these, it must have been an eminently unsatisfactory Court during more than nine tenths of the period of its existence. Then for the Judicial Committee all that Lord CAIRNS could find to say was that Lord HATHRELLY had expressed himself satisfied with its present work, although Lord CAIRNS pointedly abstained from intimating any concurrence in the opinion. An argumentum ad hominem cast in the teeth of a Lord Chancellor is a poor substitute for grave reasoning on a great constitutional question. Much parade too, was made of the opinions of Mr. ANDERSON and others, that "the lieges of Scotland" are stupid enough to like the House of Lords because it is the House of Lords, better than a tribunal of less dignity and more assured competence and diligence; and the old theory that colonists would not endure an Appellate Court which did not call itself the QUEEN in Council did good service as usual in the debate. In justice, however, to Lord CAIRNS, it must be owned that he did not profess to believe in the arguments which he did not hesitate to employ. As we had anticipated, the Opposition law lord found abundant opportunity for telling criticism in the not very happily drawn measure which the CHANCELLOR had introduced; but there is criticism and criticism, and there is a whole ocean between suggestions intended to improve, and comments the object of which is simply to disparage.

We are compelled to agree with Lord CAIRNS that the grand purpose which Lord HATHRELLY had before him was very ineffectively embodied in the Government Bill. The truth seems to be that, on this as on former occasions, the LORD CHANCELLOR failed from want of political tact. No one has shown a clearer appreciation of the necessity of thoroughness in any large measure of law reform, and yet all his Bills have been marred by a timid compromise in dealing with subjects which must be handled boldly or not at all. His great scheme for the fusion of Law and Equity, or, more correctly speaking, for the absorption of Law in Equity, broke down because he at first proposed to entrust a Committee of Judges, a large majority of whom were hostile to the measure, with the duty of framing the procedure on the shape of which the success or failure of the scheme must depend. So again this year, his purpose of establishing a worthy Appellate Court was frittered away by a vain attempt to retain so much of the existing system as to disarm the opposition of fanatical adversaries. On both of these great subjects which Lord HATHRELLY has taken in hand we cannot doubt that, if he had felt sure of carrying his Bills, he would have introduced measures as sweeping and comprehensive as the most ardent innovators could desire. But he seems to have thought that he could secure success by diluting the ideas which he would gladly have stamped with the authority of law, and the only result has been that he has damped the enthusiasm of his supporters without conciliating his inevitable opponents. The unlucky High Court of Justice Bill was ruined by the large share of quasi-legislative power proposed to be given to the Judges, and the result was that the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE tore it to pieces without mercy. So the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill was deformed by concessions to the worshippers of Peers and Privy Counsellors, and a Tory ex-Chancellor has poured out all his sarcasm on claims the only object of which seems to have been to avoid ruffling the prejudices of the Tory party. Whether in either case a less timid policy would have been more successful it is hard to say, but Lord HATHRELLY would have retired from the contest with more dignity and reputation if he had failed in a vigorous effort to carry in their integrity the comprehensive reforms of which only a distorted image could be traced in the Bills which he introduced.

On most of the details to which Lord CAIRNS objected in the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill we have already expressed an opinion not very widely removed from his, and we are bound to admit that his criticisms, though on some points petty enough, were on many others as just as they were forcible. But a very defective Bill may be easily amended if its principle is sound, and the animus of the opposition was made only too plain by the determination that the Select Committee should be a substitute for the Bill, and not, as it might have been, a means of putting it into working shape. Even the sections which met Lord CAIRNS'S approval supplied food for hostile comment. Last Session the Government made an unfortunate blunder in fixing the salaries of Judges on the Judicial Committee too low to command the services of those whose acceptance of the office was most desired. This year they have seen and corrected the error by making a more liberal offer, and Lord CAIRNS points out that the result will be to pay the higher salary without having secured the services of the men who were considered most eligible for the office. "Parsimony tempered by prodigality" is a good enough taunt, and generosity is not a necessary element in a party speech; otherwise it might have occurred to an ex-Chancellor that it was scarcely worth while to revive a discussion which had been long since thrashed out with an adequate yield of triumph to the Opposition. The suggestion that the Appellate Bill might be meant as a prelude to the more sweeping measure over which Mr. GLADSTONE thinks it necessary to think once, twice, or thrice, would have been appropriate, and perhaps legitimate, on the hustings; but one cannot but regret that, in discussing so grave a subject as the constitution of the ultimate Court of Appeal, the luminaries of the law should think more of coining a few telling sarcasms than of guiding the opinion of the country, which is fast settling down without their assistance to a conviction which will in due time become irresistible.

A NEW REFORM BILL THREATENED.

WHEN Mr. DISRAELI sold the pass for two years' tenure of office, only sanguine and inexperienced politicians ventured to assume that the era of Parliamentary Reform Bills was closed. The previous agitation had been too profitable to its promoters not to encourage future imitators. Lord JOHN RUSSELL began to discover the necessity of a second Reform Bill as soon as the popularity acquired by the first had been finally exhausted, and afterwards Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. DISRAELI began to bid against one another for power and office by lowering the franchise as at a Dutch auction. It might perhaps have been hoped that, like the Hebrew territory in occasional intervals between border wars, the land would be allowed to rest for at least seven years; but when Mr. GLADSTONE thought fit suddenly to adopt the Ballot, he justified his conversion by an announcement that universal suffrage was imminent, and on the whole expedient; nor can it be collected from his answer to Mr. TREVELYAN that he has since altered his opinion. The pretence of logical necessity is the worst possible excuse for great political changes; and when the process of demonstration is regulated by the convolutions of ingenious and sophistical intellects, the substitution of verbal deductions for the exercise of practical sagacity is untrustworthy and generally mischievous. Mr. WALTER has applied Mr. GLADSTONE'S mode of reasoning to the same effect, though in an opposite direction. Instead of extemporizing the doctrine of promiscuous suffrage to account for advocacy of the Ballot, Mr. WALTER thinks that the evils of the Ballot render the concession of votes to farm-labourers necessary rather as an accompaniment than as a corrective. Under the proposed system of secret voting the small boroughs are to become hopelessly corrupt; and the consequent redistribution of seats will, by some unexplained tendency, result in the concession of household suffrage to the counties. Equally inconclusive is the argument that in East Kent and Shoreham the extension of boroughs has already established household suffrage in rural districts which are indistinguishable from little counties. It is doubtful whether the franchise is not already too uniform; and the electoral anomalies which have survived successive Reform Bills are a better protection to minorities than any newfangled device of proportional representation. If monotony is indispensable it would be easier to abolish the exceptions than to modify the normal system.

Mr. TREVELYAN displays an ingenious simplicity in his belief that a new Reform Bill can be discussed without reference to the opinions of parties. It is not to strengthen the democratic interest that he proposes to swamp in their own constituencies the landlords and farmers who at present return county members. Mr. TREVELYAN's objects are practical and social rather than strictly political, for he only wishes that the labourers should inform Parliament through their representatives of their own grievances and aspirations. Himself a zealous supporter of Mr. MIALI, as well as of other assailants of established institutions, Mr. TREVELYAN professes not to be quite certain whether the question of Church Establishments will be fully understood until the agricultural labourer is consulted on the comparative advantages of endowment and of the voluntary system. Like a fowler spreading his nets in the full sight of birds whom he must regard as the stupidest denizens of the air, the advocate of an extended suffrage almost undertakes to be converted to the cause of Establishments if the ploughman should prove to be the ally of the parson. It is uniformly found that an agitation which affects to be independent of sects and parties is conducted by the most exclusive of factions. With the exception of theorists who, like Mr. WALTER, are bent on reducing the Ballot to an absurdity, the friends of household suffrage in counties are zealous supporters of democracy. The farm-labourer, indeed, is not at present one of themselves; but their emissaries are already busy in promoting agricultural strikes in different counties; and they may reasonably expect that the class of the community which possesses the smallest amount of intellectual cultivation will be the most ready to listen to political demagogues. It is perfectly true that, as Mr. FAWCETT observed, the farm-labourer is greatly calumniated by his friends, and that he exercises in his own craft faculties of observation and contrivance which in themselves indicate a certain education; but he has not been taught to reason and theorize; and it would be easy to persuade him that he is the victim of unsuspected oppression. When the Jacobins of the London Clubs propose to an urban rabble the expropriation of landowners, they address an audience which knows nothing of rural economy. The labourer would attend with a better instructed cupiditv to the lessons of agrarian reformers. With longer experience Mr. TREVELYAN will learn that political power is not invariably applied to the redress of legitimate grievances. It may indeed be doubted whether his zeal for the extension of the suffrage would not be cooled if it were discovered that the farm labourers formed, after all, the Conservative stratum to which Mr. DISRAELI failed to penetrate. Unluckily, Mr. TREVELYAN and his friends are perfectly justified in their belief that the extension of household suffrage to counties would largely increase the ranks of their supporters.

Mr. FAWCETT, preferring as usual sound principle to the exigencies of party, took occasion to protest against the faggot votes by which the inhabitants of towns are partially enabled to control or influence the representation of certain counties. Mr. CORDEN, whom the editor of his pamphlets declares to have been infallible, was the most zealous advocate of the system of faggot votes; and immediately after the abolition of the Corn Laws he recommended his followers to concentrate their entire energies on the purchase of shares in freehold houses, for the purpose of outvoting the landlords and farmers in their own counties. The scheme, in common with the great majority of Mr. CORDEN's projects, proved abortive; and perhaps Mr. FAWCETT wasted his disapproval on a system which has thus far been almost innocuous. The present county electors have much more to fear from household suffrage than from faggot votes. Parliamentary Reformers almost always forget or suppress the obvious proposition that in the readjustment of a representative system what is given to one section of the community must be taken from another. In every county those who are at present excluded from the suffrage would, if they were enfranchised, form a majority; and if the new electors, under the guidance of demagogues, thought fit to combine against their employers, the present electors would be absolutely excluded from all political influence. The sycophants of the enlightened working men of the towns would not hesitate to cultivate a similar enthusiasm for any voters who had political power to offer them in exchange. In spite of Mr. TREVELYAN's sincere disclaimer, the agitation to which he has now devoted himself tends exclusively to the benefit of the extreme party with which he has cast in his fortunes.

Mr. GLADSTONE had no choice but to oppose for the moment a proposal for a new electoral revolution; but, as usual, he was careful to explain that on a fit occasion he would not be unwilling once more to revise the Constitution. The rapid collapse of their popularity has not yet convinced the Ministers that it is impolitic to disquiet all classes by vague menaces and threats of change. Mr. MIALI was last year courteously reminded by Mr. BRUCE that he is not yet backed by a sufficiently formidable agitation; and Mr. GOSCHEN, with the approval of his leader, periodically threatens the landowners with a revision to their detriment of local taxation. The publicans have had sufficient influence to make their resentment felt; but other classes are equally desirous of being allowed to pursue their ordinary avocations in peace. It is not the business of a chief Minister to confirm on every occasion the suspicion that he takes nothing for granted, and allows nothing to be permanently settled. Mr. GLADSTONE undertook last autumn to think twice or thrice before he destroyed the House of Lords; and if Mr. TREVELYAN brings forward two or three annual motions for household suffrage in counties, the actual electors may perhaps find themselves practically disfranchised with even less hesitation on the part of Mr. GLADSTONE. It is not improbable that, while they are still capable of exercising electoral power, they will intimate their opinion of Mr. TREVELYAN's proposal, and of Mr. GLADSTONE's wavering professions, by returning Conservative members. It is only the most thoughtful and dispassionate politicians who appreciate the advantage of keeping in office a statesman who, if he found himself in opposition, would perhaps become a revolutionary leader. The Ballot will in some counties diminish the influence of landlords; but the effect of secret voting may perhaps be counteracted by the alarm of farmers who are threatened with the future supremacy of their own workmen.

THE LICENSING BILL.

IT appears probable that by an exercise of reason and moderation a Licensing Bill may be passed during the present Session. If it be possible to satisfy the public and the publicans, the fanatics may safely be neglected. The hours of opening and closing liquor-shops must be fixed with reference to the convenience of buyers; and if that is properly considered, the sellers will have no ground, and we believe no desire, to complain. A tradesman cannot afford to shut his shop when other shops are open, but he might be willing, or even anxious, that the hours of business should be generally abridged. As Lord KIMBERLEY's Bill stands at present, "on Sunday" licensed premises shall be closed from ten or eleven o'clock P.M. to seven o'clock on Monday morning. This, however, is merely an example of the slovenly way in which important Bills are drawn. It is beyond the power of Parliament to extend Sunday into Monday morning. We can of course discover the meaning which the draftsman has not taken the trouble to express. Within four miles of Charing Cross the hour of closing is to be on Sundays eleven P.M., and on weekdays twelve P.M. Beyond that circle the hour of closing is to be on Sundays ten P.M., and on weekdays eleven P.M. The hour of opening is to be throughout the metropolitan district, to which for the present we confine our attention, seven A.M. It is obvious to inquire how the arrangement as to closing will affect visitors to theatres and other places of amusement. The upper class of theatres finish their performances, as a rule, earlier than they used to do. This has arisen partly from the necessity which many persons are under of quitting the theatre in time to catch a homeward train on one of the suburban lines of railway, and partly perhaps from a feeling, which formerly did not seem to exist, that it is possible to have too much for your money. If it is undesirable, as we think it is, to stimulate drinking in theatres, there must be opportunities to drink outside, and therefore the liquor-shops must in general remain open for at least half an hour after the performances have finished. As all the theatres which we can call to mind are within four miles of Charing Cross, the frequenters of all of them would have equal opportunity of obtaining drink; and if there are any theatres beyond this limit, they would take no harm by opening and closing at hours earlier than have become habitual in the Strand. Almost all other amusements finish earlier than the theatres, and a public meeting, which usually begins at eight o'clock, cannot by any oratorical power be kept alive after half-past ten. As regards business which has to be done at night, we doubt whether the cutting off an hour from the time within which drink may be procured would make much difference. Those who are at work at twelve P.M. are likely to be at work also at one or two A.M. It is obvious that, as regards certain trades, the power which the Bill gives to the local authority of granting to the houses which supply them with refreshment exemptions from the rules of closing would have to be freely exercised. With this reservation, it might not be inconvenient to close one hour earlier at night, but we doubt whether it is desirable to make the hour of opening in the morning later than it is at present. It is hardly worth while to establish a rule which would require almost innumerable exceptions. We observe that the Committee of Licensed Victuallers have suggested to Lord KIMBERLEY that the hour of opening should be five o'clock, and not seven, as proposed by the Bill, upon the ground that "the vast number of workmen who commence their labour earlier than seven o'clock in the morning will otherwise be deprived of all breakfast accommodation in a public-house." As regards the hours of closing, the Committee suggest that the same provisions should be adopted for the provincial towns as are made in the Bill for the metropolis; and we infer that, as regards the metropolis, the Committee accept the Bill, although they would prefer that the hour of closing should be uniform without regard to distance from Charing Cross. They also appear to accept the further restriction which is proposed for Sunday; and if the publicans desire to close their houses, we should be reluctant to propose on the part of the public that they should be kept open. The "bond fide traveller," who is well known in Westminster Hall, will continue to enjoy his privileges under this Bill; which moreover allows considerable latitude in the sale of drink at railway stations. Besides the Committee of Licensed Victuallers, two different Associations of Brewers have met to consider the Bill, and one of them had an interview with Lord KIMBERLEY which appears not to have been altogether unsatisfactory. Some of the objections taken to the Bill have been met by concessions, and others can hardly be considered vitally important. Neither brewers nor licensed victuallers are likely to commit the folly of rejecting this Bill because it is not exactly what they would themselves have drawn. They will accept any tolerable settlement rather than allow the question to remain open another year.

There is a clause in the Bill providing that in the case of a licence to sell intoxicating liquor not to be drunk on the premises, if a person buys liquor and drinks it on the premises, or on a highway adjoining or near such premises, the seller shall be liable to a penalty, "unless he proves that such drinking was without his privity or consent." We think this clause bears out the complaint of the deputations against the severity of the penal enactments of the Bill. A person comes to buy beer for the dinner or supper of himself or his family, and on his way home with it he is tempted to take a pull at the tankard before its first freshness has passed away. If he does this near the place of sale, the seller may be brought before a magistrate and fined 10*l.*, unless he "proves" that he was not privy or consenting to the buyer's act of tasting his beer before he reached his home. It appears to our understanding impossible to prove the negative of privity or consent, except by the evidence of the defendant, which, as this would be a criminal proceeding, he would be incompetent to give. Thus the buyer's hasty and harmless act of taking a sip of beer out of a pot on the way home may subject the seller of the beer to a prosecution, against which there could be no defence. Besides the fine, which a sensible magistrate might mitigate, the conviction must be endorsed on the licence, and three such endorsements cause the licence to be forfeited. It will be found that the Act under which these licences for sale of liquor not to be drunk on the premises are granted contains a carefully framed provision against evasion, which has been by another Act carefully amended. But the old-fashioned notion that, if a thing is worth doing, it is worth doing well, seems to have been exploded by the draftsmen of recent Bills in Parliament. It is remarkable that, although the Bill does not profess to consolidate existing law, this provision against evasion has been copied into it from previous Acts. But if the draftsman takes thus much, he ought to take a great deal more. It becomes obvious, as soon as attention is directed to the above-mentioned clause of the Bill, that it cannot stand. Even the debates on the Ballot Bill have disclosed no absurdity so great as imposing a fine upon a man because he cannot prove by evidence other than his own oath that another person's act was done without his consent. Of course, if the unfortunate beer-seller cannot pay the fine, he must go to prison—that is, if there happens to be a vacant place in any prison to which he may be sent, which the disposition of some legislators might render doubtful. We observe that in another clause the draftsman, with a sudden assumption of accuracy which is consistent with essential carelessness, has provided that if a licensed person is convicted of permitting his premises "to become or to be" a brothel, he shall be fined. It is difficult to see how a house can be a brothel without becoming one, or vice versa. In another clause a constable is empowered to demand the name and address of any person found on licensed premises during certain hours, and if he supposes the name and address to be false, "he may require evidence of its correctness." This clause would convert every constable into a statutory Doornerry. It is impossible to conjecture what is here meant by "evidence." The statement of the suspected person would be useless, because the constable has made up his mind to disbelieve it, and if he were a "bond fide traveller," who would have a right to be where he was found, he would almost inevitably be without "evidence," and liable to be taken as a prisoner before a magistrate.

We think that the Government has done wisely in bringing in a Bill merely embodying such alterations of the law as they deem necessary, and not attempting at the same moment to consolidate the whole law of licensing. Next year the Acts as to beer-houses passed in 1869 and 1870 will expire, and that may be a convenient time for the necessary work of consolidation. By doing one thing at a time there may be some chance of doing it well, whereas amid the excited discussion of principles it is inevitable that details should be thrown into inextricable confusion. But if the Bill is merely designed to alter the law, it is unnecessary to introduce into it any provision of an Act which the Bill does not repeal. We have already referred to one such superfluous clause. The Bill of Mr. BRUCE of last year and that of Sir H. SELWYN-IBBETSON of this year would supersede the existing law of licensing by one comprehensive enactment. It has been remarked by a master of political satire that comprehensive measures are not always comprehensible. Supposing that Lord KIMBERLEY's Bill, with necessary amendments, should pass this year, the task of consolidation may be undertaken next year with the advantage of a year's experience of its working. If magistrates do their duty under it, the rival interests of freedom and sobriety will perhaps not be found wholly incompatible, and even the eloquence of the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH may fail to demonstrate that they need any help from ratapayers.

THE OPPOSITION AND MR. FAWCETT'S BILL.

THE charge of inconsistency which has been brought against Mr. FAWCETT because he did not abandon his Bill as soon as he found that the Opposition, or a part of it, was likely to vote for it, shows a curious ignorance of the rudiments of party morality. On Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN's theory, St. PAUL ought to have reconsidered his position as a preacher of Christianity on finding that he had almost persuaded AGRIPPA to be a Christian. Political controversy should be conducted on the principle of a perpetual see-saw. The conversion of your adversary to your views ought to be the signal for ratting from your own. The politicians who criticize Mr. FAWCETT in this spirit are for the most part the same men that condemned the Government for not reversing their educational policy when they discovered that it was agreeable to the Conservatives. These gentlemen treat measures as a bill-discounter treats bills. All they care to look at is what names are on the back of them. So long as the cheers and groans come from the right throats, they do not trouble themselves about what it is that calls them forth. It is not pretended that Mr. FAWCETT has shaped his Bill so as to catch Conservative votes; all that is alleged against him is that he did not reject Conservative votes as soon as it seemed probable that they would be offered him. If the Opposition had supported Mr. GLADSTONE on the Irish education question as they supported Mr. FORSTER on the English education question, Mr. FAWCETT would have been praised below the gangway for his bold enunciation of Liberal principles against the temporizing policy of the Government. In this case the censure has fallen on the wrong head. Mr. FAWCETT is a thoroughgoing Secularist, and as it is quite certain that the Irish people will not in their present state of mind put up with Secularism of their own free will, he is anxious to apply as much pressure as may be needed to overcome their resistance. In the prosecution of this enterprise he is naturally and properly willing to take whatever help he can get. The man who advocates Secularism is for the time being a Secularist, and Mr. FAWCETT rightly thinks that this all-important fact is not affected by the fact that on other points his new allies call themselves Conservatives. But though Mr. FAWCETT may consistently and honourably accept the aid of the Opposition in getting his Bill passed, what shall be said of the Opposition which is willing to aid him in passing it? Of late years the course of events has given the Conservative policy a more than usually ecclesiastical character. Accidents often determine what an Opposition shall oppose, and in this case the deciding influence has been found in the hostility of extreme Liberals to the support of religion by the State, in however indirect a manner, together with their consequent desire to dissociate from religion any system of education that is even in part maintained by public money. Upon no subject has Conservative eloquence taken a more edifying tone than upon the indissoluble connexion that should subsist between religion and education. Whether the higher education has been under discussion, as in the debates on the University Tests Act, or elementary education, as in the debates before and since the passing of the Education Act, it has been assumed as a truth which would be disputed only by impious radicals that religious and secular teaching should go hand in hand. The Opposition did its best to retain Oxford and Cambridge as Church of England Universities, and when it was beaten on this point it made a vigorous effort to retain them as exclusively Christian Universities. As regards the Elementary Education Act, the Opposition has made common cause with Roman Catholics and some sections of Protestant Dissenters in insisting on the Denominational system being placed in all respects on a level with the secular system. If over party policy was marked out by party antecedents, the policy of the Conservatives as regards Mr. FAWCETT's Bill was so marked out. The whole tendency of Conservative speeches in and out of Parliament has been in favour of Denominationalism as opposed to Secularism. In this respect the Irish people are altogether at one with them. Both have professed to accept Denominationalism as the best substitute for that exclusive recognition of their own special religion which they admit to be now unattainable.

Mr. FAWCETT proposes to do for the University of Dublin what the University Tests Act did for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. So much the Opposition might perhaps have assented to from love of symmetry or from a conviction that resistance would be useless. But Mr. FAWCETT's Bill does a great deal more than this. It takes up the whole question of University education in Ireland, and settles it in a Secularist sense. To conceive anything like a parallel in England to the scheme which Mr. FAWCETT wishes to see established in Ireland, we must suppose that the great majority of the people of England had been keenly anxious to have some provision made for the maintenance of Denominational teaching at Oxford and Cambridge, and that Mr. TREVELYAN, reinforced by a large contingent of Irishmen and Scotchmen, had insisted on taking the question out of the hands of the Government, and forcing the Secularist solution upon the nation. This is precisely what is now happening, or at least is talked of as likely to happen, in the case of Ireland, with the startling difference that the contingent which is to reinforce Mr. FAWCETT consists of English Conservatives who have hitherto proclaimed themselves that friends of religious education. It would be hard to find in political history an abnegation of principle at once so complete and so wanton. If the sudden conversion of the Conservative party to a democratic Reform Bill was more striking in its incidents, and more important in its results, it must be remembered that to a great number of men political questions are not really matters of right and wrong. They are content to leave the decision of them to others, and to desert their leaders would seem to them a more immoral act than to follow their leaders in the desertion of their principles. But in matters of religion and morality men claim to think for themselves, and the Conservatives are never tired of proclaiming that the conflict between Secularism and Denominationalism is a matter of religion and morality. It is to be hoped that such of them as intend to vote with Mr. FAWCETT will take the trouble to explain how a connexion which is indissoluble on one side of St. George's Channel can be dissoluble on the other; how the same men can be Denominationalists in England and Secularists in Ireland. Perhaps, indeed, the support of Mr. FAWCETT is meant to be the prelude to a similar conversion to the cause of Messrs. DIXON and CANDLISH. There would be the same reward in both cases—the consciousness of having embarrassed the Government. Upon this point, however, the alliance with the Anglican clergy will probably keep the party straight. As regards Ireland, the Conservatives are under no such sobering influence. The Irish clergy, so far at all events as they are represented by the authorities of Trinity College, seem to be perfectly ready to turn Secularists, provided that they can thereby exclude their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen from a share in University endowments. Dishing the Papists is to an Irish Protestant what dishing the Whigs was to the late Lord DERBY.

The position of Mr. FAWCETT and his friends upon this question is, in its way and for different reasons, as illogical as the position of the Conservatives will be if they make up their minds to vote for his Bill. The promoters of the measure have hitherto been content to shirk the argument brought forward by Mr. JOHN MORLEY, in a recent letter to the Pall Mall Gazette. As a Liberal, Mr. MORLEY is advanced enough for anybody, and it is in the character of an advanced Liberal that he challenges Mr. FAWCETT's proposal to legislate for Ireland in a manner diametrically opposed to the wishes of the Irish people. "In politics," Mr. MORLEY says, "you have to strike a balance between their respective advantages when two of your principles clash. The aiding of Denominational teaching by the State seems to me a thoroughly bad thing, but making laws for one nation only to please another seems infinitely worse." Mr. FAWCETT wishes to do for Irishmen in the matter of University education what NAPOLEON III. did for Frenchmen in the matter of commercial freedom—to give them what he thinks good for them, not what they think good for themselves. If this policy is recognized as sound Liberalism, we ought at least to send an apology to Chislehurst for the censures which we have been accustomed to pass on the Empire because its maxim was government for the people, not by the people. If all English Liberals took Mr. FAWCETT's view, the argument for Home Rule would become morally irresistible.

MAY MEETINGS.

IT is curious, after all the epigrams and philosophical reflections that have been made upon the subject, to observe how impassable are the invisible barriers by which one part of mankind is cut off from another. It is still more curious, in spite of an equal number of commonplaces, to see how each fragment mistakes itself for the universe or for the pattern on which the universe should, properly speaking, have been modelled. For poor King Alfonso only said a little more frankly what we all of us think, and there can be no doubt that if any of us had been consulted at the creation of the world, its arrangements would have been materially different. Taking up, for example, the newspaper which professes to reflect most accurately the various tastes of the British middle classes, we find two articles side by side; one of them is a bit of rhetoric about Newmarket, and the other about the May Meetings. One section of humanity has been nervously considering for months whether Prince Charlie could run a mile faster than Cremorne; the other has been watching with almost equal keenness to know how many Jews or negroes have abandoned their errors to be gathered into the Protestant fold. Each of these little fragments of the race looks down with supreme contempt upon all the others. The true sporting man considers that a person who hardly knows a horse from a donkey, and is profoundly ignorant of the state of the odds, is little better than a fool. He does not indeed condemn such wretches to any punishment in the next world; probably he holds that they are sufficiently punished in this by their incapacity to taste the only pleasure worthy of a rational being. Man is to him distinguished from the brutes as a betting animal, and the ideal sometimes set forth by enthusiasts of this class is one in which every member of society, from the prince to the peasant, is prepared to back his opinion according to his means. The world should be one vast York-shire; and, as in the conventional accounts of Arabia, a horse of the purest race should be an inmate of every household. The class which frequents May Meetings is to him personified by Stiggins, and is simply a mass of unctuous and tyrannical hypocrisy. Such feelings, it need hardly be said, are repaid in kind, and indeed with interest. Exeter Hall has more vigorous denunciations at its command than Newmarket. We need not dwell upon the fate which, in its opinion, is reserved for the unfortunate votaries of the Tarf. If the complacency with which a man regards his own character is fairly measured by the depth to which all other persons have sunk in his estimation, there can be no doubt that the fanatic has by far the pleasantest view of life; for surely nothing can be more flattering to one's self-esteem than to hold as an undoubted truth that all who do not agree with you are on the road to perdition. And, indeed, if we were compelled to decide upon one of these two ideals being adopted as the pattern on which the whole world should be modelled, we should feel ourselves in candour bound to adopt the scheme of Exeter Hall. The betting-man of the present day, whatever chance he may succeed in throwing over his pursuits, is not a pleasant phenomenon when you come to look into him closely. A world of gamblers would be a more detestable place of habitation than a world of fanatics. And yet, if we may venture for a short time to contemplate the latter alternative, it must be admitted that the prospect is not altogether bright. We sometimes wonder, though after all the world is uncertain, whether you, Lord St. Austyn, and his fellow-believers could really look forward with pleasure to the day whose advent they profess to anticipate with ecstasy, in which the whole world shall be even as they are. The wonder, we say, is unnecessary; for we have no reason to doubt the perfect sincerity of the leaders of the persuasion, nor, when we consider the state of cultivation which they appear to have attained, is it necessary to suppose that they are men capable of understanding the objections to having all human beings drilled after their system. When Mr. Spurgeon travels on the Continent, he appears to accept, with the most unassuming faith, that chain of reasoning which is popular with so many people. You, he says, addressing the Pope of Rome or a German Professor, mentally differ from me. Therefore you are wrong. Being wrong, it is quite certain that you are a fool, and highly probable that you will be damned. In one form or other, as it is scarcely necessary to remark, a very similar set of opinions is entertained by persons of much greater pretensions to culture than Mr. Spurgeon. Intense dogmatism is by no means confined to any stage of opinion. The man of science who contemptuously repudiates every tinge of theological belief is very often just as great a dogmatist as the bitterest Ultramontane. But the peculiarity of the Exeter Hall form of dogmatism is its combination with an unusual depth of ignorance and intellectual indifference. It has not even affected to consider other forms of opinion, but has been content to treat them as simply non-existent; which explains, amongst other things, the curious rapidity of conversion sometimes to be observed among men of this type, when by some means or other the existence of a new world of thought and sentiment has been suddenly forced upon them. They are like men born blind who have received what is to them an entirely new faculty.

No man is altogether emancipated from an old form of belief until he has fairly looked at it and done justice to the excellences to which its power over men's minds has been due, as well as observed its defects. Now, as a rule, the disciple of Exeter Hall is simply unaware that there is any element in human nature which does not find full satisfaction in his creed. Certain instincts seem never to have come to life in him at all. If we take up, for example, at random the reports of recent meetings, we come upon such bits of eloquence as this. A gentleman at the "Lord's Day Observance Society" regretted to say that "in some of the London churches the Fourth Commandment was displaced by pretty ornaments, and he hoped the Legislature would aid the parishioners in putting an end to a state of things in which God's decrees were sacrificed to taste." The next speaker complained that the Town Council of Birmingham had "determined to open the Arts Museum on the Lord's Day," and he was afraid that the example would be followed elsewhere. We do not quite understand in what sense the Fourth Commandment was "replaced by pretty ornaments," but the mental attitude of the speakers is sufficiently obvious. It had never even entered into their minds to imagine that art can possibly be brought into alliance with religious sentiment. They consider, with a very large part of the British public, that a picture gallery is on a level with a peep-show, and is an intrinsically frivolous entertainment got up chiefly in the interests of the publicans. A stroll through a gallery is an excellent means of acquiring an appetite for a glass of beer, and on the whole partakes of the wickedness of all purely secular entertainments. A person with an immortal soul ought to be above looking at "pretty ornaments"; and, moreover, which is unfortunately an equally characteristic inference, he should not be content with keeping them out of his own particular chapel, but should invoke the aid of Parliament to put them down elsewhere. The speaker obviously did not think, as persons of more cultivation may do, that the particular form of art which finds favour with the High Church party is specially childish; but he regards art in general as fit only for light-minded and worldly people. He would be just as ready to condemn the most spiritual art of mediæval times as the last new bit of dilettante antiquarianism. The bare notion that any form of art, except that which is involved in roaring out a revival hymn, can be admissible into religious services is altogether abhorrent to him. He would as soon expect his pastor to interrupt the service by a song fresh from the music-halls as to make any profane concessions to the senses of the beautiful. A man in such a temper of mind is of course utterly unable to comprehend the repugnance with which cultivated people would regard the extension of the puritanical Sabbath to the whole world. He has not the power of conceiving that there is anything in it which jars upon religious feeling, or to perceive why, to any of the Continental races, it would seem like a proposal to put out the sun once a week. He never shrinks from the conclusion that, if he is right, the great majority of the world must be hopelessly given over to the powers of evil, as, indeed, that is an essential part of his creed. And he therefore complacently sets down all such expressions of opinion as, for example, this article, to the inextinguishable antipathy which exists between the children of light and the children of darkness. His own religion is absolutely true and universally comprehensive. A gentleman to whom a half-converted Jew once applied for a little pecuniary assistance during the period of reflection, implied by asking for what possible reason he could think of giving up so ancient and highly respectable a creed? A man who had the good fortune to be a member of so ancient a persuasion ought to adhere to it, in preference to any newfangled creed which might have the advantage of being a little truer. No doubt this was pushing toleration to extremes. But, at any rate, it implied some recognition of the fact that there are elements of truth and beauty in many different opinions, and that if we could crush them all out summarily in favour of one we might lose more than we should gain. That is the theory which our fanatical friends are wholly unable to conceive; and they fancy that the world would lose nothing if all its inhabitants, from the Roman Catholic to the Hindoo, could to-morrow put on suits of dingy black and begin to sing Dissenting hymns through their noses.

And yet we should be falling into the narrowness which we condemn if we failed to recognize what there is of elevating, and we might almost say of sublime, in this narrow fanaticism. The servant-maids and shopkeepers who have been saving up pence in order to have a ten-thousandth part of the glory of making a Jew rather more like one of themselves, have been directed to an ideal which may not be very glorious, but which at any rate raises them a little out of the purely material selfishness in which they are condemned to live. The missionary reports are not very exhilarating documents, as a rule, to intelligent readers; but they are the means of keeping alive a certain amount of imaginative interest in the affairs of the world at large, which is better than pure indifference. Even the narrow fanaticism and prejudice represent a great force in society which, like other great forces, deserves something better than simple contempt. The best qualities of Englishmen are very closely connected with a certain pig-headed unreasonableness which is disagreeable enough, but not exactly despicable. A man with a profound conviction that he is going to heaven, and that nobody else will get there by any other road than his, is apt to shock our prejudices; but we cannot refuse to him a certain kind of esteem. We may ardently wish that he would be a little more refined, and lifted out of the very narrow groove in which he is confined; but we should be sorry to lose the element of sturdy independence and adherence to principle which he represents in the national character.

POST-CARDS

NO doubt there are very good reasons why the post-card has turned out a great success. In the first place, there are a number of indolent people in the world who are very glad to be saved the trouble of folding a letter and putting a stamp on an envelope. There are an equal number of awkward people who never could find the right-sized envelope, or remember where they had laid the stamps. A few economists, no doubt, feel a savage sort of satisfaction in the saving of a halfpenny. Then too there is the host of fussy people, the people who must be talking, and who never can keep their fingers off pen and paper. It is an immense relief for people who have nothing to say, to seize a post-card and say it. A letter, however short, implied some sort of moral responsibility, and afforded some sort of guarantee against pure meaningless chatter. A mere note had to observe some sort of grammar, and to aim at an appearance of sense. There were a few lingering traditions, too, which prevented correspondence from sinking into an incessant epistolary peep-showing. But the post-card has to make its own traditions, and for the time the idlers and the fussy folk have it all their own way. One may scribble a post-card while lounging for a few minutes after breakfast, or waiting to see whether the morning turns out a sunny one; one may pencil a post-card on a shop-counter, or drop one into the letter-box at a railway station. The fussy man has hardly bidden you good-bye, before a post-card arrives to tell you something which he had forgotten to observe. You flatter yourself you have shaken the busybody off, but he buttons you again through the post-office. A thousand purposeless inquiries are littered over one's table, and each is followed up by fresh postage-cards with the mystic "R.S.V.P." But even the inquiries are better than the mere gabble of "What a pleasant morning!" or the feeble joke which is thought good enough for a halfpenny card. It is not, however, the idle folk or the awkward folk or the fussy folk only who exult in post-cards. This is an age of hurry, and the post-card is the perfect expression of the age. The old courtesies of society—its ceremonious bow, its well-turned compliments, its refinement of address and demeanour—have all vanished with the leisure which produced them. Nobody has time to play Sir Charles Grandison in the crush of a modern drawing-room, where intercourse is reduced to a passing bow, and conversation to a friendly epigram. The artist sends post-billows to the Academy, and "wishes he had time" for nobler work. The very scholar rushes for sheer life through pamphlets and octaves, and dismisses his duty follow to the gullet. We have discarded hour-glasses from our pulpits, and cut down the sermon to twenty minutes. Our very holidays are a race against time, and the tourist returns triumphant at having done Syria and the Pyramids in a month. The post-card is the fitting correspondence of an age like this—of a world which believes itself too busy to put a sheet of paper into an envelope. We are proud of it, as we are proud of our express trains and our telegraph. It helps us to hug ourselves on the whirl in which we live, and the wonderful way in which we manage to live in it.

We are not so Quixotic as to plead against "progress," or the pride which our age feels in the consciousness that, like John Brown's soul, it is always "marching on"; but it must be owned that in the case of the post-card we have a few losses to set off against our gains. We can hardly open an old drawer, or look over a bundle of our grandmother's correspondence, without a shy suspicion that the post-card can hardly be regarded as the climax of the art of letter-writing. No doubt it is the completion of a process which has been going on for a long time before. Our grandmothers' letters were very serious matters. The heavy postage seemed to necessitate a corresponding amount of thought and correctness in the composition of them. They were written at long intervals, and for the most part on distinct occasions and with a special purpose. Their length and the very shape of the paper on which they were written gave them a sort of literary impress. To write, in fact, such letters as our fathers used to receive in their early days required not a little literary skill. To acquire this skill, to be a good letter-writer, was one of the chief aims of the higher education of the time, and there can be no doubt that a high standard of excellence was pretty generally obtained. It is unfair, perhaps, to cite as specimens of average correspondence such letters as those which are familiar to every reader in the novels of the last century—in Clarissa, for instance, or Evelina; although the very form which these novels assume, and the fact that no novelist of to-day is able to manage it, prove clearly enough that the notion of good letter-writing was familiar enough then, and has become pretty strange to us nowadays. But any bundle of old letters which we turn out of a drawer is enough to convince us that a high standard of composition had been reached by the bulk of intelligent and educated people. Even in the commonest instances we find a certain dignified grace and propriety of tone, a fair notion of narrative, some care for phraseology and style, little touches of humour and well-bred wit. Correspondence, in fact, a hundred years ago was an almost universal means of self-education, and the loss of culture which has resulted from the practical abandonment of it is probably more serious than we at first sight suppose. Letter-writing, it must be remembered, is the only form of literary production which can ever be accessible to the mass of men and women. Few persons in any age are likely to write books or State papers. But every one writes letters, and people's literary taste, their appreciation and enjoyment of the various qualities which make up literary style, will pretty much depend on the letters they write. The cultivation of Latin verse and Latin prose at schools has been justly defended on the ground, not that it made Ovids and Ciceros out of average schoolboys, but that it enabled the average schoolboy to enter in some degree into the excellences of Ovid and Cicero. And even if the long letters of the last century failed in enabling every correspondent to rival the vivacity of Miss Burney or the ease of Richardson, they probably did a good deal in enabling their writers to feel the excellences of either. There is high authority, indeed, for believing that amongst the letter-writers themselves practice, as the old saw runs, had done a good deal towards "making perfect." If we remember rightly, it is in his essay on "Style" that De Quincy asks himself the question where he remembered to have observed the purest and truest English, and, coming from so great a master, his reply is a startling one. It was, he says, in the ordinary letters of unmarried women of from forty to fifty. But even if we set this aside, and grant that the bulk of our grandmothers' epistles are dull and a little stilted, they still exercised a wholesome influence in some marked points on the literature around them. However stilted or dull, they are never vulgar or flippant; flippancy and vulgarity, in fact, are just the faults which anything like a serious attempt at literary composition is pretty sure to correct. We should hardly have to tolerate the "fast dialogue" of Miss Braddon or the sensational spinsterhood who have followed in her train, if people still retained the art of telling a story or relating a conversation which we find common enough in the letters of a hundred years ago. The young lions of the Daily Telegraph would hardly roar so loudly if people had learnt the habit of moderation and good sense from their own correspondence.

There is another social loss which the post-card is likely to bring home to us, though, as in the last case, it is rather the process of which the post-card is the culminating point than the post-card itself which is responsible for it. We remember a very distinguished biographer telling us that at a certain stage in the life which he was describing he found the series of letters on which he had mainly relied suddenly fail him. The break marked, in fact, the advent of the penny stamp. Up to that point he had in his hands a mass of real letters, sometimes giving detailed accounts of the writer's daily life, sometimes treating in a serious way of serious subjects, but always distinguished by a certain literary excellence. But from the moment of the reduction of the postage the biographer found himself lost in a chaos of petty notes. Here and there he found an admirable saying or a jotting of really important intelligence, but it required his utmost skill to bring them into any literary form at all, and he found himself thrown mainly upon oral traditions and the memory of existing friends for the close of his biography. Both historically and socially such a change involves a very real loss. There is probably no way in which we can form so true an estimate of society or character in the past as through its common correspondence. We can all of us remember the amazing life and reality which Mr. Carlyle gave to Oliver Cromwell by the simple publication of his letters. In the case of speculative or literary men the loss is yet greater than in that of men of action. Strike Arnold's letters out of Arnold's life, and there remain simply the pamphlets of a rather hot-tempered polemic, and the dim traditions of a great schoolmaster. But even if the temper of really great men could be read as fully and distinctly in books and actions as it is in their correspondence, the little incidents of social life, the passing phases of social feeling, the common joys and sorrows of the time, can never be preserved in any form but that of letters. A distinguished French author who landed in England with the aim of investigating the real life of the English people was recommended by a cynical friend to spend his time at Bow Street. And it really seems possible that the future historian of our own day, if he wishes to know something of the social life around us, may be driven for lack of better materials to a study of the police reports. The penny stamp has killed all future Horace Walpoles. Nobody nowadays would dream of turning, as the great letter-writer of Twickenham did, his correspondence into a moving picture of the humours and phases of the day. Still less, if he attempted such a task, should we find it done with the wit and abandon which has passed out of vogue with the letters of the Georgian era. The two orders of correspondence which have as yet resisted postal reform will hardly help the future Macaulay. The "Indian letter" can hardly be called a letter at all. It is, in fact, a diary kept from month to month. Morning after morning the wife who has left her "Judge" in his Indian jungle chronicles Mary's menials and Johnny's outbreaks in the nursery. Evening after evening the Judge sits down in the cool of sunset to tell his spouse how many taxpayers he has had thrashed into duly rendering their Income-tax, and what prospects there are of sport and "pig killing." It is a pleasant homelike way of living together on paper across a thousand miles of sea, but it is not letter-writing. The very entries day after day are jealously divided by their special dates. There is no sort of connexion or composition, but rather a marked jealousy in every line of anything "so formal" as the appearance of it. Such a correspondence is no more letter-writing than a dictionary is a book. On the other hand, love-letters, for the most part, are really correspondence. What literary feeling cannot do, the glow of emotion and a certain poetic tone of composition really does. We don't know what truth there is in a statement we have sometimes heard, that a Billingsgate fishwoman, once fairly roused into passion, always expresses herself in pure and racy English. But it is certain that anything like ardent feeling has a very healthy influence on style, and that the "vows of lovers" are generally expressed with a singular terseness and precision of phrase. The feeling of ease, too, the enjoyment of a common leisure which is almost incidental to such a correspondence, the longing to interest and the certainty that your correspondent is quite disposed to be interested, the consciousness of sympathy on a thousand points, and the wish to be sympathetic on a thousand others, give love-letters a vivacity and interest, a variety of tone, a grace and propriety of phrase, a completeness of form, which few others can rival. But of all kinds of correspondence, love-letters are the most useless for acquiring a knowledge of anything but the writers themselves. The world without lies like a dreamland somewhere over the edge of the letter-paper, and so far as any social revelations are concerned, we look on with perfect equanimity when the brown little bundle over which so many tears and kisses have been shed half-a-century ago finds its way reverently to the fire.

But if the thought of what we have lost in the old-fashioned letter tempts us to look with a little severity on the note, it is at once restored to something like favour when we look on the post-card. The note, if it had passed almost out of the sphere of literature, had still some literary qualities of its own. It lent itself admirably to a certain pungency and wit. Its scope was necessarily short, but many of Voltaire's most charming epistles are not an atom longer. To say a thing briefly, and yet with elegance, was of itself a training in style as it was a training in courtesy. There was still room enough for a story, provided it was a very little one, and the limitation of space sometimes gave an edge to what would otherwise have been a commonplace jest. Even if the graceful but elaborate courtesy of the older letter was inevitably abridged, it was not wholly discarded, and one often admired the art which could turn "Yours sincerely" into a pretty compliment, or throw a dash of sentiment into a "Yours ever." But grace and wit and affection vanish utterly from the post-card. Hurry has to be expressed by what we may call the telegraphic style—a style like Melchisedek, without end or beginning, and which jerks along over the wreck of grammar without the aid of prepositions. The last rag of courtesy is discarded with the last rag of English. There is no room for a story, even if there were time for telling it. A jest on a post-card would simply look out of place. As for any trace of affection, one would as soon expect it on a signpost. The insular reserve which has so long struggled against the traditional necessity of saying that it cared for anybody at the close of a note is able to fall dexterously back on the "publicity" of the new vehicle of communication. It would be "indelicate" and "un-English" to air one's deepest sentiments on a card which lies open to the jibes of a postman or the criticisms of a maid-servant. By the help of this theory we are able to ask our friends to dinner with less ceremony than we use to the footman when we ring for the coals, and to scribble "home early" to a young wife with a greater absence of formality than precedes the friendly nudge which broker bestows on broker at the Stock Exchange. So far as politeness, or even the decencies of social intercourse, are concerned, we stand naked but not ashamed. We have no reason to feel uneasy any longer at the awkwardness of our style, or the difficulty we find in saying a simple thing in simple language. We can bark out our message like a dog, and go contentedly about the City. We can smear contemptuously at an age when people "had time" to write sense and grammar, and jot down the inarticulate utterance of our age of hurry on the British post-card.

PARLIAMENTARY ELOQUENCE.

TO those who remember my first years in Parliament, the difference cannot but appear extreme in point of talent and eloquence. To say nothing of the older names, Lord North,unning, Wedderburne, Barré, there are no more Fox, Pitt, Burke, Windham; and poor Whitbread, with all his coarseness, had an Anglicanism about him that rendered him a valuable ingredient in a British House of Commons." Thus wrote Wilberforce in 1821. English eloquence, he feared, was dying out, and even Whitbread, who has been described as "a rough speaker, who spoke as if he had a pot of porter at his lips, and all his words came through it," was beginning in his eyes to look like a giant among the pigmies of the new generation. Two years later, Mr. Charles Butler, applying the remark of a Roman critic on Cicero and his times, observed that no member of either House of Parliament whom Lord North did not see, or who did not see Lord North, would be ranked among the orators of this country. Mr. Massey suggests that a contemporary of Lord North might perhaps have said the same of Sir Robert Walpole; and a writer in the recent number of the Quarterly Review seems disposed to think that the observation would equally hold good if Lord Palmerston were substituted for North or Walpole. The fact is that, down to the present time, there has been an unflinching succession of speakers who, among their contemporaries at least, have had the reputation of being great orators. They came in clusters, and though there may have been an interval between each, in which the old lights were dying out without apparently new ones appearing to supply their place, yet there has never been an utter blank. Each group of orators has been within sight and hearing of that which preceded it, and some of the older men have always survived long enough to form a connecting link between the old school and the new. It is possible that, from one cause or another, Parliamentary eloquence may now be declining; a process of deterioration may have commenced, of which the result will hereafter be painfully apparent; but for the present, at any rate, we have still amongst us some speakers who will compare not unfavourably with those of any previous generation. The writer in the Quarterly does his best to be hopeful, but perhaps his hopefulness is rather forced. He says he will not despair of the Commonwealth, but he rather hints that he could if he liked, and that it is more politeness than faith that prevents him from doing so. He believes that England is still replete with intellectual life, and there never was a more appreciating public, "so appreciating, indeed, that, in default of real genius, it is often content to put up with the counterfeit article." It may be doubted whether this is the sort of appreciation which is likely to encourage true eloquence; and the writer admits that there are certainly no rising orators in view. Still he is hopeful on principle, and the logic of his article, which is historical, almost forces him to be so. Down to the present time, at least, the succession of orators has never failed, and if it fails now, it will be for the first time. As Wilberforce feared that English oratory was about to fall below the level even of Whitbread, so there may be some middle-aged gentleman of our own day who is miserable in the thought that the next generation of his countrymen will have nothing equal to the "Anglicanism" of Mr. Ayrton. Wilberforce, who does not mention Canning or Brougham, might have taken comfort if he had known that the line of orators would be carried on by Lyndhurst, Peel, Derby, Russell, Ellenborough, Disraeli, Gladstone, and Bright. It is not incredible that any Crabb Robinson who is now at school or college may live to hear speeches quite up to the mark, not only of Mr. Ayrton, but even of Mr. Gladstone.

There is perhaps nothing more difficult than to form a correct idea of the actual force of a speech as it was delivered from reading a report of it. Even if it is a good report, so much must necessarily depend on the voice, gestures, and animation of the speaker, that the bare record of his words conveys at the best a very imperfect conception of the effect of the oration. The speech which reads best in type is not always that which is most effective with an audience, and vigorous intonation and intensity of manner often atone for literary deficiencies. And of course the difficulty of appreciating a speech properly is increased when the report is a bad one. If we were to judge merely by such reports as have come down to us, we should be obliged to place Burke far above Pitt as an orator. We have only loose fragments or bald transcripts of Pitt's speeches, but Burke himself revised his own speeches, and they were published in full. The result, however, of being badly reported is not altogether to the disadvantage of a speaker, since, like the mist on the mountains, it leaves a good deal to the imagination. When we do not know what an orator who was thought to be a great man in his own day really said, we are bound to think that it must have been something very wonderful to produce such an effect, and thus mythical force and power are attributed to him. There is perhaps even greater risk of being misled if we trust too implicitly to the recorded impressions of contemporaries. A speech with which we agree is apt to be thought a much finer speech than one which runs counter to our opinions or sympathies. When Lord Monboddo said that Pitt spoke, Fox barked, and Lord North screamed and groaned, it is not perhaps unreasonable to infer that he preferred Pitt's argument to that of Fox or North. Wilberforce was probably influenced by a similar reason when he declared that Pitt's speech on the Hastings Impeachment question was "astonishing, and the finest he ever delivered." It pleased Burke, too. "Sir," he said, "the right honourable gentleman and I have often been opposed to one another, but his speech to-night has neutralized my opposition; nay, sir, he has dulcified me." If Pitt had not discovered reasons for assenting to the impeachment which he had formerly opposed, perhaps the speech might have been less warmly appreciated. Before attempting to decide whether there has been any falling off in Parliamentary eloquence, it would be well to have some definition of what is meant by eloquence. Is it persuasiveness? Is it to be tested by the applause with which it is received, or by its influence on a division? Fox affected to have a simple theory on the subject. If a speech read well, it was certain, he said, to be a bad speech. What he meant, no doubt, was that the elaborate polishing of a speech so as to make it read smoothly implies premeditation, and is fatal to the glow and spontaneity which are essential to genuine oratory. Pitt used to argue that eloquence was in the audience rather than in the speaker; and Mr. Gladstone has paraphrased the remark in a meteorological metaphor about the orator absorbing in vapour what he pours forth in a flood. We should be disposed to say that eloquence consists in making a highly interesting and impressive statement; but this result may be due sometimes to one cause, sometimes to another, sometimes to a combination of causes, such as the intrinsic interest of the subject, the voice and manner of the speaker, and an opportune sympathy or excitement on the part of the audience. It is obvious that a speech is something very different from a spoken essay, and that sympathy between the speaker and his audience is one of the first conditions of success. It would be premature to say that Parliamentary eloquence is dying out, but there can be no doubt, we think, that, for better or for worse, it is changing its character; and this change is simply due to the fact that the Parliamentary audience is very different now from what it was at the beginning of the present century.

We have only to observe the revolution which has taken place in the character of the House of Commons to understand the different conditions under which debating is now carried on as compared with debating in the pre-Reform period. In the first place, Parliamentary oratory is losing its directness, and with its directness not a little of its personal character. A speaker addresses himself not so much to the benches around him as to the world outside; he has constantly to reflect how his speech will read in the papers, and what will be thought of it by the newspaper critics, and especially by his constituents. On the other hand, members cannot afford to surrender themselves to the spell of eloquence. They have to think of their seats, of the questions that will be asked at the next election, and the reasons they will be able to give for their votes. While a great speech is being delivered they have to keep cool and try to conjecture how it will go down with the country. They are like brokers at market—they have to consult, not their own tastes and feelings, but those of the public. In the old House of Commons the Minister or the leader of the Opposition had to deal with a small knot of influential men who held a certain number of seats, and who voted or gave orders how their nominees should vote as they pleased; and the argumentum ad hominem was proportionately powerful. It was worth while for an orator to exert himself to the utmost to put them into good humour, to tickle them, to rouse them by burning appeals; for their votes would be given according to the mood they were in when the division was called. There was no afterthought on the part either of the speaker or his audience, and they could both give themselves up to the spirit of the hour. The speaker was stimulated by the obvious effect he was producing; the only people he had to concern himself with were those before him, and it was enough if he produced an immediate impression which should settle the impending division. We do not mean to say that speeches have no longer a direct personal effect in the House of Commons, but only that this effect is necessarily much diminished. A speech which is delivered in an earnest, expressive manner will usually be thought to be a more attractive and convincing speech than if it were delivered in a rough, clumsy way, with stammering and stammering. But at the same time, the effect of the personal qualities of oratory, of a good voice, appearance, and manner, must necessarily be greater in the case of an audience which yields to the impulse of the moment than of an audience which has to ask itself what will be thought of the speech by those who read it coldly in the newspapers. It is impossible not to see that the orators of a former day relied to a great extent on the arts, and even tricks, of style and manner which are calculated to produce an immediate effect, especially at a time of excitement, although they will not bear critical reflection. The Reporters' Gallery has been fatal to a certain kind of high-flown, artificial rhetoric. Sheil was called the Keon of oratory, and there is a good deal of Rolla and of both the Surfaces in Sheridan's harangues. Anybody who now attempted to speak as Sheil or Sheridan, or even as Burke sometimes spoke, would be set down as a buffoon. It is not a discouraging symptom that Irish eloquence has apparently had its day. Fifty years ago Sir P. O'Brien and Mr. Butt might have had a better chance of being appreciated. The growing loquacity of the House of Commons is necessarily prejudicial to a high style of speaking; for it establishes a low average of loose, rapid, sloppy talk, to which men who are capable of better things are too often tempted to descend. Formerly a great debate was confined to the chief men who kept each other up to a certain standard of dignity and elevation. It is possible, however, that the excessive talkativeness of the present House of Commons, in becoming intolerable, may help to cure itself. This is perhaps a transition period between the old school of Parliamentary eloquence and a new school which has yet to be created. In becoming more popular, political oratory will certainly be stripped of many of its graces, but it may possibly in the course of time acquire new qualities of a higher order. Henceforth the orator must address himself not to a select circle, but more directly to the people, and it is to be hoped that the demagogues will not have the platform altogether to themselves.

THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS.

IF the inevitable candid stranger were asked to forecast the results of "a statute" defined by its administrators to be "somewhat novel, and undoubtedly very stringent and drastic in its character," and worked by a peer, even the popular Lord Lyttelton, a clergyman, and a lawyer, in a room in Victoria Street, Westminster, according to their own definition, over "a country which was hardly prepared for its reception," and which certainly does not regard it with the same tender partiality as its foster-parents, he would undoubtedly prophesy a row. It is, we think, very much to the credit of the common sense and moderation of the people of England that the row which was inevitable from the operations of the Endowed Schools Commissioners in working, as they themselves boast "strenuously," a statute which they go out of the way to describe by such unpleasant adjectives as "stringent and drastic," in a "hardly prepared" land, should have been of so temperate and constitutional a description. Of the Endowed Schools Act we have always been advocates. There was and is a mass of unemployed educational resource in the country which nothing could have set in motion for the benefit of our under-trained middle classes, except a powerful enabling Act of Parliament, followed by a vigorous executive Commission. But, having said so much, we reserve the full liberty of judging how far that Commission has acted with statesmanlike tact in the discharge of very delicate functions.

It is certainly an a priori suspicious circumstance that before it had run out a third year of existence it should have put itself upon its own trial by issuing a Report so apologetic, if not pathetic, as to amount to nothing less than a "counter case" to a charge of which the world would not have realized the strength had it not been revealed in the laboured apologies of the self-accusing Commission. There is, of course, something rather fine and chivalrous in the manner in which Lord Lyttelton, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Hobhouse throw themselves upon general sympathy with a defence in which a considerable portion of the public will for the first time have learned that they had anything to defend themselves against; but le beau subreux is not the best tactician, and in the very strength of the convictions which their plan reveals, we find reasons to doubt how far their policy was best calculated to grapple with the tangled problems of human feeling and local sentiment with which every day must have brought them in contact.

They were not created to construct, but to adapt and to modify: the field of their exertions was a very old and highly organized country; and the objects on which they were working were an exceedingly varied bundle of benevolent institutions founded by private munificence, deeply stamped with personal, local, and national idiosyncrasies, and doing such good as they effected on their own resources, unsubsidized by rate or tax. The Commissioners were clearly justified in working up to an ideal, but they were nowhere instructed to sacrifice existing facts to the exigencies of ideal symmetry. Every endowment stood on its own merits or demerits. Some were obviously past mending, and could only be merged or transmuted; others were in sore need of extensive repairs; while others only wanted a little paint here and there, and a few broken windows set right. To add to the difficulties of the task, a large proportion of these endowments were not absolutely educational, but were either such in part and in part charitable, or wholly charitable in the essence, while accidentally educational—educational only so far as education was given as one branch of charity. For their guidance the Commissioners had the statute law of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, and the common law of tact, acquaintance with human nature, and the recognition of that characteristic of English self-dependence which substitutes individual munificence for paternal government, and saves free life at the cost of symmetry and an extreme husbanding of resources.

We shall be perfectly fair to the Commission in testing their success upon three points to which they have themselves challenged public attention in their Report. The first affects the constitution of the Governing Bodies of Endowed Schools; the second the quality of the teaching given; and the third the law of apportionment between the educational and charitable objects of mixed endowments. Upon the first of these heads, the question, by their own showing, which confronted the Commission at every turn of their preliminary movements was—

Are we at liberty to remodel the constitution of these Governing Bodies throughout the country on general principles? . . . Or are we bound to look at each one, estimate the actual balance of good and evil which in each such case can, whether in consequence, or in spite, of the actual form of government, be shown to have resulted, and deal with the question of the Governing Body accordingly? Or, to put it more definitely, and in the form which the contention has actually been found to assume, are we to leave a given Governing Body materially unaltered in its composition unless we can establish against it a case of abuse or breach of trust? We have acted on the former view.

That is to say, by inverting the expressions, the Commissioners, finding a large and varied series of highly placed and highly respected, hard working and zealous Trustees—possessing ancient prestige and well-established credit—at work through the country, decided not to look "at each case," not to "estimate the actual balance of good and evil" which the histories of these respective Trusts revealed, and not to deal with the "question" of each Governing Body accordingly; but, on the contrary, to remodel them—good, bad, and indifferent as they might be—out of respect for something called "general principles," of which the Commissioners themselves hold the key. No wonder that these gentlemen, at the conclusion of their Report, are compelled to appeal ad misericordiam to "the difficulties and failures" which they console themselves by declaring to be "the invariable concomitants of either a new law or a new machinery," but which we should rather say were the invariable concomitants of a new law worked ruthlessly by a new machinery acting on the avowed principle of making no distinction in its process of universal upsetting, between the bodies which had fulfilled and those which had neglected their duties. We do not think that they make out half as good a case for themselves as they might have done. They have a precedent directly to the point. In the heyday of the French Revolution there was a Commission actively engaged in redistributing property "throughout the country on general principles." One gentleman protested against their philosophical arrangements with the impertinent remark that it was very hard to take from him a possession which he and his predecessors had enjoyed without question for more than three hundred years; on which the Chief Commissioner very properly silenced him with the remark that he had himself shown that he had had it full long, and the time had come for somebody else to step into its benefits. We must, however, confess that the argument which the Commission puts forward is framed with considerable ingenuity. It appeals with pathos to the "number of irritating and invidious controversies" which would have resulted if the victims of its Jeddah law had been permitted to plead in mitigation of sentence, and it complacently adds, "If such a thing had been intended, the Act would have created a litigious machinery, and not such a constitution as ours;" that is, because they felt themselves too weak to try and to condemn or else acquit, therefore they concluded never to try, to adjure acquittal, and condemn all round. They then proceed to bolster up their pretensions by an argument which we must pronounce to be (unconsciously, of course) neither fair nor generous. They appeal to what they call the "most sweeping powers of the Act," and they assume that those who made those powers—imprimis the Select Committee of the House of Commons—intended that they should be used most sweepingly. "There is not a hint of the powers depending upon any conduct of the parties, and in fact we know that a proposal to introduce such a condition was decisively rejected when the Act was under discussion"; and then they refer, as Lord Ripon did in the House of Lords during the Emanuel Hospital debate, to a certain division in which only two votes were given for a proposition which would certainly have restrained such excess of power, but which that Committee did not think necessary to accept—not because they desired to establish the tyranny, but because, with the assurance of Mr. Forster ringing in their ears that only the bad foundations would have to fear, not the good ones, they believed that such a despotism would be impossible, and they refused to adopt words which sounded like the expression of want of confidence in those upon whose statements they wished to place a generous reliance.

Our next instance shall, as we have said, be drawn from the manner in which the Commissioners have dealt with the curriculum of studies. There is, as is well known, in England a very worthy class of philanthropic talkers—not wholly uncomposed of the tender-hearted parents of sons whose affection for their school books has never been inordinate—who live in the serene conviction that the ingenious minds which never could be warmed up to master the difficulties antecedent to an enjoyment of Homer, Æschylus, or Aristophanes, might have been converted into ascetic devotees of the midnight lamp by a judicious course of training in the genesis of gases. Out of regard to these excellent persons, the "sweeping powers" of the Commission were brought down upon Greek, the teaching whereof was hereafter to be, in what are termed "second grade" schools, an offence which, could the principles of the Ballot Bill be applied to Endowed Schools, would doubtless have been visited by two years' hard labour. Pity the sorrows of the good Commissioners; they expected that when Commission met Greek then would come the tug of victory. Instead of this—

The fact is that we have often found among the communities to whom our schemes have been made known a considerable amount of active feeling on this point, while those persons to whom it was supposed that classical studies made the school useless, and whom the change was intended to benefit, have not hesitated themselves to support a change.

They buckled themselves up to make one, and one only, public inquiry into the matter, and the place which they chose was Bedford, the borough of which the representation is divided between the very parent and guardian of the Act, Mr. Forster himself, and that damaged of disestablishment, the once Rev. Mr. Miall:—

The inquiry was held; a great number of persons were examined by the Assistant Commissioner, and they nearly all expressed a strong desire that Greek should be prominently taught in the school; and moreover professed to believe [why not believe?] that there would be a considerable demand for such teaching in Bradford. They did not seem to be conscious [why should they?] that the position they demand for the study of Greek was in any way inconsistent with ample provision for modern and scientific studies. The persons belonged to all sections of the middle class.

Of course the Commission "cannot help suspecting" all manner of stupidity and prejudice on the part of these sturdy citizens of Bradford. But the fact remains. After noting this thorough discomfiture on their own chosen battlefield, it is almost an anti-climax to allow that their anti-Greek ukase, after attaining a certain success at Cambridge, was on second thoughts laid aside, that it was civilly bowed out at Oxford, and peremptorily extinguished by the University of London.

The Commission has naturally found its path most thorny when engaged in remodelling charitable institutions which were founded partly to give education and partly to give material aid. We have neither time nor inclination now to argue the question which the world will, we believe, be found arguing when the day of judgment arrives, as to the limits at which such eleemosynary gifts are helpful and beyond which they are baleful. It is sufficient now to say that the Endowed Schools Act took a very rough and ready way of contributing to the controversy by extending the power of a Commission which upon its own showing is too weak to judge whether a body of trustees has performed or neglected its trust, to the transference of such eleemosynary foundations, when tied up with schools, to scholastic purposes. This very Napoleonic procedure was effected by the first paragraph of the twenty-ninth section:—

For the purposes of this Act endowments attached to any school for the payment of apprenticeship fees, or for the advancement in life, or for the maintenance or clothing, or otherwise for the benefit of children educated at such school, shall be deemed to be an educational endowment.

These words establish an abstract and extreme right; but an abstract and very extreme right, thus suddenly and incidentally created and placed in the hands of a Commission whose own character of itself we have already recited, was plainly an anomaly, unless it were to be guarded by some constitutional provision in the interest of the imperilled charities. This provision occurs in the second paragraph of the section:—

Provided that nothing shall be construed to prevent a scheme relating to such endowment from providing, if the Governing Body so desire, for the continued application of such endowment to the same purposes.

We pause for one moment to ask what, not in the eyes of an acute lawyer, or of an inflexible theorist, but of a man of sense and human knowledge, would be the interpretation of this limiting provision appended to an enactment of unknown stringency, left to be applied by an untried and restricted body to the subversion of many widespread organizations of charity over the land? We pass on to the gloss of the Commissioners, never forgetting the appraisement which they have offered of their own judicial capacity. "But the proviso adds that the previous application may be continued by the scheme, with the consent of the Governing Body. It has been contended by some bodies of Trustees that this means that such application shall be continued by the scheme, if the Governing Body insist upon it. We have no doubt that this is an error." . . . "But the proviso assumes that there may be cases in which, in the judgment both of the Commissioners and of the Trustees, the existing application of endowments to maintenance had better not be discontinued, though not best for education" (education not having been the original purpose to which that foundation had been dedicated). "In such cases it permits the continuance, but neither Commissioners nor Trustees can insist upon it without each other's concurrence"—i.e. if the Commissioners please to overrule it, the Trustees will be powerless; if the Trustees desire to keep it, the Commissioners may overrule them.

The Commissioners' rough justice in all these cases may have been right or wrong, but they must be far more versed in the ways of Laputa than of England if they are in any way astonished at the "difficulties and failures" engendered by their arbitrary policy.

We have not touched upon the more familiar pitfalls spread before the Commissioners, such as the religious difficulty, the girls' difficulty, the women's difficulty, the competition difficulty, and the free-schooling difficulty—points on which the Illustrated is eloquent—for our object is not to discuss the scheme of that body as a whole. We have only dealt with points which are of the nature of those brick walls which Whigs are said to build to knock their own heads against. They have owned to failure and disappointment, and we have endeavoured to point out for their future guidance the reasons of their discomfiture.

We could go on to multiply quotations culled out of the Report, but we trust that we have said enough to show that into all the good intentions of the Commissioners is infused the dangerous element of too much zeal, and that the resistance which their operations has provoked through the country may not be wholly attributable to a blind and selfish attachment to the material benefits of vested interests. In the meantime we must remind the Commissioners how Cyrus in his ingenuous nonage came to considerable grief for insisting upon an exchange between the little boy who liked his big coat and the big boy who liked his little coat. When all our towns are built in parallelograms, when all our fields are lotted in rectangles, and all our houses constructed by official surveyors on a Parliamentary plan, we shall believe that the time has come for all benefactors to model their foundations on one symmetrical scheme. The Commissioners, we quite admit, do not think of proposing anything so preposterous, but there is enough in their way of dealing with questions to drive the persons who dread so disastrous a consummation into the opposite blunder of defending anomaly and uselessness as the bulwarks of variety and local independence.

FOOLS OF COMEDY AND FARCE.

THE stage will never want Marplots to illustrate the Fate of fools officious in contriving,
In executing puzzled, lame, and lost;

but they can scarcely afford unmixed entertainment. Our apprehensions are never so entirely laid to sleep even in comedy that we can serenely relish a fool's meddling in the interests we side with. Hence the fool who plays his own game and hurts nobody but himself is the favourite; the fool who is vain, busy, and silly on his own account, and assumes himself to be the principal figure in every turn of affairs; who will break in upon the astrologer's latest intelligence from the Zodiac as though it must needs relate exclusively to his affairs; and, hearing that Mars is in the ascendant, puts in the inquiry, "Pray is not Mars very like a young fellow called Tom Tinsel?"

The Fop was a speciality of genteel comedy, and needed something besides native wit for his proper elaboration either by writer or actor. To do him justice, some familiarity with the manners of high life was indispensable. Congreve, we know, valued himself much more on being a fine gentleman than on being a wit, and he certainly knew what he was about when he caricatured the polite affectations of his day. But the same degree of experience was not needed for fools out of the magic circle, for the shams and would-be's, awkward imitators of their foolish betters; still less for the infinite varieties of folly which people the modern stage. Pope, the friend of Congreve, called Farquhar a writer of farces, mainly we surmise, from the quality of his fools, who needed some extravagances of plot for their fitting development. Farquhar could have seen little of high life, and he knew fine gentlemen as negligent patrons, not as equals. He has to trust imagination rather than close observation for his manners; his fools are fools simple with out the varnish of elegant foppery. Possibly his fancy played all the more freely for wanting this knowledge. All the points of nature's fool are conspicuous in the brothers Clinker. The situations may be farcical, but they are excellently adapted for the exhibition of the great leading characteristics of the order—credulity, conceit, forwardness, imprudence to any deep impression, incapacity to take in the bearing of any case, or to see the relation of cause and effect, and that particular exaltation and inflation which constitutes the faculty of fools. The pair, however, represent these qualities in different proportions. Bean Clinker is self-reliant and inventive, his brother is more absolutely guided by circumstances and example. No trait could show more insight and appreciation than the elder brother's preparations for his voyage to the Jubilee; for the fool, great in nostrums, is never more confident in himself than in providing against untried dangers. Take that swimming girdle, for example, on which the Bean relies with such confidence:—

Suppose the ship cast away; now, whilst other foolish people are busy at their projects, I whip on my swimming-girdle, clap a month's provision in my pocket, and sail me away, like an egg in a duck's belly.

Then for credulity. He admires the tie of Sir Harry's cravat, and detects in it an air of travel. "There is indeed, sir—I suppose, sir, you bought this lace in Flanders?" "No, sir, this lace was made in Norway." "Norway, sir?" "Yes, sir, of the shavings of deal boards." Clinker thinks this very surprising, but resolves to have a cravat of the very same lace before he comes home. He gets involved in the action of the piece, and is extremely delighted with the sense of intrigue involved in exchanging clothes with Tom Errand, the porter:—"Intrigue is the prettiest, cleverest thing for a man of my parts." But presently the porter's wife, mis-ling her husband, and seeing the bean in her husband's clothes, jumps to the conclusion that he has murdered him. His resource fails him utterly in the emergency:—

WIFE. Oh, Mr. Constable, here's a rogue has murdered my husband and robbed him of his clothes!

CONSTABLE. Murder! robbery! Then he must be a gentleman. Han's of there! he must not be abused. Give an account of yourself. Are you a gentleman?

CLINKER, SEN. No, sir, I'm a beau.

CONSTABLE. A beau! Then you have killed nobody, I'm persuaded. How came you by these clothes, sir?

CLINKER, SEN. You must know, sir, that walking along, sir—I don't know how, sir—I can't tell where, sir—and so the porter and I changed clothes, sir.

The constable thinks he speaks reason; but the wife prevails, and the bean is lodged in Newgate, where the gallows, an institution immediately behind the scenes of the English classical drama, stands greedily expectant. The younger Clinker, who came on the scene simultaneously with his elder brother, appears first as something of a prig, impressing the ladies with his serious air. He is stocked at the beau's finery, saying very properly:—

"I thought, brother, you owed so much to the memory of your father as to wear mourning for his death":—

CLINKER, SEN. Why so I do, fool; I wear this because I have the estate; you wear that because you have not the estate; you have cause to mourn indeed, brother. Well, brother, I am glad to see you; fare you well!

But in course of time Tom Errand appears before the junior Clinker and his man Dick, dressed in the beau's fine clothes. The natural surmise again is that he can have become possessed of them only in one way. He endeavours to explain, but Dick will not hear of it. "No, no; the rogue has murdered your brother and stripped him of his clothes." At the mere suggestion all his good dispositions are laid aside:—

CLINKER, JUN. Murdered my brother! oh, crimini! oh, my poor Jubilee brother! Stay, by Jupiter Ammon, I'm here though. Speak, sir; have you killed him? confess that you have killed him, and I'll give you half-a-crown.

ERRAND. Who? I, sir? alack-a-day, sir, I never killed any man but a carrier's horse once.

The junior, however, insists on confession as the condition of escape and safety, and Errand, reflecting on the immediate convenience and profit of a lie, and that at worst he can but deny it again, owns to the deed. The lie once spoken, the faculty of invention, never wholly wanting in him, asserts itself, and his awakened fancy adorns the lie with circumstance:—

CLINKER, JUN. Here's your money, sir; but are you sure you killed him dead?

ERRAND. Sir, I'll swear it before any judge in England.

DICK. But are you sure that he's dead in law?

ERRAND. Dead in law? I can't tell whether he be dead in law, but he's as dead as a door-nail; for I gave him seven knocks on the head with a hammer.

Clinker instantly insists on donning his brother's suit, crying, "Now I'm in mourning for my brother," declares that he will go to the Jubilee, and carries off Errand to make the necessary depositions. This simile of the door-nail carries with it a conviction that may be paralleled by each reader's private experience of fools. For when the beau, deprived of both his suits, comes upon the stage in a blanket at the moment when his junior is announcing to a party of ladies, with all the details of nail and hammer, how he has become heir and is bound for the Jubilee, he has no notion of giving in:—

CLINKER, SEN. Must you go, rogue? must ye? you will go to the Jubilee, will you?

CLINKER, JUN. A ghost, a ghost! Send for the Dean and Chapter presently!

CLINKER, SEN. A ghost! no, no, sirrah; I'm an elder brother, rogue.

CLINKER, JUN. I don't care a farthing for that; I'm sure you're dead in law.

CLINKER, SEN. Why so, sirrah, why so?

CLINKER, JUN. Because, sir, I can get a fellow to swear he knocked out your brains.

It is, in truth, a distinguishing mark of a fool to be unable to take in the most obvious fact to his disadvantage, though the same peculiarity may be met with elsewhere. The brothers Clinker at the end of the play are bid, "Get you to your native plough and cart, converse with animals like yourselves; men are creatures you don't understand"; but, in fact, they would be very much out of place among the "sheep and oxen" they are dismissed to, and by no means represent the rustic lout so dear to comedy; their sprightliness preserves them from this, in the eyes of wit, supreme degradation.

There is no point of national manners on which the drama throws more light than in its delineation of country-bred fools. The dolt of good pedigree and ample fortune, who makes so conspicuous a figure on the eighteenth-century stage when he intrudes upon the town his ungainly bulk and strength, clumsy antics, and obsolete fashions, would be resented in our day as a coarse impossibility; but at his broadest he was never then taken to exceed the just limits of caricature. Steele has given us a specimen of the true country bumpkin of his own date in Humphrey Gubbins, a fellow six feet high, and shoulders of the broadest, boasting that his brains are strong, not in acquiring, but in resisting knowledge—still kept in order by his father's crab-stick, and now brought up to London to marry his cousin against his will. In the Park he is first enlightened on his own rights, being met, as if by accident, by a designing attorney, who can tell him he is master of an entailed estate of fifteen hundred a year:—

HUMPHREY. I am glad to hear it with all my heart; and can you satisfy me in another question—pray how old am I at present?

POUNCE. Three-and-twenty last March.

HUMPHREY. Why, as sure as you are there, they have kept me back. I have been told by some of the neighbourhood that I was born the very year the pigeon-house was built, and everybody knows the pigeon-house is three-and-twenty. Why I find there has been tricks played me. I have obeyed him all along as if I had been obliged to it.

POUNCE. Not at all, sir. Your father can't cut you out of one acre; and a man of your beauty and fortune may find out ladies enough that are not of kin to you.

HUMPHREY. Look ye, Mr. What-d'ye-call-um. As to my beauty, I don't know but they may take a liking to that. But, sir, mayn't I crave your name?

POUNCE. My name is Pounce, at your service.

HUMPHREY. Pounce with a P?

POUNCE. Yes, sir, and Samuel with an S.

The family of the Wrongheads, in the Provoked Husband, are fools of the same feather; quite as bad as their town-bred betters, and doubly fools by nature and inexperience, though not without a certain cunning, half akin to cleverness. They come up in a body from Yorkshire in the family coach—the lady sticking for six horses, which are not at all too many to drag them through the rate—to make their fortunes in London. Sir Francis, the baronet, triumphant after a successful election contest, has designs for a place at Court; the oaf of a son comes to amuse himself; the mother expects to shine a star in high life, and the daughter to marry a nobleman. Sir Francis expects to make a figure in the House, and reveals his expectations to his friend Manly:—

SIR FRANCIS. Why, ay! there's it now! you'll say that I have lived all my days in the country—what then?—I'm 'f' the quorum. I have been at Sessions, and I have made speeches there! ay, and at vestry too; and mayhap they may find here that I have brought my tongue up to town with me! D'ye take me now?

Manly endeavours to moderate these expectations, and reminds him that a petition is lodged against him by Sir John Worthland, but Sir Francis treats this with aly contempt:—"Why, you forget, cousin, that Sir John's o' the wrong side." He settles the question by arguing that it is his duty to repair his fortune by some great stroke. Nothing can really exaggerate the expectations of a fool in an untried position, or caricature his sense of capacity and fitness for any service. Sir Francis argues quite justly that the "Wrongheads have been a considerable family since England was Eng-land," and speaks in the tone of them all. In this spirit he reports progress. He has introduced himself at the levée of the man in power, and is much elated by the civility with which he was received. "'Sir Francis,' says he, 'have you any service to command me?' Now, cousin, those last words, you may be sure, gave me no small encouragement." In fact, he is encouraged so far as to hint that, his estate being a little out at elbows, he is anxious to serve his King and country, and should be very willing to accept a place at Court. The great man's courtesy suffers no abatement; he desires to know what sort of a place the Baronet has turned his mind upon, who replies that beggars must not be choosers, and that "any place about a thousand a year 'ould be well enough to be going on with." "Well," says Manly, "what did my lord say to this?"

"Sir Francis," says he, "I shall be glad to serve you any way that lies in my power;" so he gave me a squeeze by the hand, as much as to say, give yourself no trouble—I'll do your business; with that he turned him about to somebody with a coloured ribbon across here, that looked to my thoughts as if he came for a place too.

The interview ends by the confession of a blunder. There had been a debate in the House, and the speakers on both sides were so long-winded "that when they came to put the question as they call it, I don't know how 'twas, but I doubt I cried Ay! when I should ha' cried No!"—this contretemps being due to the blandishments of a certain Mr. Totherside, "who would be proud to make acquaintance with him," and takes him by the sleeve along with the crowd into the lobby:—

So I knew nought—but old-flesh! I was got o' the wrong side the post; for I were told afterwards I should have staid where I was.

The pert and awkward Miss Jenny represents folly in its youthful confidence and exaltation. Of course she is to marry a lord. As she imagines herself led in triumph to her chair, her vision turns as we read into a record of past airs and vanities. The picture is a vivid one:—

To have a gentleman with a star and what d'ye-call-um ribbon lead me to my chair, with his hat under his arm all the way! "Hold up," says the chairman; and so, says I, "My lord, your humble servant." "I suppose, madam," says he, "we shall see you at my Lady Quadrille's?" "Ay, ay, to be sure, my lord," says I. So in swops me, with my hoop stuffed up to my forehead; and away they trot, swing swang, with my tassels dangling, and my flambeaux blazing, and—oh! it's a charming thing to be a woman of quality!

In one respect ideas have changed upon our subject. In the comedies and farces of a hundred or a hundred and fifty years ago everybody was thought a fool who did not mind his own business—his business meaning his strictly private business—unless he was a great man, one of the privileged circle. Out of this circle politician and fool were convertible terms, amateur soldier and even virtuous admitting of no other classification. The man was ridiculous who cared about butterflies and beetles, or who would have been "glad to see a live crocodile." Major Sturgeon reposing on his laurels furnishes the best sport in the world as he relates his own labours and successes:—"Why, after my first campaign I no more minded the noise of the guns than a flea-bite"; or expatiates on the fatigues of actual service—"such marchings and countermarchings! from Brentford to Ealing, from Ealing to Acton, from Acton to Uxbridge; the dust flying, sun scorching, men sweating"; or describes the melancholy fate of the brave commander, Major Molasses, who would not take advice and pull off his spurs before going into action, and who adds his own share to the disasters of the day:—

MAJOR. Indeed, it was an unfortunate day for us all.

SIR JACOB. As how?

MAJOR. Why, as Captain Cucumber, Lieutenant Pattypan, Esq. Tripe, and myself were returning to town in the Turnham Green stage, we were stopped near the Hammermith turnpike, and robbed and stripped by a footpad.

Foots would hardly have ventured on this broad ridicule in our day, nor probably could Murphy have reckoned enough on the general sympathy to have drawn his Upholsterer—the fool who left his business to take care of itself while he occupied himself with the nation's politics, and, in a soliloquy that recalls the maledictio imaginaria adding up the items of the doctor's bill, calculates how to raise the supplies for the year, while the balliffs are at his own door. This unspeakable absorption really angusts Quidnunc by a broad gulf from the fool proper. He and his friend Roger, who has not made a wig for a year—"for I can't gi' my mind to anything for thinking of my country"—and who "can't sleep in his bed for thinking what will become of the Protestants if the Papists should get the better in the war"—are true patriots. Quidnunc refuses a match for his daughter on high grounds:—"I will never give my daughter to a man who has not better notions of the balance of power"; and he can lose the sense of private failure in the knowledge that "India bonds are risen three-sixteenths, which will make some amends for the price of corn." His daughter comes in upon him when he is planning repairs for the careening wharfs at Gibraltar:—

QUIDNUNC. It is one comfort, however, they can always have fresh provisions in the Mediterranean.

HARRIET. Dear papa, what's the Mediterranean to people in our situation?

QUIDNUNC. The Mediterranean, child? Why, if we lose the Mediterranean we're all undone.

HARRIET. Dear sir, that's our misfortune—we're undone already.

QUIDNUNC. No, no—here, here, child—I have raised the supplies within the year.

This daughter asks if he wants to make her a politician. As a crowning imbecility he is made to reply:—"It would be the pride of my heart to find I had got a politician in petticoats." The force of folly could no further go in those days; but we have changed all that now. We have no space for the excellent scene where poor old Feeble, Harriet's rich uncle, is roused out of his bed at midnight to hear the latest news of the Gazette—how that the Superintendent of Indian affairs has settled matters with the Cherokees—the Emperor of Morocco is dead—the new Nabob, Jaffier Ally Cawn, has acceded to the treaty; finally insisting on his opinion as to the balance of power. The helpless disgust of the poor invalid as he puts away from him every fresh article of intelligence, and the brisk unconsciousness of the newsmonger that he can impart anything but pleasure, are in the best vein of broad comedy.

VESUVIUS.

IF the inhabitants of Naples and its neighbourhood are more superstitious than other people, we can scarcely wonder at it. They dwell among the living evidences of those volcanic forces which burst out from time to time into calamitous activity. It is not only those whose homes stand on the very slopes of the burning mountain who must be oppressed by the sense of insecurity, although it is they who receive the most terrible reminders of the perils that perpetually menace them. The capital itself is built upon a tract of fire that girdles it with visible signs of danger. Even when everything is comparatively tranquil, the Neapolitans can always see from the Chiaja and the Moles the light puffs of smoke floating over the cone of Vesuvius against the pure blue of the sky. They have only to go on the other side as far as the Solfatara to breathe the gases that escape through the cracks in the thin crust which arches over the great subterranean fires. Fortunately the crust is somewhat thicker where Naples stands; yet every now and then even Naples throbs to earthquake shocks that suggest terrible possibilities. The traces of nature's violence attract tourists to Naples almost as much as the charms of the scenery. Here Herculaneum lies under its masses of tufa, and the moderns have built another city on the ancient one. There Pompeii is laboriously emerging from its bed of ashes. Everywhere broad lava streams seam the rich landscape: the older ones thinly covered with the precarious vegetation which struggles to root itself in slowly accumulating soil, the later showing in all their natural deformity. They tell how in the lapse of the last two hundred years the mountain has been more disastrously active than before, although there has been no such calamity as that of A.D. 79. But who can say how soon what has happened once may not happen again, and with circumstances yet more aggravated? The Neapolitans are not very searching students of scientific phenomena, and perhaps they never fully realize the advantages of the perpetual safety-valve which they have in their open mountain. As for the inhabitants of the long and crowded suburb stretching from Portici to Torre del Annunziata, by Resina and Torre del Greco, the existence of this safety-valve threatens a perpetual danger. They are a light-hearted race enough, as they need to be; they are content to live in the passing day, and take little thought for the morrow. But the greater their habitual heedlessness, the heavier are the shocks which from time to time awaken them from it. When Vesuvius bursts out in smoke and flame and burning lava floods, there is everything in the spectacle to speak home to their alarmed senses. Their priests scarcely need to raise their voices to point the moral. The people turn emulously to the neglected Saints, crowd to the shrines which they generally leave to their women, and pray and vow till their much crying seems at last to move the saintly intercession. The calamity is stayed when it has run its appointed course. The victims humbly acknowledge the penalty of their sins; those who are spared are full of fervent gratitude for a miraculous deliverance. The reputation of St. Januarius stands higher than ever, and the liquefaction of his precious blood is watched for with new ardour on the next anniversary of the miracle.

The most significant feature of the present eruption is one which may well cause the Neapolitans more anxiety than ever. All previous eruptions have been from the cone at the summit, and the summit of the mountain is at a tolerably safe distance from Naples. But this time Vesuvius has imitated the caprices of its great Sicilian rival, and opened a new crater somewhere on the depression by the Observatory. This would seem to imply that a serious obstruction has choked the old safety-valve, and if once convulsion changes the subterranean physical geography of the mountain, it opens alarming possibilities. To be sure, this new outlet is not very far removed from the former one; but the experiences of Etna are far from reassuring as to the future, and for aught we can see the next outbreak may be anywhere in the volcanic district. The mountain must have shown itself extraordinarily active on this occasion, if it be true that the ashes lay an inch deep in the streets of Naples and had actually reached Palermo. The explosion appears to have been preceded by no premonitory warnings, although, indeed, whether forewarned or not, such catastrophes must always partake of the nature of surprises. A sacrifice of life is as inevitable as a grievous destruction of property. Every foot of soil on the mountain slopes is precious, and cultivation fights its way upwards almost beyond the limits of the profitable. The painstaking peasant scrapes together the earth and the crumbling lava, drags up his heavy baskets of manure, forms his vineyards or his garden among the shelves and ledges of the rock, and perches in the midst of them his little white-plastered dwelling. Lower down, but still on the steep slopes, these dwellings become thicker; then you have the small villages with their white church towers; after them the larger ones, and finally, through labyrinths of paths among the walled enclosures, you arrive at the crowded street that skirts the bay. The eruption breaks out of a sudden, and those who live highest on the mountain waken to find themselves among showers of falling scoriam. Before the first shock of panic-stricken stupefaction is over, the great rush of the lava torrent is upon them. Its first velocity as it rolls down the steep from the precipices above imports certain destruction to any living thing that finds itself in its way; but as the slope becomes more gentle, the advance of the lava becomes slower, and then, in the suspense of horrible anticipation, we have perhaps the worst horrors of the fearful drama. As the lava rolls down, it fills depressions, turns itself against every trilling inequality of the ground, and seems to hesitate over the course it shall take. The people cling pertinaciously to their dwellings, hoping against hope that this or that familiar promontory may act as a breakwater. For, after all, though life is most to them, property is much; and if they do decide to go, it is not only to the mercy of the lava that they leave everything they have in the world. All the criminal scum of the neighbourhood is at hand, ready at the risk of life to profit by the harvest of misfortune, and pillage generally is going busily forward. Even were the Neapolitan police more efficient and trustworthy than it is, what would its force avail to protect from marauders all these scattered villages? The flights which families have delayed to the last moment, with their sinister surroundings, would make so many studies for a Doré. The whole moving side of the mountain looks like an ant-heap suddenly disturbed. The impressionable and demonstrative people lose their heads, as men of more phlegmatic temperaments might easily do in circumstances much less appalling. When every one is in alarm for himself or his own property, no one can do much to help his neighbour. Besides, no one can ever tell that he or his are secure. You can see the course that this particular flood of lava is taking, but a fresh explosion may come at any moment, to send another in some different direction.

We have seen something and heard more of the circumstances attending previous eruptions, and this one appears to be at least as serious as any that has occurred in our time. The new Government has had a great opportunity of winning golden opinions from its Neapolitan subjects, and it would seem to have been equal to the occasion. We read of the King having stationed himself at the point of danger when the disaster was at its worst, and it is precisely under such circumstances that Victor Emmanuel shows to the best advantage. Public pageants are utterly repugnant to him, Court ceremonies weary him to death, and even in most of his foibles his character has little in sympathy with that of his soft Campanian subjects. But the excitement of danger is a real enjoyment to him. The Neapolitans perhaps admire courage and coolness all the more because their own reputation for these qualities does not stand extraordinarily high; and assuredly the unfortunate dwellers by Vesuvius, who always combine mendicancy with exertion, are the very people to appreciate generosity. We hope we may hear that the King's example has been imitated by Neapolitans of the upper classes, and by those wealthy visitors who either chanced to be at Naples, or who hurried thither to witness the spectacle. We can picture the scenes that will take place nightly on the mountain when the first panic has passed. The stream of fire by night, the pillar of smoky cloud as seen from the Chiaja by day, will advertise the entertainment and make it the fashion. The gay world of Naples will exchange the day promenade for a night one, the Villa Reale for "a ladies' mile" by the side of the red lava flow. There will be swarms of attendant guides, ready to hire out their tattered arms and dirty hands to the daintily shod dames and dandies who will go hopping about on the skirts of the hot surface. There will be crowds of professional beggars gathered from Naples and all the villages that have not suffered. The beggars' chances may be the better because among them may be some of those unhappy sufferers who have just been ruined, and who will blend their notes of genuine pathos with the general chorus of whining appeals. We have nothing to say against strangers making parties for a close inspection of a terrible phenomenon, or for the admiration of nature in one of her grandest moods. We make no doubt that the most volatile of them may carry away impressions which it would be a pity to have missed. We only trust that they may not be so absorbed by the picturesque side of the spectacle as to forget altogether the sad reality. To say nothing of calcined bones and charred roof-trees, the lava flows over vineyards and gardens which only the other day were flourishing in the full promise of the spring. Doubtless, should their late proprietors have survived, they are looking on with the pleasure seekers from Naples, and with feelings of at least equal interest, although they may regard the sight from a totally different point of view. The inhabitants of that perilous strip of country lying between the fire and the water should know by now what they must expect periodically. But races once planted firmly are slow to leave their ancestral homes, despite all the drawbacks to their comfort for which strangers pity them. We can hardly blame these Campanians for not deserting their paradise because it is not altogether exempted from the primeval curse. So long as Vesuvius grows the most delicate wines of Naples, so long we may expect that vinedressers will defy the volcano. And as these recurring disasters are inevitable, the only thing to be done is to help the people to tide them over when they do come.

COLE C.B. "AT HOME."

COLE C.B. may not know much about art, but it cannot be denied that he is a proficient in the study of human nature. He is well acquainted with all its little weaknesses, susceptibilities, and soft places, and nobody knows better how to make the most of them. Novelists sometimes talk of the characters in their books as their puppets, but the inventor of South Kensington has been fortunate enough to find his puppets in real life, and in the highest circles. Apparently he has only to pull the string, and they dance to any tune he likes. It has been said that great people, living in a comparatively narrow, and to some extent artificial, world of their own, are of a simple nature, and are easily got at by persons who choose to approach them in a certain way; and Mr. Cole's experience would perhaps confirm this view. When Mr. Crumple's found his audiences declining, and thought it necessary to give a filip to public curiosity, he fell back upon the Phenomenon; but we think it is hinted that he did it rather too often, and that after a time the Phenomenon, notwithstanding the big letters in the bills, ceased to draw. Mr. Cole, when he wants to make a sensation, is in the habit of bringing Royalty to the front. The thousand additional lamps which were supposed to mark the special festivals at Vauxhall are represented at South Kensington by a familiar constellation of princes of the blood. It may be doubted whether this kind of exhibition is altogether calculated to uphold the dignity of the Crown; but there can be no doubt that it has hitherto answered the purpose of the lucky farringer who has been enabled to number it among his stock attractions. The presence of Royalty necessarily implies a certain amount of official attendance; the fashionable world is also bound to be represented on such an occasion; and the general public is proud to have the opportunity of mixing with such fine company at a moderate cost. One of Mr. Cole's most subtle and successful strokes has been the issue of official invitations. The Chairman of the Local Board of Little Peddington fully appreciates the delicate attention of being included in the official circle along with the Commander-in-Chief, the Lord Chancellor, and the Cabinet. Local self-government is always largely represented at Mr. Cole's gatherings. Nothing pays better than a little cheap civility to the provinces. Those who have observed how great men are apt to be lost in the crowd of the metropolis might perhaps imagine that happier was the lot of local "personages" who are so well known, and who strut about so boldly and unmistakably in their own neighbourhoods. The constable, the letter-carrier, and the bellman are always on the look out for them, and ready to uncover. The townsfolk take a pride in them, and point them out to strangers. In London you may see the Prime Minister walking down Regent Street in the thick of the afternoon, and apparently not a soul knows him or takes any notice of him. If he were a Mayor, or a Town-clerk, or Local Board person on his own ground, he would be greeted at every step. A little acquaintance, however, with provincial life discloses the fact that local dignitaries are more or less silently pining for wider recognition. Blest as they may seem, like Rascals in his Happy Valley, they have heard, like Rascals, of a world beyond, and are consumed with an agony of desire to make a figure in it. It is easy to conceive the thrill of satisfaction with which people of this sort receive the broad card with the South Kensington seal. They feel that the eyes of England are upon them, that they are really part and parcel of the Constitution, and that the glory and prosperity of the Empire depends upon the intimate fraternity of Crown, Lords, Commons, Local Boards, and Police Committees. You may be sure they lose no time in packing up their cocked hats and furred gowns; and thus there is always plenty of local colour at Mr. Cole's parties, and what is more, the South Kensington vote, though it swells every year, excites no jealousy in the country.

In the absence of the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh favoured Mr. Cole with what in another sphere is called a "friendly lead," at the opening of the annual International Exhibition on Saturday last. The entertainment was described in the programme as an "Official Reception, Private View, and Performance of Vocal and Instrumental Music." There was, we believe, some kind of concert in the Albert Hall after most of the people had quitted it. The "Private View" was a public crush in which it was impossible to see anything, and as for the Reception, it would be difficult to say whether the Duke received the company, or the company the Duke, or in what the ceremony consisted. The invitations were issued in the name of the Duke of Edinburgh, and from remarks that reached our ears we rather fancy that some of the provincial guests had come expecting a personal introduction to his Royal Highness, and perhaps a good gossip with him about the Galatea and his travels, and that historic pipe which he smoked on the carcass of his first elephant. In point of fact, what happened was simply this—that about 9 o'clock the Duke, with Princess Louise and a distinguished following, entered the Albert Hall, and were critically inspected by the invited guests in the arena for about ten minutes; and that afterwards the Royal party, in charge of Mr. Cole, were marched off for exhibition to the crowds who thronged the picture galleries. They had a good deal of ground to go over, and the ordeal was far from a pleasant one, and it is not surprising that their Royal Highnesses hurried over it as fast as possible. They made no attempt to look at anything, and were no doubt quite aware that they were themselves the show. As a bait, invitations to the Reception had been promised to purchasers of season tickets; and it is probable that this exhibition of the Duke and Princess sold a good many tickets. The rule which forbids the criticism of a gift is not supposed to apply to things that are paid for; and accordingly some of the people who had bought tickets for the sake of having a good look at Royalty thought themselves entitled to complain that the Duke produced for their inspection was in plain dress and not in uniform, and that he was not so tall as they had expected from seeing his photograph; nor did the toilet of the Princess escape equally candid comments which were made almost in her hearing. It may be doubted whether it is fitting that the personal appearance of the Royal Family should be exposed to discontented criticism by being made a matter of commercial speculation. A writer in one of the papers, looking round upon the crowded tiers of the Albert Hall, and up towards "the great spread" of the Velarium, was reminded of "the aspect of the Coliseum when all was ready for the show and the lions were about to be let loose into the arena." Mr. Cole's "lions" were such as might safely be trusted among ladies; but gross and wanton mismanagement converted a part of the galleries at one period of the evening into a disgraceful and even dangerous bear-garden. The crowd, left absolutely without guidance, broke up into opposing currents; some wanted to go forwards, others to go back; while one set of people were trying to get downstairs, another set were pushing up. After a time it was impossible to move in any direction, and the pressure of the crowd, continually increasing, became intolerable. The people behind, irritated by the supposition that those in front were blocking the way in order to look at tempting works of art, or, as one rumour had it, to drink tea, grew impatient and aggressive. Some of the season-tickets seem to have got into strange hands, and rough words and rowdy elbowing were added to the amenities of the scene. If a constable, in a moment of inspiration, had not unlocked a side-door and relieved the congestion of the crowd at its worst point, serious consequences would certainly have ensued. As it was, many ladies suffered severely; bracelets were torn from their arms in the crush, their dresses were rent, and probably some of them have hardly yet recovered from the cruel usage to which they were physically as well as morally subjected, through the wanton and inexcusable neglect of the simplest precautions against overcrowding.

Mr. Cole, when examined the other day in regard to the embezzlement of some nine thousand pounds from the South Kensington funds, observed oracularly that perfection is one thing, and what is practicable in this world is another thing. Even Mr. Cole, we imagine, will hardly venture to say that the arrangements on Saturday night were either perfection, or the best practicable in this world. The guests who were invited to what was supposed to be a private view found themselves swamped by the promiscuous public who had been tempted by the promise of a show of "personages" to buy season-tickets, or who had in one way or another (for very odd-looking people had got admission, and country mayors were not unnaturally nervous about their chains when they looked at some of their neighbours), contrived to beg or borrow invitation cards. We do not know whether the Committee of the House of Commons which is investigating the defalcations at South Kensington has authority to push its inquiries beyond the case of Mr. Simkins. But some further explanations are clearly required. Mr. Cole ridicules the idea of his being responsible for the accounts of the department. He argues that he is only nominally accountant, and that, though he signs the accounts as a guarantee of their accuracy, it is absurd to expect him to know anything about them. We are assured that it is physically impossible for him to attend to such trifles when he has so many other things to do; and he added that "it would puzzle a conjuror" to say exactly what his duties were under the Act of Parliament. Mr. Cole is not more puzzled in this respect than other people. He is supposed to be the not inadequately remunerated head of a Government department; but it appears that, although he cannot possibly find time to attend to his official duties, he has abundant leisure to organise and superintend various enterprises which trade upon a supposed connexion with the Government, but which are in reality simply speculations of the same class as the Opera or the Crystal Palace. The Albert Hall is nothing more than a joint-stock music hall, and the profits go to the proprietors. The International Exhibitions are practically carried on for the benefit of the staff which manages them. It has been suggested by the Times in favour of little annual Exhibitions that they are at least not such a nuisance as a Great Exhibition upsetting society at uncertain intervals. It is true that country cousins cannot make a point of attending annual shows, and residents in the metropolis are thus relieved from one of the inflictions which Great Exhibitions are apt to bring upon them. This year, as last year, the International Exhibition is simply a shopkeepers' bazaar, the gross mercantile aspects of which are veiled under a thin pretence of art. There is no great harm in this, perhaps; the Exhibition is a pleasant lounge; and if it pays, that is a proof that people like to go there. But it is surely time that a line should be drawn between the establishments at South Kensington with which the State is really identified, and the private commercial undertakings by which they are surrounded; and that Government officials should be kept to their proper work. For the present there seems to be a difficulty in devising an entertainment that will fill the Albert Hall. An experiment is now being made with twopenny concerts, and one of these days we shall perhaps find Clodoche on the bills. But when everything else has been tried, Cole C.B. has always one great card in reserve. When he has played out Royalty, he can play himself. Barnum was very successful in his lectures on Humbug; and several mediums who have exhausted the Spirit business have found it more profitable to expound the secret processes of the art. Cole C.B. on Human Nature in its South Kensington aspects could hardly fail to be an irresistible attraction.

THE BATTLE OF WAKEFIELD.

WE spoke lately of the English civil wars of the fifteenth century as contrasted with the earlier and later struggles of the thirteenth and of the seventeenth. We wish now to give some account of one of the particular battles which took place between the supporters of the rival Roses, a battle both remarkable in itself, and specially worthy of examination as having been made the subject of several popular misconceptions. It will be borne in mind that in the Parliament of October 1460 a compromise was agreed on between the claims of Henry the Sixth as the actual possessor of the Crown, and the claims of Richard, Duke of York, by virtue of an alleged hereditary right. Henry was to keep the crown for life, and Richard was to succeed at his death, and in the meanwhile to be Regent or Protector of the kingdom. The effect of this award was to cut off the succession of Edward, the son of the reigning King, and to put the Duke in his place as heir-apparent. Such an award was not likely to be acceptable to Queen Margaret, the mother of the Prince who was thus shut out, and it is especially noticed that several of the chief nobles of her party, the Dukes of Exeter and Somerset, the Earls of Northumberland and Devon, and many of the lords of the North, were not present at the Parliament. The Queen and her party therefore treated the award as a nullity, and thus the settlement which was meant to bring matters to a peaceful agreement led only to a continuance of the war. The one battle fought in this stage of it was that of Wakefield, in which Duke Richard lost his life, and in this his last fight he was at least formally in the right. He went forth as the recognized Protector and heir-apparent of the realm to put down a rising which had for its object the disturbance of a Parliamentary award. In this cause, on the 30th of December, 1460, Duke Richard died in the fight waged in the fields between the town of Wakefield and the Castle of Sandal.

In the narrative of this battle as commonly given, two tragical incidents especially stand out; Queen Margaret is made to be present in person; the Duke is taken prisoner and beheaded, with every circumstance of cruel mockery, and his head is presented to the Queen. One of the Duke's sons, Edmund, Earl of Rutland, described in the common story as a boy of tender years, is said to have been killed by Lord Clifford with his own hand, under circumstances of especial barbarity. In both of these stories there is reason to believe that there is a great deal of exaggeration, and it will be well to test the evidence on which they severally rest. But before this is done, it will be better, for the clearer understanding of the story, to give some description of the site where the battle took place.

The scene of the battle, the scene in any version of the death of the Duke, lies in the low ground between the town of Wakefield and the Castle of Sandal, which formed the Duke's headquarters. The town itself stands on a slight eminence above the left bank of the winding stream of the Calder, the river which receives the more famous stream of the Aire, the stream by whose banks the Conqueror carried so long on his great march to win back Northumberland. The river flows through low and marshy ground on either side, rising on each side into irregular heights of great elevation. One of the most picturesque of ancient bridges connects the town with the country to the south of it on the right bank of the river. And the bridge on its eastern side is crowned by a gem of mediæval art—perhaps we should more strictly say, by a facsimile of the gem, which has the same effect as the original in calling up the general aspect of the place. This is the graceful chapel projecting over the river from the eastern side of the bridge, a chapel which has been restored almost to rebuilding in modern times, but which still reproduces the beautiful workmanship of the fourteenth century. Compare the chapel over the Calder at Wakefield with the boasted chapel by the Arno at Pisa, and we shall see how little need Englishmen—least of all Yorkshiremen—have to crowd their streets with buildings which forsake the forms of England for the forms of Italy. This "right goodly chapel of our Lady," as Leland calls it, on "the fair bridge of stone of nine arches under the which runneth the river of Calder," was a foundation of the townsmen of Wakefield, but the Dukes of York having obtained the mortmain for them, were formally held to be the founders. Out of this connexion with the House of York has probably grown the mythical belief that this chapel, whose architecture shows it to be a hundred years older than the battle, was founded for the good of the souls of those who died in it. Standing on the bridge and looking eastward, westward, and southward, as far as the smoke of Wakefield chimneys will let us look in any direction, several special points may be made out among the low and wooded hills which rise on either side. To the east, close above the right bank of the river, rises the hill crowned by the picturesque Elizabethan mansion of the Heath, which, as far as we know, does not connect itself with any of the events of the battle. But to the west, on the left bank of the river, lies the high ground of Thornes and Lupsett, and there is one special point, which is said to have played a part in the battle, and which at all events is remarkable on its own account. This is the small peaked hill, just outside the park of Thornes, immediately overlooking the town to the west, which bears the name, varied by endless local spellings, of Lawe or Lowe Hill. The former part of the name is of course the same as that which is found in the names of many heights in Northern Britain, the Old-English hlæw, the Gothic hlaw, the word used by Ælfric for the holy tomb, and which lives in a most corrupted shape in the Cuckshley, the Cuckshlaw, of Berkshire topography. A central mound, seemingly, like so many others, a natural mound raised and improved by art, and surrounded by a deep ditch, crowns a series of slighter fortifications on the slope of the hill. The name, purely descriptive and not connected with any Teutonic epitaphos, may suggest that it was a work of the conquered Welsh, which the English conquerors of the Brigantian land found in much the same state as it is now—a hill-fort which might have grown into a castle or into a city, but which the caprice of human affairs has left untouched among the surrounding dwellings of man. The very meaning of its name has been forgotten; the word hlæw ceased to carry any meaning with it to modern ears, and, as so often happens, another word of the same meaning was added as an explanatory description of the word which had passed into an unintelligible proper name. This Lowe or Lawe Hill, already so distinguished in the sixteenth century, has been thought, we know not exactly on what authority, to have been the headquarters of the Lancastrian side; it is more certain that the object itself connects itself most temptingly with the spot on the other side of the river which undoubtedly was the headquarters of the Yorkists. This is the Castle of Sandal, lying nearly due south of the town. A local legend preserved by Leland, one of a class which turns up everywhere, distinctly connects the history of the two hills. The castle, which was built at Sandal, was to have been built on Lawe Hill:—

A quarter of a mile without Wakefield appereth an Hille of Erthe come up, wher sum say that one of Lokes Warrmes began to build, and as fast as he builded violence of Wynde dected the Work. This is taken a fable. Sum say that it was nothing but a Wind Mille Hille. The place is now called Lohlle.

And there would seem to be thus much of truth in the legend, that a process actually did take place at Sandal which did not, though it might almost have been looked for, take place at Lawe Hill. A primeval fortress seems to have been taken advantage of in the building of the mediæval castle. In the present state of the place primeval and mediæval works are hopelessly confounded, or rather, as so often happens, the earlier works have survived the later. The works of the castle crown the highest point of a long sloping hill, lying between the river and the village of Sandal, whose cross church can hardly fail to draw attention by its central tower and choir of unusual length. The castle itself, a work of the Earl Warren of the days of Edward the Second, has sunk, save in one place, where some small portions of wall are left, into a confused heap of mounds and holes, which it would need the eye of Mr. G. T. Clark to cover once more with the buildings which they once upheld and defended. A notion of the general effect may be got from a rude drawing of the Elizabethan age, which was published by the Society of Antiquaries. The castle itself was slighted in 1648, and the greater part of the stones seems to have been carefully carried away. But the ruin of the mediæval works brings out only more strongly the great mound with its ditch, of the same type as its fellow the Lawe Hill, but of considerably greater height and depth. Its value as a military post must have been great in days when the country could really be won, whereas now the abiding smoke which turns the white fleeces of the sheep into black makes it hard to do more than guess at its features. On this height it was that Duke Richard took up his quarters on the 21st of December, 1460. The lords of the Queen's party who had rejected the award had gathered together their forces at York, and the Duke had marched northwards to hinder their designs. He had come accompanied, among others, by his son, Edmund Earl of Rutland, and by Richard Earl of Salisbury, and Warwick, the father of the renowned King-maker. On their march they lost some men in an encounter with Somerset's forces at Worksop, but reached Sandal, as has already been said, at the head of 6,000 men. The Lancastrian forces were at Pontefract, and on the 29th of December the battle took place.

The received account of the battle comes from the chronicler Hall, of the time of Henry the Eighth. His version may be compared with several earlier authorities. There is one which, according to some theories of history, ought to be the most trustworthy of all—namely, the preamble to the Act of Parliament which declares the three Lancastrian Kings to have been usurpers, and Duke Richard to have been the King de jure. We have also the Chronicles of William of Worcester, of John Whethamstede, Abbot of St. Albans, and that of an anonymous monk of Crowland, commonly known as the "Continuato Crowlandensis." Their different accounts do not exactly agree with each other, but any one of them would be enough to convict Hall's version of a good deal of misrepresentation. First of all, was the Queen there? According to the version given by Hall and Fabian, she would seem to have been in actual command, and the rash determination of Duke Richard to give battle is thrown by Hall into the form of a magnanimous speech, in which he refuses to keep himself shut up "for dread of a scolding woman, whose weapon is only her tongue and her nails." But the more trustworthy Crowland writers say of the Queen, "in partibus borealibus morabatur." But just at this point there seems to be something lost in his narrative, and he gives us no actual account of the battle. But if we follow William of Worcester, who seems to be by far the best authority, Margaret was certainly not now in Yorkshire, although she was in a part of the world which might still more truly come under the head of "partes boreales." According to this chronicler Margaret had fled into Scotland in July, as soon as the Parliament had been summoned for October ("Et dicta Regina Margareta, cum principe Edwardo filio suo, de Wallia per mare fugit in Scotiam"), and she did not come from Scotland to York till after the battle was over ("dicto bello finito, Regina Margareta venit de Scotia Eboraco"). The Act of Parliament makes no mention of Margaret at all, and Abbot Whethamstede, though he attributes the action of the Northern lords to her agency ("ad instantiam Domine Margarete Regine"), has not a word to imply that she was there in person. We can therefore have no doubt whatever in rejecting this part of Hall's story, and in setting down the alleged immediate share of the Queen in the death of Duke Richard as one of the exaggerations which were sure to gather round such a story.

On the 29th or 30th of December the battle took place. Setting aside the later version of Hall, we have two distinct accounts; that of William of Worcester, which is very sober and circumstantial, and that of Abbot Whethamstede, which is far more loose and high-flown, and seems to be quite romantic in some of its details. The Abbot also shows a less accurate knowledge of the ground than William of Worcester, for he gives no names to the places occupied by the two parties, and he says that the Duke's forces chose a place and encamped near the town ("elegantur ibi juxta villam sibi campum stationis erigentes tentoria"), while the Lancastrians were encamped not far off ("castrum metati non multum distanter a castris suis"). This is certainly not an accurate description of Sandal and Pontefract. We have also the Act of Parliament, but any one who wrote history wholly from the Statute-book would never find out that there was any battle at all. In the words of the Act the Duke was "falsely, traitorously, horribly, cruelly, and tyrannously murdered," all which, when translated into everyday language, simply means that he was killed in what, whatever we think of the justice of the war on either side, was at any rate a fair fight. According to Whethamstede a day was agreed upon for a battle ("dies inter partes appunctuatus super tempore prælationis"); but the Lancastrians treacherously set upon the Yorkists with superior numbers before the appointed day, when they were out foraging. This is a sort of story which turns up in a great many times and places, and the foraging party seems to be the only element of truth in it. It is of course out of this story that the tale grew about the challenge sent by the Queen and her party to the Duke, and the Duke's answer about her tongue and nails. But from William of Worcester it is plain that the battle was brought on by accident, owing to an attack made by the Lancastrians on the Duke's foraging parties ("gentibus ducis Eborum vagantibus per patriam pro victualibus querendis, factum est execrabilis bellum"). At all events the Duke was tempted down from the height of Sandal, and it is just at the foot of the sloping hill that tradition places the place of his death. One huge and aged willow-tree and the stump of another, the remains of three which once stood there, is said to mark the exact spot. It is plain that the battle must have raged over all the low ground between the castle and the town. One peninsula formed by a bold bend of the river bears the name of Pugnells, a name which we do not profess to explain; but we need not say that local imagination has seized on it, and sees in it a Latin memory of the fight. Now comes the question as to the manner of the Duke's death. We may set aside all versions of the story which represent Margaret as an actor or a spectator, but Whethamstede distinctly says that he was taken alive, crowned and saluted in mockery, and then beheaded. But the Abbot almost pronounces the condemnation of his own story when he brings in the dangerous comparison:—"Non aliter quam Judæi (?) coram Domine incurvaverunt genua sua coram ipso"; and the story seems set aside by the distinct words of the Act of Parliament that the Duke and his companions, "after they were dede," were "heded with abhominable crueltie and horrible despite, against all humanite and nature of nobles." It is plain from William of Worcester that the Duke was killed in actual fighting, as was Thomas Neville, son of the Earl of Salisbury, and a number of men of all ranks amounting to 2,000. The Earl of Salisbury was taken prisoner the next night, not, as Hall says, wounded and taken prisoner in the conflict. In the flight the Earl of Rutland was stopped and killed on the bridge by Lord Clifford. This is really all that we know for certain. Earl Edmund, born, as William of Worcester carefully tells at the proper point of his annals, at Rouen on Monday, May 17th, 1443, at seven o'clock in the evening, was certainly not, as Hall makes him, a boy of twelve in December 1460; so that we may suspect that the pathetic tale in Hall, which has grown into a pathetic scene in Shakespeare, has a large mythical element in it. The plain story in William of Worcester runs thus:—

In crastino apud Pontifret bastardus Exoniæ occidit dictum comitem Sarum, ubi per concilium dominorum decollaverunt corpora mortua ducis Eborum et comitis Sarum et Rutland. . . . posueruntque capita eorum super diversas partes Eboraci. Capud quoque ducis Eboraci in despectu coronaverunt carta.

Leland seems to confound the death of the father and the son:—

Yn the flite of the Duke of Yorke's Parte, other the Duke hymself, or his sun therle of Rutland, was slayne a little above the Barres beyond the Bridge going up into the Tounne of Wakefeld that standith ful fairly upon a clyving ground. At this place is set up a Crosse in rei memoriam. The commune saying is there that the Erie wold have taken ther a poore Woman's house for socour, and she for fere shet the Dore and strait the Erie was killid.

The story of this battle is worth examining, as showing at how late a time in our history a legendary element is still to be found, and as showing also, in the case of Abbot Whethamstede's version, how soon after the event that legendary element arose. And it is perhaps something to clear the character of Queen Margaret from any direct share in the brutalities done to the Duke dead or alive, though, as we do not read that she ordered his head to be taken down from the gate, she may still be looked on as in some sort an accomplice after the fact.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET AND THE ADMIRALTY.

SOME years ago, if we remember rightly, when Lord Clarence Paget made his second appearance in the House of Commons—his party was then in Opposition, and he himself sat in sturdy independence below the gangway—he discovered that several millions were missing in the Admiralty accounts. The money had been voted, but he was unable to make out where it had gone to. When Lord Clarence soon afterwards became Secretary to the Admiralty, it was understood that it would be his special mission to trace the missing millions. We are not aware, however, that during the whole time he was at the Admiralty he ever threw any light on the subject, nor was his administrative career remarkable for restless reforms or too eager economies. Lord Clarence has now returned from the command of the Mediterranean squadron, and it has been stated that he proposes to seek a seat in Parliament. In the meanwhile he has lost no time in reporting himself in a highly characteristic manner to the present Board. He has written to the Times to say that the recent accidents to ironclads are due to the false economy of the Admiralty, which has issued orders to the officers of the navy to keep down the consumption of coal, and the consequence is that officers prefer to lose their ships rather than incur the censure of "my Lords." If the Captain had had her engines in use she would have been luffed to the wind and saved. The reason why the Agincourt drifted crab-like on to the Pearl Rock was because she had not "headway to stem the current. The Defence also drove from her anchors from want of steam-power. The Lord Clyde came to grief from a similar reason. Lord O. Paget's argument is in substance this—that ironclads have been lost from want of steam-power; that steam-power has not been used because the Admiralty discouraged it; and that the loss of the ships must therefore be laid at the door of the Admiralty. The officers of the navy, we are assured, "are a highly sensitive body of men, and, once impressed with the feeling that the consumption of coal is displeasing to the Admiralty, they will run all sorts of risks" rather than expose themselves to official rebuke. It is obvious that a number of questions of a very serious character are thus opened up. Were the ironclads which have lately been lost or damaged sacrificed because sufficient steam-power was not employed? If so, was this false economy of steam-power owing to the orders issued by the Admiralty? And, further, if the regulations produced this effect, are the officers of the navy entitled knowingly and deliberately to sacrifice their ships rather than run the risk of official censure? "Many officers of the highest merit and reputation," Lord Clarence says, "are wrecked in prospects and reputations." If they chose to wreck their prospects and reputations, of course that is their own business, and they must take the consequences. But were they entitled to wreck Her Majesty's ships on the plea of keeping on good terms with the Admiralty? Lord O. seems to imply that they were; but the letters which he appeared in the Times in answer to his own will perhaps tend to reassure the public on this point. We will take these different questions in their order.

As to the cause of the disasters which have recently overtaken our ironclads, we should say that the loss of the Captain may fairly be attributed to the fact that steam was not used when it ought to have been. And in this opinion we are confirmed by "Rear-Admiral," who has written a letter asserting that "every sailor knows that the Captain was lost by carrying too much sail in endeavouring to prove that she could keep her station in the line under sail alone." No other ship in the squadron attempted to do the same, and no other ship was lost. It is true that the Admiral in command signalled, not exactly as Mr. Goschen puts it, that the ships should get up steam, but that they might do so if it was thought necessary. It is understood, however, that Captain Burgoyne had unfortunately conceived the idea that his credit depended on dispensing as far as possible with steam, and economizing coal to the utmost. It appears that the accident to the Defence was owing to a misunderstanding between the captain and the engineer as to the time that would be necessary to get up steam in all the boilers; the order to let slip the cable was given before the boilers had been connected. As to the cases of the Agincourt and Lord Clyde there may be room for controversy. Mr. Goschen has stated quite correctly that steam was up at the time when the ships came to grief; but it is doubtful whether, as Lord C. Paget argues, they might not have been saved if steam had been sooner resorted to. The next question is whether, assuming that an undue economy in the use of steam had anything to do with these disasters, this error can be fairly attributed to the rules laid down by the Admiralty. The rules which were in force down to the 25th of April last were to the effect that officers were to reduce the expenditure of coal on board their ships "to the lowest point consistent with the safety of their vessels, and the due performance of the service on which they may be employed." It was pointed out to officers that steam-power had been used when there was really no necessity for it, as, for example, "in leaving and entering harbours offering no difficulty to vessels under sail." All this appears to be reasonable enough, and the Secretary of the Admiralty at the time when these rules were drawn up may perhaps have been justified in thinking that they were not so strong as they should be. The date of these instructions is August 3, 1865; and Mr. Goschen obtained a personal triumph over Lord C. Paget when he announced that they were signed by his lordship, who was, in fact, the Secretary who did not think the instructions sufficiently stringent. The rules as to the use of steam-power were revised last week, and of course we can say nothing about the new rules until we see them. It is certainly not desirable that naval officers should discard sails and rely entirely upon steam-power in navigating their ships; and it cannot be denied that there has been a tendency to do so which required to be checked. One of the old objections to steamships, which is still reproduced in Admiral Rous's letters, was that steam would be fatal to the art of seamanship. As ships became kettles, in Admiral Rous's language, sailors would sink into engineers. It is obvious that if seamanship means, as we suppose it does, the art of managing ships at sea, the kind of management must depend very much upon the character of the ships; and that the seamanship which is suitable to full-rigged vessels is necessarily unsuitable to our modern ironclads. The truth would seem to be that the art of seamanship is being revolutionized by the changes which are taking place in the construction of ships, and that for the present there is some danger of officers falling between two stools—sails and steam. It is impossible to lay down any absolute rule as to the use of steam, but it is quite right that the Admiralty should remind officers in command of ships that sails are not yet obsolete, and that on certain occasions it is possible to navigate a ship without steam. The instructions of 1865 are sufficiently guarded on this point; and it cannot be seriously argued that, even if they were more stringent than they are, officers would be justified in deliberately wrecking their ships rather than lay themselves open to official censure.

Lord C. Paget's answer to Mr. Goschen is that the orders cautioning officers against the unnecessary use of fuel were issued at a time when we had but few ironclads, and when sanguine expectations were entertained as to their capacity as cruisers. We have now a strong fleet of ironclads, and experience has proved that their sailing qualities were overrated. There is something in this, no doubt; but Lord Clarence has missed, we think, the weakest point in his adversary's case. Rules may be gilded and moderate in themselves, but it is certain that they will always be construed by the light of the official declarations and professed policy of the Government of the day. The Board who issued the order against using steam when sails were available were not identified in the minds of the service or of the public with a policy of rigid economy. It was understood that they desired that coals should not be wasted, and that seamanship should be cultivated; but nobody supposed that the question of the amount of coals consumed in working a ship was regarded as of paramount importance. Economy, however, has been the great cry of the present Government. Mr. Gladstone stamped the country with it when in Opposition. He and his colleagues have been continually bragging in the House of Commons about their "heroic efforts" to cut down the Estimates. Administrative economy has been held out as the great object and duty of Government. It is not surprising that, when so much emphasis is laid on this one point, and when everything else is regarded as of minor consequence, if of any consequence at all, the minds of officers in the public service should be very much directed towards economy, that they should have it constantly before them that their business is above everything to keep down expenses, and that for the sake of standing well with "my Lords," and making the most of their chances of promotion, they should set themselves to consider, not so much what is best to be done, but how to combine the certainty of cheapness with a probability of safety. If there is any risk to be run, it must not be, they feel, on the side of a heavy expenditure. It is monstrous to suppose, as Lord C. Paget would seem to suggest, that officers would consciously and deliberately sacrifice their ships rather than be rebuked by the Admiralty. Of course they imagine that they can keep their ships safe; only they are tempted to cut things rather too fine for the sake of making a good figure in regard to expenses in the eyes of the Board. Sir J. Pakington and other members of the House of Commons were personally insulted by Mr. Baxter because they ventured to suggest that possibly it might be worth while not to spare a few pounds in order to make sure that the Megara was quite safe for a voyage to the other end of the world. It may be imagined what sort of reception a master shipwright or a carpenter would have met with who dared to hint at anything of the kind. A man in that position would no doubt have it very much impressed upon his mind that, if he thought it worth while to stop in the service, and especially if he cherished any hope of advancement, he had better set himself to think of all sorts of ways to cut down expenses, and try to convince himself, if possible, that no repairs were needed. Economy, of course, is a very important thing in its way, and it is highly necessary that in the public service it should receive due consideration; but there is an obvious danger in setting up economy before and above everything else, and making it the leading principle of Ministerial policy. Some of the fruits of this blunder we have now to deplore.

THE TWO THOUSAND.

WHEN Xanthus ran Almoner to a head and beat Laburnum by a neck in the Newmarket Biennial, one of two conclusions was inevitable. Either Xanthus must have improved a stone—and his good looks gave a certain amount of justification for this idea—or the whole Biennial form was decidedly inferior. But when, a few days later, Xanthus, carrying no more than a fair racing weight, was beaten out of sight in the City and Suburban, it became difficult to see how any of the Biennial horses could have a chance with Cremorne and Queen's Messenger, both of whom so easily disposed of Xanthus last season. Besides this pair there was Prince Charlie, who, both in looks and merits, held unquestioned preeminence over all the two-year-olds of 1871; and only his admitted infirmity prevented impartial judges from regarding the Two Thousand as a foregone conclusion for the magnificent son of Blair Athol. It was, indeed, impossible to forget the experience of the last few years, when horses like Paris, Liddington, and Belladrum, all of whom suffered from a similar affection of the throat, were compelled to succumb at the final hill, just when victory seemed within their grasp. It has come, in fact, to be considered an axiom that no roarer can win the Two Thousand, still less the Derby; and though a roarer has this week won, and won easily, the former race, the axiom will probably be verified in nineteen years out of twenty. The warmest friends of Prince Charlie, who made no attempt to deny the fact of his infirmity, were yet so impressed with his extraordinary merits as to aver that he could quite afford to give his opponents all the advantage they might obtain from his roaring, and still be able to win; and certainly the event justified their confidence. It was heavy handicapping, though; like Dundee's gallant struggle for the Derby with three legs; and, if there had been nothing the matter with his respiration, there is no telling how far or how easily he would have won. The prophets were all wrong in another thing also; for they said with one accord that, though Prince Charlie might come along as far as the dip, with the race apparently in hand, the final ascent would stop him. On the contrary, when coming down the hill into the Abingdon bottom, he did seem to falter a little; but directly he touched the ascent he recovered himself at once, and went further and further away from Cremorne at every stride. And we venture to express an opinion that in the Derby the most critical point for him will be the descent of the hill to Tattenham Corner. It is worth remembering, however, that the Derby is run this year on the new course, which is far easier than the old one, inasmuch as the first part of the race will be over level ground. In the old course there was a severe hill to climb from the very start, and this was sure to be fatal to a roarer; Belladonna, for instance, who ran a good second for the Two Thousand, being hopelessly beaten in the Derby in the first three hundred yards. The alteration of the course is clearly an additional point in Prince Charlie's favour.

To come to the actual proceedings of the Two Thousand day, we may remark that all the expected starters ran, the following fourteen coming to the post:—Almoner, Xanthus, and Laburnum—the leading three in the Biennial—Prince Charlie and Cremorne

—the chief two-year-old winners of last year—the unbeaten Queen's Messenger, and Bethnal Green, Wellingtonia, Landmark, Lighthouse, Helmet, Statesman, Wenlock, and King Lud. Of these only eight were saddled in the birdcage, but among these eight were Prince Charlie, Xanthus, Laburnum, Almoner, and Bethnal Green. When the Biennial runners were saddled, Xanthus was universally singled out as a remarkably fine-looking horse, but here he looked merely a pigmy by the side of his gigantic stable companion Prince Charlie. This latter is not only of great size, standing nearly seventeen hands high, but also of great quality, without any of that coarseness that so often distinguishes large horses, and that was particularly noticeable in Prince Charlie's half-brother Camel. He was brought out in the most perfect condition, and the only exception that could be taken to his general appearance was the somewhat disproportionate slowness of his forelegs to the great weight of his body. Almoner was but a little pony after Prince Charlie, and looked as well as on the Biennial day. Indeed it would have been impossible to have made him fitter than he was when he won the first great three-year-old race of the season. Bethnal Green was wiry and well trained, but Laburnum did not take the eye after such handsome and shapely horses as Prince Charlie and Almoner. A better tempered field probably never faced the starter, who had no difficulty in getting them away at the very first attempt. At a rather slow pace Queen's Messenger—at a great disadvantage to himself—led the way across the flat, and it reads rather like a satire on the theory that racehorses can be judged by a time test, when we discover that the three leaders in the Biennial, run at a much faster pace over the same course only a fortnight ago, were among the first beaten in the Two Thousand. In fact, as we ventured to suggest, Queen's Messenger held all the Biennial horses safe; and in Prince Charlie and Cremorne he met two antagonists possessed of a greater turn of speed than himself. Whether they are better stayers time will prove. At the Buries it was evident that there were only Prince Charlie and Cremorne left in the race; and descending the hill Prince Charlie seemed rather to falter, and Mr. Savile's horse was going so well within himself, and pulling double, that shouts were raised in his behalf. Osborne, however, one of the most steady and judicious of horsemen, never attempted to bustle his horse, but rather allowed Cremorne to take a momentary lead, which in the dip might perhaps have amounted to about a quarter of a length. And, by the way, there can be no doubt that a very big horse requires the most judicious handling down a hill. Up a hill, if he can go up a hill at all, the faster he is sent along the better. It was so on this occasion with Prince Charlie and his rider. Kept well in hand till the Abingdon bottom was fairly reached, he was let out the moment the ascent commenced. And directly he was let out, he was level with, and then, in another instant, a neck in advance of, Cremorne. Once in advance of him, instead of losing ground, he gained it at every stride; and, as his strides are very much longer than Cremorne's, the lead lost by Mr. Savile's horse could never be regained, and the big "roarer" won easily by a neck, with perhaps a great deal in hand. Though beaten, Cremorne was in no way disgraced—on the contrary, we are disposed to think that he never ran a better race in his life, and we are glad to see that the recollection of many severe races run, and of much severe punishment received last year, has not indisposed him to make an effort when called upon this year. Four lengths off, Queen's Messenger finished third; but, with a scope of ground, and under more advantageous circumstances of running, Lord Falmouth's horse will most likely fulfil the highest expectations that have been formed of him. To be beaten, however, by four lengths is a very considerable defeat; and, at first sight, it seems that, on public running, there was no Derby form behind the leading pair. We cannot consent to this verdict in the case of Queen's Messenger, because we are sure that he ran under every disadvantage in the Two Thousand, having to make his own running, when staying and not speed is his forte, and not being able to make it fast enough to shake off two horses who could rely on their tremendous turn of speed when it was necessary to commence racing in earnest. But we would not be understood as speaking one word in disparagement of Prince Charlie and Cremorne; indeed, if the former gets safely round Tattenham Corner, there is nothing that can cope with his enormous stride; and though he is a roarer, it must be remembered that his canter is like another horse's gallop. But we repeat that, in our opinion, if his chance is jeopardized at all in the Derby, it will be in the descent of the hill to the Corner. It can hardly be thought worth while to discuss the Derby chances of the horses that ran in the Two Thousand behind the leading three, as long as the leading three keep sound and well; and the days of dark outsiders, kept in reserve and not brought out before the Derby, are, we may venture to say, well nigh over. On public running, however, there is one horse—Ouslow—who, if he is brought fit and well to the post, will be eagerly scrutinised on the Derby day; and it may not be out of place to mention that he is a stable companion of Prince Charlie. Under the most favourable circumstances, however, it appears that the Derby of 1872 can be said to be hardly an open race.

REVIEWS.

CLARK'S EARLY ROMAN LAW.*

MR. CLARK tells us in his Introduction that "a crossfire from jurists and historians may not unreasonably assail an encroacher on the debatable ground between the two provinces." We are inclined to doubt whether the provinces of the jurist—as distinguished from the mere professional lawyer—and the historian are two provinces. The historian need not be qualified to act as judge or as counsel in a court of the time and place of which he is writing. But, unless he understands the main outlines of the laws of that time and place, the broad principles on which they rest, and the historical origin of its chief enactments, he will make but strange work of his history. On the other hand, experience has proved that no stranger work can be made of anything than has been made both of law and history by lawyers who assume that the arbitrary rules of a certain age must have existed from all eternity, and who, when they stoop to look at the documents of earlier times at all, only try to force them into agreement with their own preconceived theories. But of course there are two, or rather many, provinces, so far as this, that one inquirer may be led by his tastes to give special attention to the legal antiquities of a people, while another may feel himself more strongly drawn to the religious, the military, or any other aspect of them. But, though one inquirer may give himself especially to one branch, he cannot afford wholly to neglect other branches. The historian must, at least in a general way, understand the laws of the nation about which he is writing, and the jurist must, at least in a general way, understand the facts of its history.

We will carry out our own doctrine as to special inquirers taking special branches, by saying that the parts of Mr. Clark's book to which we are most drawn are the few chapters just at the end. Mr. Clark there gets upon Constitutional Law. The early Roman Constitution is, as every one knows, an old subject of controversy. No two scholars ever come to exactly the same conclusions. The two latest writers on the subject, at least the two latest we know of, are Mr. Clark himself and Professor Seeley. And Mr. Clark and Professor Seeley do not wholly agree about the Comitia Centuriata. Indeed we should be a little surprised if any two scholars did agree on some of these points, on which the thought is always suggesting itself to us that the wisest plan is not to come to any conclusion at all. Mr. Clark himself, for instance, has gone most carefully through the subject which he has taken in hand. He has set to work as an independent inquirer; he has got together, we feel certain, pretty well all that is to be got together in the shape of authorities bearing on the first stage of Roman Law, and in forming his own inferences he does not at all bind himself to follow in the wake of any earlier inquirer. His book is a small one, but it contains a great mass of matter, and it shows how many and various are the quarters to which a man must go to find out all that is to be found out about the earliest stage of Roman Law. Yet the chief impression which Mr. Clark gives us is a feeling which strikes us rather painfully, a feeling how very little there is to be found out after all. Perhaps we are not quite fair judges. Those who learned Roman History as Roman History was taught thirty years back are apt to be puzzled at the present state of things. In those days Niebuhr was the guide, and it must be allowed that he was at least a very fascinating guide, especially as expounded by his English interpreter Arnold. Niebuhr himself needed such an interpreter, but, when he was so interpreted, the state of things was very pleasant. The system at least hung well together. Each part of the theory fitted into every other part; we had the satisfaction of thinking that we knew all about the real state of things in the early days of Rome, and that we could have corrected Livy or Cicero on a great many points in the laws and history of their own commonwealth. This happy state of belief was perhaps not likely to last long; the thing was too perfect. It was too well jointed and squared, and later reflection brought about the feeling that, after all, we were perhaps no safer in binding ourselves to the divination of Niebuhr than if we had bound ourselves to the tradition of Livy. The fabric fell with a crash, and in many minds nothing has come to take its place. It soon became plain that for a great deal that we had come to believe on the authority of Niebuhr there was absolutely no authority at all except that of Niebuhr. We therefore ceased to believe in Niebuhr as an infallible guide, and this shock to our faith has not predisposed us either to choose any new guide in his place, or to set up ourselves as guides either to ourselves or to others. The breakdown of our early belief rather inclines us to the suspicion that there is really nothing to be made out about the matter at all. This is no doubt a hasty conclusion; but it is also a hasty conclusion that Niebuhr is to be thrown aside altogether. Though Niebuhr's fabric, as a whole fabric, will not stand, though his power of divination may be left in the same limbo as that of his brother augur, yet a great deal may still be learned from his method. In his time the Comparative method of study had not been brought to perfection; but Niebuhr perfectly understood that, in times where there is no contemporary or other trustworthy authority, a comparison with the analogous institutions of other countries will often prove attained as much as the direct notices of men who wrote when early institutions were no longer understood. Niebuhr also thoroughly understood the sort of indirect evidence which may be got out of such later notices, something in the style of the undesignated coincidences by which writers on Christian evidences seek to confirm the truth of the Scriptural narrative. Both these lines of argument may, like all others, be easily pressed too far; but it seems to us that Niebuhr made a really good use of both, and that some of the later lights have rather neglected them. Take, for instance, the two or three passages in which Livy unmistakably distinguishes populus and plebs, when he speaks, for instance, of a thing being done "a plebe consensu populi." Now the value of such a passage as this arises from the fact of its inconsistency with other passages. Livy, as a rule, makes no such distinction. That is to say, when he was speaking his own words, he did not take any pains to recognize a distinction which in his time was forgotten; but in such passages as we have just quoted he can only be copying, without fully understanding, the words of some document of a time when the distinction was remembered. To our mind such an indirect witness as this proves more than any direct statement of any writer, so far removed from the time spoken of as all those are to whom we have to trust in those matters. So again, some traditions of the earliest times, though absolutely void of external evidence, carry with them a certain internal confirmation. The story that Romulus reigned in partnership with the Sabine Tatius rests on no more direct evidence than the story that he was suckled by a wolf. Yet we may be quite certain that the story of the joint royalty has a real groundwork of fact. The personal adventures of the two Kings, indeed the personality of the Kings themselves, are purely mythical, yet we can have very little doubt in accepting the story as witnessing to a union of Latin and Sabine elements in the Roman State. It is a sort of tale which there could have been very little temptation to invent, and the state of things to which it points is quite in harmony with the policy of Rome from the first days of her Commonwealth to the last days of her Empire.

* Early Roman Law. The Regal Period. By E. C. Clark, M.A. London: Macmillan & Co. 1872.

Mr. Clark has brought together a great mass of valuable matter in an accessible form, but we could have wished that he had enlivened his arguments by a freer use of the Comparative method. He plainly feels its use. Speaking of Solon, he says, "How much of what is commonly attributed to him can be connected on historical grounds with our own Alfred?" Very little of course; but the example of Alfred might be used to show that when real legislators, like Solon, Servius, and Alfred, pass into the mythical stage, institutions both older and later than their time get fathered upon them. They are said to have invented in their present form institutions of which the present form is much newer, while the original germ is much older, than their own day. In the case of Alfred, just as in the case of Charles the Great, we can check the legend by the history, and we can thus see the kind and degree of truth which is likely to be preserved in such a legend as that of Servius. Of course such a process can never touch us details; but then our position is that we can never hope to learn any details at all. Here and there by some accident a fragment may survive, but as a rule it is hopeless to look for details of times of which we have no sort of contemporary record. So again, Mr. Clark has brought together all the authorities on the subject of the early Quæstors. Here again the two lines of argument which we have suggested come in. We get mention of quæstors in early times whose functions were altogether different from the Quæstors of the historical period. Here we plainly have a genuine piece of early antiquity. The process of misconception would lead men to attribute to the Quæstors of early times the functions of the quæstors of their own day; it would never lead them to imagine quæstors whose functions were altogether different from anything which they were used to. We may therefore feel quite certain that there were in early times Quæstors who had to deal with questions of blood, and whose functions therefore were widely different from those of the fiscal Quæstors in the days of Cicero and Cæsar. But here again the Comparative method supplies us with help, and the vast number of examples in which we find among ourselves the same name applied to offices the functions of which are utterly different. Take, for instance, three familiar titles among ourselves—those of Chancellor, Dean, and Constable. It is certain that some of the officers called by those names differ as much from one another as the later Quæstors differed from the early quæstores paricidii. Yet in the known cases it is possible to trace up the widely different offices now called by the same name to some common origin or some common idea, and the chances are therefore very strong in favour of the two uses of the word Quæstor having originally had some connexion. Then again, the Comparative method may be used, not only between one language or people and another, but even within the limits of the same language. Mr. Clark, for instance, follows the doctrine of Varro, that the consuls were so called a comulendo, from consulting the Senate. We answer that we cannot admit any explanation of the last syllable of the word consul which does not also explain the last syllable of the analogous forms praesul and caesul. But when we find Mommsen and Professor Seeley and Mr. Clark failing to agree as to the use of the word pater in such a phrase as auctoritas patrum, and on the kindred subject of the original composition of the Comitia Curiata, we are inclined to say that they are disputing about what never can be found out, because we have nothing to go upon, except the language of writers in later times when it is quite certain that the original nature of the institution would no longer be understood. But, if we rise from details to the general question of the origin of the wide distinction of orders which is so conspicuous throughout all Roman history, the Comparative method will again help us. The ruling order, where there is a ruling order, in a State has arisen in various ways. Sometimes it is immemorial. We find it already established in the earliest times of which history or tradition gives us any glimpses. This is the case with the distinction of evras and cevas in the early days of our own and other Teutonic nations. But we see that the nobility of the evras gradually gave way to the later nobility of pegnas; a close parallel to the way in which we find in Rome itself an earlier nobility of patricii and a later nobility of nobiles. So again, in the history of Florence, after the old nobility had been disfranchised, something nearly equivalent to a new nobility grew up among the great families of the commons. Some ruling orders have arisen out of differences of race through conquest, or through the refusal to admit new comers to the full franchise. Others again have arisen in the bosom of an already existing community, as was notably the case with the patrician order of Venice. If we admit that theory of the origin of the Roman patricians which sees in them the descendants of the first appointed set of senators, we shall have an exact parallel to the origin of the aristocracy of Venice; while the theory which looks upon them as a body of old citizens will find equally good parallels in the history of many municipal commonwealths. All these possibilities should be borne in mind by the inquirer, and he should examine which of them best falls in with such indications as we have in this particular case. But of course different minds will see all these things in different lights, and there is no hope of finding certainty or general agreement. The mistake, both on the part of Niebuhr and of others since Niebuhr, seems to us to lie in looking for certainty in matters where no certainty is to be had.

We owe some apology to Mr. Clark for writing an essay of our own under cover of reviewing his book. But his book does not supply much matter for reviewing, strictly so called; while it suggests much matter for thought as to many questions, questions, some of them, which those who were brought up under quite another state of things may perhaps be forgiven if they do not always look at exactly in the way which is most fashionable at the moment.

LEVI'S HISTORY OF BRITISH COMMERCE.*

IN a volume of imposing appearance Professor Leone Levi has endeavoured to execute a task of no small difficulty. His purpose is to give a history of the development of British commerce during the last century which shall have a wider scope than the elaborate records of MacPherson and Anderson, or than Tooke and Newmarch's History of Prices. One difficulty is obvious at the outset. A History of Commerce has undoubtedly an imposing sound, but it is rather difficult to form a precise definition of its proper province. What should such a History include, and what should it decline as irrelevant? If the historian takes a humble view of his duties, his book may sink into a mere collection of statistical tables, with just so much comment as is necessary to render them intelligible. But Professor Levi's ambition soars above this modest design. He wishes to be an historian rather than an annalist; and, if not to discover any general laws of commercial development, at least to give us a survey which will render it easier for future students to lay down some general principles. And yet directly we put off from the safe shores of statistical information, we are in danger of launching into a boundless ocean of inquiry. Everything, in fact, which affects the social or political development of a nation has a more or less powerful influence upon its commerce. Wars, even when not directly prompted, as they have frequently been, by the jealousies of traders, help materially to determine the channels in which commerce is to flow. Political changes have an immense influence upon commerce, by extending or restricting the liberty of the productive classes, by affecting theories of taxation, and in a thousand other ways. The intellectual progress of a nation is of primary importance as facilitating the various scientific discoveries by the practical application of which commerce has in late years been revolutionized. Every social change, such as the abolition of slavery or serfdom, is directly relevant. In short, we come at once upon the difficulty which results whenever we attempt to isolate one particular class of phenomena from the general current of human progress. A complete history of the development of commerce would almost involve a complete history of every other kind of development which has taken place in the nation during a given period. The attempt to record the commercial order of things by itself is like the attempt to give a history of a man's digestive apparatus without saying anything about the other organs towards which it is always in a state of action and reaction.

We do not of course say this by way of implying that such a monogram may not be of great utility, but merely to illustrate the difficulty which Professor Levi has obviously felt of knowing where to draw the line. At one moment he is tempted to diverge into an account of the great inventions, which would give a personal interest to his narrative; and at another into a discussion of the changes of internal or of foreign policy, which would lead him into a wider field of inquiry. Whether he has, in fact, been altogether felicitous in his selection of topics is a matter which we feel scarcely competent to decide. The only way of settling such points is by experiment. We can only say that until somebody has succeeded in devising a better arrangement, Professor Levi's book is likely to be of considerable service. It brings together a large mass of information clearly arranged, and, though we may here and there complain of an omission, and occasionally perhaps desire an omission, we may take it as a very fair attempt to execute a rather difficult design. The book, beginning with the conclusion of the Seven Years' War, is divided into five parts, of which the first four end respectively with the outbreak of the French Revolution, the resumption of cash payments, the beginning of Peel's administration in 1842, and the commercial crisis of 1857, whilst the last comes down to 1870. The great heroes of these epochs—for something of personal interest obtrudes itself even into the severe region of facts and figures—are Pitt, Huskisson, Peel, Cobden, and Mr. Gladstone. If it had not been for the annoying episode of the French Revolution, which caused us to retrograde for a time into a policy of restrictions and international jealousies, the history might be regarded as a series of victories over the monster Protection. Each of Professor Levi's heroes distinguished himself more or less by assaults upon that blatant beast of the commercial epic. Pitt's French treaty of 1786 did something to show the two nations their true interests; and Huskisson, Peel, and Mr. Gladstone each did much towards striking off the shackles by which the energies of the country had been fettered. What marvellous consequences have ensued from these achievements, how the commerce of the country has risen in a century from ten to three hundred millions, how the predictions of all manner of prophets of evil have been falsified, and how the removal of Protection has infused new life even into the industries which were supposed to stand in need of artificial encouragement, is the main theme of Professor Levi's narrative. Occasionally he rises to loftier flights, and a good many pages are dedicated to the delightful intricacies of Bank Charter Acts and currency controversies. On the whole, however, the history is almost a continued panegyric upon the blessings of Free-trade; it is a prolonged comment on the text of the extreme folly of men in knocking out each other's brains, instead of bartering their products, and in injuring themselves in the vain attempt to monopolize the advantages of commerce.

* History of British Commerce, and of the Economic Progress of the British Nation, 1763-1870. By Leone Levi. London: Murray. 1872.

Political economists have of late dwelt rather more than of old upon the darker shades of the picture. They have discussed the growing inequalities of wealth, which have been aggravated by the development of our national riches; they have pointed to the masses of pauperism which have shown no signs of disappearing under the genial influence of general prosperity; and they have doubted whether a people is necessarily much the happier because it imports millions of pounds of cotton where two or three generations ago it only imported one. Such considerations as these, however, lie outside of Professor Levi's path. His book should be a reassuring one for the prophets of evil who flourish now as they have flourished in all periods; and it is scarcely possible to rise from a perusal of its pages without an impression that we are rushing straight into a millennium—rather different, it is true, from that which gladdens the heart of Dr. Cumming. Our author shows a genuine enthusiasm, if not precisely the most exalted which can enter into the mind of man. When we break from the charmed circle, and become alive to the various evils of a different character which still surround us in other departments of life, we are perhaps tempted to think that Professor Levi has been introducing us to something of a fool's paradise. We cannot, however, enter upon a discussion of which, to say the truth, we are in no danger of losing sight at the present time. The natural limitations of Professor Levi's task are perhaps a sufficient justification for that glow of commercial enthusiasm which pervades his book, and which entraps us for a moment into the belief that the genuine rights of man are all being secured by the simple process of abolishing objectionable tariffs. We must admit, however, that Professor Levi is rather more addicted than we could desire to a kind of platitude which has become rather wearisome to us. He rises to an enthusiasm which we find it hard to share about that "great event in the history of modern civilization—the International Exhibition of 1851." He dwells fondly upon the "tasteful decorations" of the Egyptian Hall at a dinner, or, as he prefers to call it, a "banquet," held to celebrate the occasion. "On each side of the lofty Corinthian columns" were arranged trophies of the chief articles of productive industry of different countries. In one such trophy, for example, were combined "a sickle, sheaves of corn, a fitch of bacon, and a cheese." Inexpressibly cheering, no doubt, to the commercial mind, and far better than trophies of destructive implements; and yet, as we are half inclined to fancy, the mention of them is slightly below the dignity of history. Professor Levi, indeed, tells us that "better than any gaudy ornaments were the noble words" spoken by the late lamented Prince Consort; and without paying them any very high compliment, we may admit that it was probably more exhilarating to listen to them than to contemplate a fitch of bacon and a cheese.

As may be inferred from this specimen, Professor Levi has rather a taste for that kind of platitude which finds favour with the reporters of the eloquence of banquets. He calls the Judges "those pillars of political acumen which adorn our temples of justice"; and he every now and then bursts into such a bit of eloquence as the following, apropos of some remarks upon the laws of copyright:—

"Thankful should we be that the reputation of British literature for variety and solidity, as well as for freedom from license and high tone of morals, is unexcelled by the literature of any other country!" Here again is another remark, rather more appropriate, but which strikes us as verging upon the commonplace:—"How illiberal, how repulsive to natural law does it seem that England and France should have so long considered each other as natural enemies, and that they should have sacrificed their best interests to petty jealousies and diplomatic quarrels!" What a pity it is, in fact, that people had not appreciated the teaching of Cobden in the time of Joan of Arc! Unluckily mankind has to get on by degrees. These little ebullitions, if not very profound moralizing, are probably introduced to relieve the occasional dryness of the subject. We have no particular objection to make to them; but one or two other topics appear to us to be rather more seriously out of place. Thus, for example, we have a brief account of the civil war in America. It is introduced by way of accounting for the cotton famine and the other economical effects of that war upon English commerce. But it is not only meagre and unsatisfactory, but obviously superfluous. If Professor Levi is to go into the history of all the wars which have affected our commerce, his book would be boundless; if he cannot give a full account of them, he had better confine himself to mentioning the fact that they did occur, and describing the influence which they exerted on trade. As it is, in this and several other instances, he goes far enough to confuse the thread of his main narrative without going far enough to be really interesting. The fault, though not a very grave one, shows that he has scarcely realized with sufficient distinctness the precise end of his book; and consequently we have sundry rather dry digressions which might better have been omitted entirely. Making allowance, however, for the difficulties of a rather novel task, we may say that the book is on the whole creditable to his powers of putting together a narrative which is not in itself easy to tell, as it is certainly creditable to his patience and industry.

THE LONDON PARKS.*

THE Mr. Jacob Larwood whose name figures on the title-page of these volumes was previously known to fame as joint author with Mr. John Camden Hotten of a History of Sign-Boards; and, if we mistake not, the same Sternhold-and-Hopkins arrangement was at one time announced as intended to be followed in the present work, as also in a History of Advertising, which has not yet seen the light of day. Charles Lamb calls this practice of two eminent writers combining their powers a "noble habit," and although the Story of the London Parks has only to boast the name of Mr. Hotten in his more strictly professional character of publisher, we can hardly doubt that either his or some kindred spirit, if such there be, has in this instance also helped to lighten the burden of Mr. Jacob Larwood. The discoveries now communicated to the world are too startling and too varied to be by any possibility the achievements of a single investigator. Two daring explorers had to combine their efforts before the first of the Nyanzas was brought to light, and the toils of a third traveller were necessary before the inevitable Victoria was made asymmetrical by the addition of the still more inevitable Albert. And the same principle holds good with the less dangerous, though perhaps still more laborious, researches of literary adventurers. When, therefore, at the fourth page, on the very threshold of our reading, we came upon the following announcement of the explosion of one vulgar error that had darkened the page of history for full five centuries, we felt certain that others must follow this brilliant opening, and that the Parks as well as the Pot-houses had their Hopkins as well as their Sternhold. Speaking of the abbots of Westminster, our authors say:—

So comfortable had the good monks by this time [made the manor of Noyte, that no less a person than John of Gaunt, titular King of Castille, and brother of King Edward III., did not think it beneath his dignity to take up his abode in it.

This discovery, which amongst other things sets the origin of the Wars of the Roses in altogether a new point of view, may be called the Victoria Find, and was in due course followed by the Albert. If we were startled to learn that John of Gaunt was the uncle, not the brother, of the Black Prince, what were our emotions on hearing that our old friend the School for Scandal was a novel, not a play, and that its author was Henry Fielding, not Richard Brinsley Sheridan!—

No admirer of the squeamish Richardson was he, this Henry Fielding, "our immortal Fielding," as Gibbon calls him; he had no sentimental appointment in the Mall, but he studied there the originals which he depicted in his novels. There he observed Lady Booby, Bliff, Lady Bellaston, Charles and Joseph Surface, and the rest of them.—II. 192.

Although these perhaps must be regarded as the most signal and crowning triumphs of our authors, there are numerous others which bear the marks of no common hands, and which could never have been the work of one pot of paste or a single pair of scissors. Let us give some specimens. We all remember the anecdote communicated to Mr. Croker by Sir Walter Scott, in which the old Lord Auchinleck describes his "son Jamie" as "off with the laud-loupin' scoundrel of a Corsican," and "on wi' an auld dominie who kepted a schule and caud it an academy." We now find that both the hot old judge and Sir Walter were altogether mistaken in the order of events; that for some inscrutable reason every one of Johnson's biographers has post-dated the famous journey to the Hebrides by at least seven years; and that Boswell, instead of waiting till 1785, when the great man was dead, to publish his journal, had rushed into print fully seventeen years before:—

* The Story of the London Parks. By Jacob Larwood. 2 vols. London: John Camden Hotten.

In the beginning of October 1769, James Boswell, Dr. Johnson's save-all, had the gratification to lead a foreign "lion" about Hyde Park. "On Sunday last," says the Public Advertiser (October 4, 1769), "General Paoli, the Corsican hero, accompanied by James Boswell, Esq., took an airing in Hyde Park in his coach." No doubt this paragraph found its way into the papers through Boswell's own instrumentality. Boswell was at that time a great man—certainly in his own, if not in the public opinion. He had already published his Tour to the Hebrides, that amusing journal of a learned monster, written by his showman, who constantly discovers a pleasant apprehension that the beast will play the savage too furiously, and toss and gore the company instead of entertaining them.—l. p. 165.

With regard to our great novelists our authors have been peculiarly fortunate in obtaining access to exclusive sources of information. We have already mentioned the fact of their having restored to Fielding the School for Scandal, a novel which had only hitherto been known to us in the state in which one Sheridan had "adapted" it for the boards; and their "finds" in the case of Fielding's great predecessor and rival, Richardson, are still more remarkable; for, as far as we are aware, the "other novels" whose existence is pointed out in the following paragraph are still utterly unknown to the public. We are eager to peruse them, and hope that our author's reticence as to their names is owing to the circumstance that Mr. Hotten is about to reprint them, and fears to be anticipated by some bookseller of less scrupulousness and delicacy of mind:—

The habitudes of the Mall about this time might have observed once or twice a week a remarkably thoughtful elderly gentleman passing through, and, had they followed him, they would have seen that he went his way, and up the "King's private road" (now King's Road) to North End, Fulham. That man was Samuel Richardson, the author of "Pamela," "Grandison," "Clarissa Harlowe," and other novels.

What a remarkable circumstance it would be if it turned out that one of these "other novels" had been hitherto ascribed to Fielding, and that the histories of Pamela Andrews and of her brother Joseph should be proved to have proceeded from one and the same hand! We are partial to Fielding, and should regret if this were the case, for his reputation would lose more by the taking away of Parson Adams than our authors have gained for it by the restitution of Charles and Joseph Surface. There are other points mentioned about Fielding which must be derived from sources hitherto unexplored. They could not have learned from the Hogarth and Garrick portrait that he had a "jolly face" (ii. 193), and the work must still be in MS. in which Charles Lamb has recorded that his laugh "cleared the air" (ii. 193). It had always pleased us to imagine that Fielding's look and bearing were full of manly dignity, and we still seem to remember that the person to whose laugh Elia imputed that peculiar sanitary effect was a Somersetshire foundling named Thomas Jones. Other descriptions will at first sight appear strange to readers who have not had the peculiar advantages enjoyed by our authors. Ignorant people who have only studied the common histories and looked at the ordinary portraits would hardly imagine that the "placid, debile, little Dutchman" of vol. i. p. 85, and "his dull, stocking-knitting spouse" of two pages further on, were photographs of the haughty, iron-nerved King William and his Queen of the handsome face, the majestic port, the sweet and lively temper, the graceful and affable manners bestowed upon her by the sciolist Macaulay. The great Lord Chatham, too, instead of dwelling in our memories as with eagle face and outstretched arm bidding England be of good cheer and hurling defiance at her foes, as painted by the same ill-informed artist, is henceforth to be depicted on our mental retina as "that homely-looking old gentleman." But if some loss in this process there are others who gain. The Duke of Wellington, for instance, is generally represented as having a hooked nose and an eternal whistle on his lips; but this can hardly be reconciled with the fact that the Committee of the Ladies of England, in raising their Hyde Park memorial, "triumphantly remedied all drawbacks by placing the Duke's head on the shoulders of the Grecian statue, and introducing him to the public as Achilles." This circumstance, which we now learn for the first time, ought always to be recorded along with Jacob Tonson's notable alteration of the nose of Æneas in the old copper-plates of Ogilby's Virgil. While on the subject of the Duke, we may mention that it is here shown that after that memorable twenty-third of September on which he had

Against the myriads of Assaye
Clashed with his fiery few and won,

he must have been strangely blundering when he wrote to his friend Malcolm to aid him in his need, as "the bay horse was shot under me, and Diomed was piked." Colonel Gurwood would certainly have struck his pen through this passage had he been aware that, among the riders in the Park in 1809, "Sir Arthur Wellesley was conspicuous on a handsome grey Arabian which had carried him through all his campaigns in India." There is yet another passage regarding the Duke which must be quoted, as the public has always been labouring under the misconception that the piece of land in question was not "added to the gardens of Apsley House," but made over for the common use of the families residing in Hamilton Place:—

[In 1825] the public bristled up threateningly when a strip of ground at Hyde Park Corner was cut off from the Park, and added to the gardens of Apsley House. The Duke of Wellington was by no means popular at the time, and the encroachment caused still more ill feeling against him. Parallels were drawn between the Duke and Marlborough, not as regards generalship, but the erection of their palaces and other points of that kind. There were even those who warmed up an old saying of Lord Townshend concerning the celebrated and unsatisfied Holy Hutchinson; that if his Sovereign gave him all Ireland for his estate, he would beg the Isle of Man for a cabbage garden.—l. 330.

Our authors, strong on every point, are particularly so on the American Revolutionary War. It is commonly held to have commenced about 1775, but it appears that for once the English had taken time by the forelock, and armed several years before. Had Mr. Vernon Harcourt been alive 101 years ago, what would he have said to this cavalier mode of treating the right of assembling in the Parks?—

One day in January 1771 five press-gangs entered the Park, and picked up not less than a hundred and fifty idle fellows; they were sent on board a tender, and made into sailors to fight King George's battles against the rebellious "provincials" in America.—ll. 211.

Previous authors have always held that our ships were manned in January 1771 to frighten the Spaniards about the Falkland Islands; and in the same spirit of ignorance they have also held that George Grenville had something to do with the commencement and George Guelph with the prolongation of the American War. Know from henceforth that from Bunkers Hill to the Alabama Claims all has been owing to Lord North alone. What a bill for consequential damages might be brought against his coachman for not killing him on this occasion!—

At one of these parades in 1773 it happened, as Lord North was passing in his chariot, that his horses took fright when the drums began to beat. They ran away, and a poor washerwoman was run over and killed. Had my lord come to his end instead of the poor laundress, what thousands, nay millions, of lives might have been saved! America might still be an English colony; there would have been no internecine war between North and South; the history of the world would have been very different. But it was otherwise ordained.—l. 223.

This passage, so full of statesmanlike coup d'œil and pious reflection, may possibly be the work of Mr. Larwood alone, but that which precedes it evidently comes from an "employer" smarting from the neglect of his errand-boy to put a letter into the pillar-box. He is speaking of the seventeen-seventies, but the eighteen-seventies are clearly uppermost in his mind:—

There the Guards constantly paraded in all the glittering pomp of gaudy uniforms, whilst the heart-stirring strains of the band awakened no end of martial ardour in the breast of truant City-apprentices. Owing to that music the bands of friendship had been broken between many a journeyman and his master. Many a letter, which required the utmost dispatch, kept pace with the stately tramp of the battalion, &c. &c.—ll. 223.

It is only justice to our authors to exhibit them in another point of view, and show their happy treatment of light and airy subjects. They are, as might have been predicted, immense admirers of the fair sex, and more particularly of their feet and ankles, to which in various places they have devoted many paragraphs. We have only space for the culminating one. Richardson, the author of the "other novels," had said that his eye was never first fixed on a woman's face, but on her feet:—

But Richardson's bashfulness fared well by looking at the feet. Dresses were then worn short, and many a well-turned ankle the bashful novelist must have seen in the upward progress of his survey of the ladies. The high-heeled shoe worn at that period was arch-coquet; it comported with small feet, and led the instep smoothing up to the nervous ankle and the thin heel, above which the hoop's bewitching round just permitted to be seen the finely-tendon'd, firm development of the gastrocnemius. Such ankles were abroad in those days as well as in ours, and must occasionally have struck Mr. Richardson in his passage through the Mall.—ll. 191.

We had marked a few score of passages in which our authors display that just contempt for facts, and dates, and taste, and grammar, which writers of their class can so well afford to exhibit; but we have already exceeded our allotted space, and must bid them a reluctant farewell until such time as we have occasion to welcome their promised History of Advertisements.

FREEMAN'S GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION.*

THIS new book of Mr. Freeman's is, in a phrase familiar to our ears in earlier days, at once little and good. In some hundred and fifty pages of text we are taken in a pleasant and chatty fashion over the whole course of our Constitution, from the moment when it landed on the shores of Britain with our English forefathers to the present day. There is something in the word "Constitution" so suggestive of folios that we own to being a shade over-charmed perhaps by the size of this little volume. To be able to preach a good sermon of ten minutes' duration is, as every person knows, a far harder test of pulpit ability than the being equal to a sermon of sixty minutes; and we are often inclined to think that the same law holds good in literature. But, whether little books are better in the abstract than big books or not, it is certain that they are far rarer. Something of the old "dignity of literature" hangs, above all, about the historical writer; an historian seldom cares to descend into the arena of authorship without a train of some dozen bulky octavos. Our gratitude for his appearance expresses itself for the most part in compliments on his "fulness" and "research," on the profundity of his discussions, and the exhaustive character of his appendices. It is only when we have carefully arranged the massive volumes among the "books without which no gentleman's library is complete," that we venture on a rebellious sigh for a small English History or a diminutive survey of Greek. But Mr. Freeman's book is not only little, it is eminently readable. He thinks proper to apologize for the form of his book, and for the fact that its three portions were originally delivered as Lectures; but the form seems to have had a very happy influence both on his reasoning and on his style. There is hardly a page that smacks of the study. The argument is everywhere clear and direct, the English simple and manly. We have noticed scarcely a single trace of the tendency to diffuseness, to repetition, to digression, to rhetorical exaggeration of tone which is the besetting sin of Mr. Freeman's larger efforts. Throughout the little book, in fact, we see a master of his subject standing face to face with an audience of fairly intelligent English people, and conscious that the first thing he has got to do is to interest them and make them understand him.

* The Growth of the English Constitution, from the Earliest Times. By Edward A. Freeman, M.A., Hon. D.C.L., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. London: Macmillan & Co. 1872.

The combativeness which to a reader is one of Mr. Freeman's most amusing characteristics, as to a critic it is one of his most embarrassing, comes in here happily enough. There is a humorous impartiality in the way in which the author deals his blows, first at the Conservative and then at the Radical, now at the traditional pedantry of the lawyer, and then at the theorist's contempt for tradition. Even amongst the horrors of the Reign of Terror we smile at the death-cart which carries off Hébertist and Royalist, the Vendéan noble and the disciple of Péro Duchesne, to the same guillotine. We can fancy something of the same grim smile hovering over Mr. Freeman's lips as he gibbets in successive pages Judge Blackstone and the Revolution of 1789. The most ardent of Radicals would be satisfied by his exposure of the recent origin and historical ignorance of modern Toryism, while the crassest of Tories would bestow a round of Kentish fire on his raid against "abstract theory." France is of course the terrible example of what "abstract theory" comes to:—

Our national Assembly has changed its name and its constitution, but its corporate identity has lived on unbroken. We can therefore at any moment reform without destroying. In France, on the other hand, institutions have been the work of abstract theory; they have been the creations, for good or for evil, of the minds of individual men. The English Parliament is immemorial; it grew step by step out of the older order of things. In France the older order of things utterly vanished; the ground lay open for the creation of a wholly new institution, and the States-General were called into being at the bidding of Philip the Fair. Englishmen in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries had no theories of the rights of man or of universal humanity. But when they saw a practical grievance, they called for its redress. Frenchmen in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries had theories as magnificent as any that have been put forth in the eighteenth or the nineteenth. And they had even then already learned to do deeds of blood in the name of freedom and philanthropy. Therefore French institutions have not lasted. The States-General lived but a fitful life from century to century, and they perished for ever in the Great Revolution. Since that time no French institution, no form either of the legislative or of the executive power, has been able to keep up a continuous being of twenty years.

We are always a little on our guard when Englishmen pique themselves on their practical qualities, and we are tempted to be a little over-critical perhaps in the face of patriotic outbursts. But even if we grant the correctness of Mr. Freeman's "abstract theory" of our constitutional superiority, what are we to say to his facts? Unless Wat Tyler and the Lollards go for nothing, "Englishmen in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries" were very far from having "no theories of the rights of man or of universal humanity." On the contrary, we should have said that the purely social and political, as distinct from the purely religious, form of the assertion of "the rights of man" really originated with Englishmen of the fourteenth century. "When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then the gentleman?" was a rhyme of English invention, but it contains in it all the "abstract theory" of the French Revolution. Would it not, in fact, be truer to say that even as revolutionists the French of '89 were mere pillagers of other people's ideas, and that all they did was to throw certain abstract theories which they had derived from England into practical shape? The theories of social equality which originated with the Lollards were transmitted by them to the after Reformers, to La Boetie, to Montaigne, and to Jean-Jacques Rousseau. The notion of a "social contract" certainly came from Locke. The actual type of Republican government was derived from our Great Rebellion. We are not saying that the French knew how to wear the clothes they ran off with, or that they did not cut them into very odd forms, but the clothes were originally our own. We had hoped, indeed, that the German war, and the sudden discovery that a people can be at once speculative and practical in the highest degree, had knocked on the head the current English notion that there was any necessary opposition between the keenest love of abstract theories and the firmest hold of practical facts. Our own notion of the secret of English liberty and its constitutional progress is that it lies in the steady union of the two. A mere worship of the forms of the past would surely have landed us where such a worship landed Germany, in a feeble pedantry of "customs," which had neither life nor strength to resist the social changes of time. A mere contempt for them would possibly, if Mr. Freeman will have it so, have left us as anarchical as France. But in the three great formative epochs of our Constitution a reverence for the traditions of the past was made broad and living, not merely by a practical sense of present necessities, but by a deep conviction of abstract human right. Behind Earl Simon of Montfort stood the speculative philosophy of the schoolmen and the uncommonly "abstract theories" of the Friars. The great political manifesto of the time which Mr. Wright has printed in his Political Songs, and from which Mr. Freeman has given one striking extract in his notes, bases the claims of popular freedom on an ideal quite as much as on an historical foundation. In the same way the "abstract theory" of the inherent liberty and royalty of men as children of God gave its fire and energy to the "love of precedents" which marked the Great Rebellion. Pym's speeches are just as speculative as they are practical. And no one has yet doubted the influence of Locke on the Revolution of 1688.

But while we reserve our adhesion to Mr. Freeman's "abstract theory" of the Constitution, we are quite ready to let him work his will, even if it be a somewhat wicked will, on the lawyers. A silent memory of extorted six-and-eightpences seems to edge the historian's comments on the constitutional blunders originated and perpetuated by "a profession which, in our present artificial state of society, we certainly cannot do without." If Mr. Freeman had not assured us of his aversion to abstract theories, we might fancy him sighing here after a natural society like that of Jean-Jacques, where lawyers and six-and-eightpences should be no more. As it is, however, we live in a world of lawyers, and lawyers have for a long time had the framing of our constitutional notions, as well as of our marriage settlements. As to their work in the first respect, Mr. Freeman is very emphatic indeed:—

The lawyer's tendency is to carry to an unreasonable extent that English love of precedent which, within reasonable bounds, is one of our most precious safeguards. His virtue is that of acute and logical inference from given premises; the premises themselves he is commonly satisfied to take without examination from those who have gone before him. It is often wonderful to see the amazing ingenuity with which lawyers have piled together inference upon inference, starting from some purely arbitrary assumption of their own. Each stage of the argument, taken by itself, is absolutely unanswerable; the objection must be taken earlier, before the argument begins. The argument is perfect, if we only admit the premises; the only unlucky thing is that the premises will constantly be found to be historically worthless. Add to this that the natural tendency of the legal mind is to conservatism and deference to authority. This will always be the case, even with thoroughly honest men in an age when honesty is no longer dangerous. But this tendency will have tenfold force in times when an honest setting forth of the Law might expose its author to the disfavour of an arbitrary government. We shall therefore find that the premises from which lawyers' arguments have started, but which historical study shows to be unsound, are commonly premises devised in favour of the prerogative of the Crown, not in favour of the rights of the people. Indeed the whole ideal conception of the Sovereign, as one, personally at least, above the Law, as one personally irresponsible and incapable of doing wrong, the whole conception of the Sovereign as the sole fountain of all honour, as the original grantor of all property, as the source from which all authority of every kind issues in the first instance, is purely a lawyer's conception, and rests upon no ground whatever in the records of our early history.

It is the aim of the last chapter of Mr. Freeman's book to show in how many instances modern progress has consisted in simply upsetting the practical deductions which lawyers had drawn from their constitutional premises. "The lawgiver has directly stepped in to wipe out the inventions of the lawyer, and modern Acts of Parliament have brought things back to the simpler principles of our earliest forefathers." Thus it is that recent legislation has done away with the supposed necessity for a cessation of Parliamentary life at the death of the sovereign whose writs had called together the three Estates of the Realm. As Mr. Freeman points out, such a cessation would have seemed as inconvenient and ridiculous to Godwine or Harold as it seems to us. So in the yet more important matter of the succession to the Crown, the Revolution of 1688 simply restored to the nation the old constitutional right of setting aside an unworthy monarch, and freely choosing another within the limits of the existing royal family which it had possessed before the Conquest. An instance of more direct interest just now is found by Mr. Freeman in our recent legislation in the matter of the "Crown Lands," and we can only hope that Mr. Disraeli will take the trouble to read the few pages devoted to this subject before favouring us with any more of the prodigious nonsense which he has been uttering of late respecting the Royal revenue. The "domain of the Crown" was in the beginning of our annals simply the property of the people at large, and it was only through the growth of the Royal power that the folk-land of earlier charters changed into the Terra Regis of Domesday. From the First William to the Third it undoubtedly remained the personal property of the King, to be dealt with according to his own personal pleasure, though even during this period Mr. Freeman might have fairly pointed out that it bore a large part of what are now called "public charges," and that in fact subsidies and aids were only in theory supposed to be called for to cover its deficiencies. That it was ever the property of a sovereign as Woburn Abbey is the property of the Duke of Bedford is an absurdity which we must leave to Cabinet Ministers. Anyhow the wrong, such as it was, has been redressed. "A custom as strong as law now requires that at the beginning of each fresh reign the Sovereign shall, not by an act of bounty, but by an act of justice, restore to the nation the land which the nation lost so long ago." In a word the Legislature has redressed the deductions of the feudal lawyer, and the Terra Regis has once more become "folk-land."

The book is so short and is such pleasant reading that we need give only a brief indication of the general line of inquiry which Mr. Freeman has followed. His conception of the Constitution is mainly that of Burke, though it rests on a far firmer and more historic basis. In other words, he looks for the true explanation of our present forms of government to the tradition and progress of the past, and for the mould of our political life to the shape assumed by the earliest English society. He points out that the peculiarity of our own political life is simply this—that while in the original land of the Teutons the old Teutonic institutions have all but vanished, in England they have remained practically unchanged. The old constitution of the English conquerors of Britain, indeed, was necessarily modified by the circumstances of the conquest, by the increase of slavery, the growth of a military aristocracy, the heightening of Royal power which the invasion and the after warfare of the English amongst themselves brought with them. Still greater modifications followed on the conquest of the Norman, but still throughout both the main features of English freedom were wonderfully preserved. The Great Council was the Witenagemot under a feudal name, and the Parliament of Edward was simply an expansion of the Great Council. By a happy fortune the foreign temper and the personal worthlessness of our Angevin rulers enabled conquered and conquerors to rally as one people round the free traditions of the past, and to embody them in the Charter, while the very necessities of the Crown brought about the convocation and development of Parliaments. Much, again, hung on the form which Parliament assumed, and this was in the main determined by social circumstances; by the power of the clergy, which led them to decline acting as an Estate of the realm, and by the absence of any "caste" feeling of nobility, which led to the union of the lesser landowners with the merchant class in the House of Commons. Oddly enough, as Mr. Freeman ingeniously points out, the "bicameral" arrangement, so much praised and imitated by the constitutional doctrinaires of the Continent, is a purely accidental arrangement. With the reign of Edward, though he has briefly continued his sketch as far as the Reformation, Mr. Freeman's lectures practically end. "Our later constitutional history," he says, "rather belongs to an inquiry of another kind. It is mainly a record of silent changes in the practical working of institutions whose outward or legal form remained untouched," and of these changes he has only touched on a few which illustrate the relations of Parliament to the Crown. We may perhaps hope for a fuller treatment of this later topic at some future time; meanwhile we can only thank Mr. Freeman for what he has actually given us. It would be easy, of course, in traversing a subject so pregnant with difficulties, to find points in which we might dissent from his statements or inferences. In dwelling on the identity of earlier and later institutions Mr. Freeman has sometimes, we think, missed their differences. He has hardly pressed the new aspect given by feudalism to the older Witenagemot in its reappearance in the King's Council. He has certainly exaggerated, we think, the earlier ecclesiastical supremacy of the Crown. The supremacy of Theodore over all England was earlier than that of any English king, his national Councils than any national "Gemot"; and though at a later time the two Legislatures merged, so far as persons were concerned, into one, their action remained distinct to the end. The meeting of the Wise Men simply changed itself into an ecclesiastical Council when ecclesiastical matters came on; but this is not quite the same thing as the ordering of ecclesiastical matters by a secular assembly. So, too, noble as is Mr. Freeman's sketch of Earl Simon, and grudging as is the eulogy of Professor Stubbs, we are not sure that in a purely legal light the Professor is not in the right, and we suspect that the Earl's real merit consisted rather in "standing as a pillar" when other men fell away in the long and weary struggle for freedom, than in any constitutional originality. The "legal" character of Henry VIII. is admirably drawn out as one of the causes of the revival of Parliamentary life under the Tudors; but we miss the obvious cause of the Tudor fidelity to Parliamentary institutions in the fact that their title rested, in a way in which no other Royal title rested, on a Parliamentary basis. But we merely point out a few differences of opinion such as these to enable us to express all the more strongly our opinion of Mr. Freeman's lectures. No book could possibly be more useful to students of our constitutional history, or a more pleasant means of conveying information about it to the public at large.

ESSAYS BY THE AUTHOR OF "VÉRA."

THE two novels by the author or authoress of these essays—for though we shall adhere to the masculine pronoun we feel some doubt on the point—have already been favourably noticed in our columns. But the gifts of a novelist and of an essayist are different, though not incompatible, and it is in the former capacity that the writer chiefly excels. His new volume consists of half-a-dozen articles reprinted from the Edinburgh Review, two from the North British, and a few, of slighter texture, from other periodicals. And we may as well say at once, as the practice of republishing ephemeral pieces of this kind is on the increase, and bids fair to become something of a nuisance, that we do not think the present collection has a sufficient raison d'être. The articles which compose it are for the most part respectable, and some of them more than respectable, as such; but they do not display any such originality of thought or special information as to give them permanent literary interest. It is very difficult to understand why the two North British articles on "English Vers de Société," and "Modern Provençal Poems," which hardly rise above the level of commonplace, and are not free from strange mistakes, should have been held worthy of a second lease of life, while even the readers of Good Words must have been disappointed with the flimsy and superficial notice of "Christmas Carols," if they happened to know anything of a branch of hymnology in which our old English literature is peculiarly rich and felicitous. There are other papers, no doubt, of a higher type than these, as we shall proceed to show; and one of the most appreciative, a review of Le Mauché, may be said to have derived fresh interest from recent occurrences in the French Church. Still we can hardly think it deserved the honour of republication. The two lines of study to which the author appears to have addicted himself are the artistic and the quasi-theological, or perhaps we should rather say, if so barbarous a compound may be admitted, the historico-ecclesiastical; and it is in this last that he is most at home. His comments on Albert Dürer and Rubens indicate more appreciation of artists than of art. Both painters are mainly "considered in the historical point of view," and when the writer says of the latter that he was not only a great painter but a great man, he is evidently explaining what to him is the real attraction about them. The paper on Albert Dürer is, in fact, little more than a biographical sketch, and as such it will repay perusal. It is pleasant to find Albert Dürer and Raffaele carrying on a friendly intercourse and cherishing a mutual admiration for each other, and curious, if true, that the famous "Spasimo di Sicilia" should have been suggested by a drawing of Albert Dürer's. That he was a man of deeply religious feeling no one at all familiar with his works can doubt, but it may not be as generally known that he had a strong sympathy with Luther in his original protest against "the un-Obstinate Papacy," and an earnest desire for the union of "the Indians and Muscovites, the Russian and Greek Churches, which by the greed and devices of the Popes, and by a hypocritical zeal, have been sundered." In dealing with Rubens the author makes some attempt at artistic criticism, but it is still the character of the man, rather than of his painting, that is mainly dwelt upon. The "ferocity and occasional grossness" of his workmanship is fully admitted, but too favourable an estimate on the whole is given. Of Rubens' power there can be no doubt, but his very best pictures—even the "Descent from the Cross"—are marred by a certain coarseness of conception, if not of touch, which disturbs the devotional impression. The revolting grossness and vulgarity of many of his principal paintings, which no visitor of the old "Pinakothek" of Munich is likely to forget, is the more surprising, as his life, unlike that of Raffaele and some other great masters of the art, was irreproachable. The following passage is one of the happiest in the essay upon him:—

In his taste for planting and building, his love of animals and his sympathy with them, some critics have found that he resembled Sir Walter Scott, while a curious contrast has been also pointed out between him and Fuseli. The one heated his brain by debauchery, and then produced pictures which might have been the work of a monk of the desert, half crazed by solitude and abstinence; the other, who was careful even in meats and drinks, was apt to paint like a voluptuary and a libertine. Rubens was an honourable, but not what we should call an earnest man; he is never pathetic, never tender, often fierce, occasionally vulgar, sometimes sublime. His was not the imaginative, the salutary, or the meditative genius; action was his forte, life was strong in him, and owing perhaps to his happy and perfect physique, he was never morbid and never discouraged; his work, when it came complete from his hands, never seemed to him to be but the poor caricature of his conceptions—on the contrary, it fulfilled them. His were "the distinct, the precise, the strong propensities, and the genial power of nature," which, Milton tells us, led him to the writing of his great epic; but his was not the "hallowed fire" which the poet sought. If some of his religious pieces are treated with reverence as well as power, at other times it would almost seem as if "things human had prejudiced things Divine."

In the articles on Anjou, and on the Memoirs of Madame du Plessis-Mornay, the writer breaks ground in what is evidently a very favourite subject with him, the religious history of France, both Catholic and Protestant. He tells us, justly enough, that the French Reformation failed from having no root in the political and national life of the country, and therefore nothing to oppose to the splendid traditions and lofty character and position of the Gallican Church. But to say that "Protestantism was as much a moral revolution in France as it was in England, or Germany, or Holland," betrays an odd confusion of ideas. It was far less of a moral force than in Germany, where it at once expressed and remoulded the whole national character; and it was more of a moral force than the contemporary movement in England, which had a purely political origin, and was at first crammed down the throats of the people whose moral and religious life it afterwards so profoundly influenced. In France, on the other hand, with no aid from the Government, and in the teeth of the national traditions, the Reformation spread with almost unexampled rapidity among all classes. "It had among its disciples the greatest captains, artists, and craftsmen of the age," and for a time "one half the Royal family and one half of the nobility were pitted against the other half." Yet it never really gained possession of the national mind; and thus, while the fires of Smithfield turned the scale against the creed of the persecutors in England, the massacre of St. Bartholomew only forced the persecuted into a false and unpatriotic attitude; and the dragonnades of Louis XIV., which drove thousands of Protestants from the country, also resulted in the conversion of some fifty thousand of those who remained to the dominant Church. The author gives a graphic sketch of three prominent apostles of the later period of French Calvinism—Claude Brousson, "the martyr"; Jean Cavalier, the inspired shepherd boy of Anduze, who, however, retired from his early apostleship to take service in the English army, and became Governor of Jersey; and Antoine Court, who began his ministry at eighteen, and continued it till his death, at the age of sixty-five. More interesting, in a literary sense, is the notice of the famous preacher Bourin; and here we can entirely endorses the writer's eulogistic, but not too flattering, estimate. Saurin's sermons well deserve to take rank with the great masterpieces of French pulpit oratory, though they are not as widely known as they ought to be. It is no exaggeration to say that they were "written for all time, and never go out of date," and we are not at all surprised to learn that the Abbé Pichon prepared a volume of extracts from them for the use of the faithful, and that many were preached just as they stood by Jesuit fathers in Parisian churches. They contain, in fact, very little that might not be proclaimed without offence, and to the general edification of the hearer, from any pulpit, Catholic or Protestant; the style is singularly pure and vigorous, and the tone throughout is one of unmistakable earnestness, without ever becoming mawkish.

* Essays. By the Author of "Véra" and "The Hôtel du Petit St-Jean." London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1872.

The paper which throws most light on the present condition of the French Church, and which acquires an additional significance when read in the light of the movement recently started by Dr. Michaud, is that on "French Anti-clerical Novels," originally published in the Edinburgh six years ago, as a review of two anonymous stories of somewhat earlier date, which had a considerable run at the time, not only in France, but beyond it. We are not aware whether the incognito of "the Abbé —" has ever been pierced by the general public, but it was well known from the first to the initiated few that the author of Le Maudit and La Religieuse really was what he professed to be, a priest, and not a suspended priest. Internal evidence alone would indeed be quite conclusive as to the clerical authorship of the volumes. To pronounce in detail on the correctness of the picture drawn is not equally easy, but there can be no doubt of its being based on at least a large substratum of truth. The fact of many hundred suspended priests being employed at Paris as cabmen and compositors has since then been publicly affirmed on unimpeachable testimony. Many of them may of course have been unfrocked for moral offences, which are sure to occur from time to time among a poor and illiterate clergy, recruited mainly from the peasant classes, and bound under a stringent law of celibacy; but even the milder experience of episcopal rule over curates in England—and every French curé, "since the Revolution destroyed the revenues and the Concordat sold the liberties of the Gallican Church," is as completely at the mercy of his bishop as an Anglican curate—would lead us to suspect that instances of arbitrary tyranny and caprice must also be of very frequent occurrence. Cardinal Bonnehose revealed as much when he informed the Senate that "the Bishop gives the word of command and the clergy march." The reviewer's summary of Le Maudit suggests, we may be pretty sure, no mere fancy picture:—

He [the anonymous author] has traced with an unflinching hand the workings of the whole system. He has not only stigmatized the Jesuits, but he has shown us an inferior clergy illiterate and prejudiced, an unhappy order of men without liberty and without independence of thought, abjectly subject to the civil power whose stipendiaries they are, and unprotected from the tyranny or obsessions of their spiritual chiefs. The higher orders in the Church do not come out of the picture in more favourable colours. Vicars-general are seen intriguing with the Jesuits against their diocessans, bishops swayed between fear and hatred of the Company of Jesus, along with prelates whose eyes turn to Rome, and who buy the good offices of the Reverend Fathers, as a means of procuring the hat, and the additional 1,600*l.* a year, which is due to a cardinal and an ex-officio senator of France. Add to this a sketch of the preaching friars, as personified by the Père Basile, and the glimpses at the interior of the Gesù in Le Maudit, with the more disgusting episode of the "Carmelite Confessor" in La Religieuse, and it is not difficult to realize the effect of these books on the clerical party. The unknown Abbé holds the mirror up to all abuses, and by unmasking hypocrisy has made as many enemies as there are hypocrites in the Church.

The disagreeable details of the "Abbé —"s tale will probably be in the recollection of many of our readers, and we need not anyhow repeat them here. But it is impossible not to feel that later events have done much to vindicate his veracity. And it is curious, in view of the programme now put forward by the Old Catholic leaders in France and Germany, to turn to the "conditions of their apostleship" prescribed by the mysterious reformer eight or nine years ago to those willing to join him in building up "the Church of the future." Apart from the injunction "never to break with Rome," which seems practically incompatible with carrying out any of the rest, it differs little from the Munich and Paris manifestoes of to-day, except in being more oratorical and less precise. The essayist, after citing it, inquires whether such a programme is practicable, and what would be its results, but cautiously refrains from any attempt to answer his own question. We shall be content to imitate his reticence, and reproduce the proposed scheme of reform without note or comment. It runs thus:—

To remain in the visible Church; to belong to her soul, to the best part of her, to her real life. To accept of her worship as it is at present (since worship is transformable in its nature, and may be modified by time, till it returns to the simplicity of primitive ages).

Never to break with Rome or with episcopacy. This is the capital point. Popes and bishops sit in the chair of Peter, as the princes among priests sit in the days of the synagogue in the chair of Moses. They must be loved and respected, for an immense number of these men of the old Church are men of virtue, and it is among them that the new Church must find her apostles.

To separate ourselves plainly and openly from the fanatical Ultramontane sect; to unmask its dangerous anti-evangelical spirit; to break formally with these Pharisees of the latter days, who are the curse of Christian society, because they discredit Christianity, and render it odious to simple people who are not hostile, but indifferent, to the grand doctrines of the Gospel.

To stigmatize these hypocrites of the new Law, to show them like their fathers of the old Law, paying their piteous mint and camlin, and pursuing with implacable hatred the true worshippers of God; whitened sepulchres waiting their rosaries to be seen of men, and to pass for saints.

This is the new work. It is great and bold, but it is lawful.

We will have no schism; for schism is isolation, and a loss of strength. No heresies . . . the one which has to be combated is the substitution of man for God; when we exaggerate the rights granted by Christ to the head of His Church.

To remain invincible in the orthodox Catholic faith; there lies our strength, and we will dogmatize in nothing. . . . We must be impassible and patient.

A COLONIST ON COLONIAL POLICY.*

A late lamented Judge, who found classical English adequate for the expression of his ideas, used to protest emphatically against the modern, and as he called it frightful, word "ignore." Our regret for his decease may be mitigated by observing that he was taken from us before the horrific compound "ignorement" was introduced into our midst by a Canadian for the more effectual castigation of Mr. Goldwin Smith. The book before us advocates a federation of England and her colonies; but if each colonial deputy is intended to bring his vocabulary along with him to London, we should tremble at the oratorical possibilities of a central Congress. "The parliament of man, the federation of the world," may be poetically beautiful, but it is in a philological point of view alarming. The author urges with some reason that increased facilities of communication have rendered his proposal more feasible than when it was first discussed, but if we are to be "railed" and "wired," and to have "cablegrams" transmitted to us, it becomes seriously doubtful whether the proposed federation would not be a nuisance. There is, however, one point of view in which the author places this question which will be generally interesting. He argues that the choice must ultimately lie between some sort of federation and emancipation, and he shows that there is a large and increasing amount of British capital invested in colonial securities, the safety of which might be seriously affected by emancipation. He estimates the total of Colonial Government securities at 60,000,000*l.*, nearly the whole of which is held by residents in the United Kingdom; and besides, there are colonial railways and other miscellaneous enterprises in which he calculates that British capital has been invested to the amount of 40,000,000*l.* Thus we have a total of 100,000,000*l.* due by the colonies to British investors, and this sum is likely to increase, as may be inferred from the facility with which a loan of 1,000,000*l.* to New Zealand has lately been subscribed in London. Without hinting that any emancipated colony would be likely to adopt a policy of repudiation, it may be said that the safety of these investments would be impaired by colonial independence. The value of any public security is dependent on the maintenance of internal order and external safety by the country which has issued it, and it is by no means certain that these conditions would be fulfilled by the new nations. As regards Australia and New Zealand, reliance might indeed be placed on the Scotch proverb "'tis a far cry to Lochawe." An external enemy would have to travel a long way to attack them, but they might quarrel among themselves. Speaking generally, we may say that war abroad and civil strife at home are possible consequences of emancipation. Nations involved in either of these pursuits do not pay much regard to the claims of foreign creditors, for the simple reason that they cannot. But even an amount of disturbance short of foreign or internal war would suffice to endanger the safety of colonial securities. The author seasonably reminds us of the Erie scandal. It is, he says, the fruit of a social and political organization similar to that which, under the most favourable circumstances, would be induced by emancipation. If England does not desire to see such results, let her retain her hold on the colonies. Whilst she does so there is not much danger of invasion from abroad, and there is none of disorder within. "Her influence," says the author, "supplies precisely the conservative force which is needed to prevent young communities rushing headlong into a career of democratic innovation which cannot fail to result disastrously; and if any injustice should be done to the investors, they have always open an appeal to the House of Lords, which tribunal they can safely rely on to rectify it." We may remark here that we could wish that the conservative influence of England might extend to the language as well as the institutions of her colonies, and we hope that the faith which this Colonist expresses in the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal may not be made an excuse for leaving it unreformed. Speaking accurately, an appeal from a colonial Court would not go to the House of Lords, but to the Privy Council; but the argument which we would found upon the Colonist's language remains the same. It is surely worth any cost or any trouble to ourselves to provide for the colonies a Court of ultimate appeal which may thoroughly deserve that confidence which they are desirous to bestow. In this point of view the folly of our Government in higgling about the salary of a Judge's clerk appears amazing. There never was a stronger instance of that misplaced economy which is ruinous. The best judicial ability is so rare an article that a country with the wealth and responsibility of England ought to be willing to buy it at almost any price. It is the fruit of diligent cultivation of high natural capacity. A deceased Judge was fond of saying to a colleague, "We know the law. We learned it when we were young. We are not like some others who have to pick it up as they go along." This article, as we have said, is rare in England, and there is much reason to fear that it is dying out in the United States. To use familiar language, law is being swallowed up in jaw. No reader of American newspapers can fail to observe that American Judges are falling more and more into the habit, which is not quite unknown in England, of talking for effect. Indeed a Judge who may be at the bar to-morrow can hardly resist the temptation to make a speech occasionally for himself. The decline of law as a science in America may also be inferred from the production of the Indirect Claims. Among ourselves it would be difficult, even if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were willing to pay handsomely for judicial ability, to find as much of it as is required for the highest class of appeals, particularly now that a demand has arisen for arbitrators of insolvent Companies. But let us do the best we can, regardless of expense, to justify the confidence which this Colonist expresses in our English Court of ultimate appeal. And let us remember, when we are reckoning the cost of the connexion of the colonies with England, that their emancipation might place 100,000,000 of English capital in jeopardy.

* A Colonist on the Colonial Question. By John Matheson, of Toronto, Canada. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

It is impossible to estimate the consequences of increased facility of rapid communication between distant places. The author urges that, as some English colonies are almost as near to London as some parts of the United States are to Washington, it is not unreasonable to consider some plan of federation such as he proposes. But it will be soon enough to consider other practical objections to this plan when the existing difficulty of distance has been removed. We prefer to dwell with unqualified approbation on those parts of his book which insist on the necessity of maintaining, and, if possible, of strengthening, the connexion between the mother-country and her colonies. Those who are agreed that this is to be our end are not likely to quarrel as to the means. All that we see and hear of colonists and colonial life goes to show that only gross mismanagement can make the colonies disloyal. It is a proof of the power of distance to lend enchantment to the view, that this Colonist is able to believe in the efficiency, not only of the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal, but of the War Office as a source of discipline and consistent policy. We can only hope that the guidance for which he looks would be as certainly forthcoming as the resources which he promises. These resources, he says, would be very insignificant if isolated, but would become most formidable if united with those of the mother-country. Large armies of colonial militia could be kept on foot ready to move at a moment's warning to repel local attack; and in case a reserve force was established throughout the Empire, liable to be drafted into the line in case of war, the colonies would already be entitled to furnish one-fifth of it. As regards the quality of colonial militia, we may remark that it would be difficult to improve on the posterity of those soldiers of the Black Watch who settled in Nova Scotia after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. "The gain in naval resources would be still greater than that in military force. The Canadian mercantile marine is now the fourth in the world. The British American fisheries must always nurture a race of hardy seamen." Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are marked by nature as seats of shipping industry. The immediate accession of strength in both departments would be very great, but the prospective gain would be far greater. The population of the more important colonies has been doubling itself every twenty years, and the growth of wealth has been still more rapid than that of numbers. The author has an easy task in arguing that the mother-country ought, as a matter of policy, to associate to herself the naval and military resources of her colonies. "Gold," he says, "cannot be relied on to stop the advance of iron, but still less can rhetoric." The events of the last two years have forcibly inculcated the lesson that only the most complete naval and military organization can give national security, and the author contends that this organization might be most perfectly attained by England in federation with her colonies. We, however, adopt many of his statements without committing ourselves to his conclusion. Indeed we cannot think of this proposal of federation without perceiving the difficulties to which it must give rise. The House of Commons cannot get through the business which it now undertakes, and therefore it is impossible to suppose that one Assembly could legislate for this country and its colonies. The author is so kind as to propose that the Imperial Parliament might discharge its federal and national duties in separate Sessions; but there is a limit to the number of hours' work that can be got out of a day, and to the number of months that an Englishman who can afford to go anywhere else can be induced to remain in London. The colonists are in no respect more truly English than in their love of sport, and therefore they would cheerfully admit the claim of grouse and pheasants to be considered in legislative arrangements. Then, again, the author's idea of constituting an Upper Chamber is crude and uneatisfactory. He would have some members elected and others nominated, and "a few hereditary seats might perhaps be sprinkled in with advantage, to keep alive the principle." Certainly the principle should be kept alive, for we believe that an able man would govern a colony more successfully if he happened to be a peer. At present the colonies are too widely separated for federation, and until the rapidity of travelling has been greatly increased they will remain so. We cannot therefore be accused of shirking an immediate duty if we decline to discuss the details of any scheme of federation. But we can assure the author that he has our entire sympathy in protesting, as he emphatically does, against the mere utilitarian view of the relation between this country and her colonies. The notion that the value of this relation is to be measured by the result of a balance-sheet is not likely to become popular. Feeling and imagination, as well as figures, have to be considered in determining national policy. England and her colonies have hitherto constituted a great nation, and it is the hope and intention of the vast majority of Englishmen to maintain the glorious inheritance which their fathers have transmitted to them.

CAREY'S COMMONPLACE BOOK OF EPIGRAMS.*

IT is quite time that editors understood in what the task of compiling an epigram-book consists, for the last ten years have seen two very creditable collections—one by the Rev. John Booth, the other by the Rev. H. P. Dodd. In each of these an endeavour has been made, with more or less success, to trace home to its author each epigram that is given; and in Mr. Dodd's book there is also a biographic notice of every epigrammatist who is cited. Of course these editors do not pretend to have presented to the public anything like an exhaustive collection; neither can they be said to have appropriated even a tithe of the bright, pithy, pointed things that are born every day in society and in club-life. But they satisfy between them a desideratum which had been previously felt; and, more than this, they establish a standard for those who shall come after them, and raise a bar which ought to exclude henceforth all faint and perfunctory bookmakers. Among such we do not hesitate to reckon Mr. Charles Stokes Carey. To say that there is no amusement, no novelty, nothing neat in it, would be a bold assertion, and one which would condemn a fair number of epigrammatists whom he has consigned to an ignoble prison-house within the covers of his book; but most certainly it would be hard to find a professed Commonplace Book of Epigrams so evidently put together without the knowledge requisite to the task, and so deficient of taste, grace, salt, and refinement. There are not a few lovers of literature who hold epigram at its best unduly cheap; what will they think if such a volume as that before us demonstrates that the task of compilations imply consists in stringing together nameless snatches of verse, longer and shorter, upon a dozen or more different threads? and this so carelessly that such trumpery and vulgar jokes as "Tulips and Roses" do double duty under the heads of "Amatory Epigrams" and "Epigrams on Marriage" (see p. 22 and p. 39), and "the pale lady" whose "rose is gone to paint her husband's nose" appears in p. 35 as an "Epigram of Marriage," and in p. 133 amongst "Ungallant Epigrams"? We have counted up in the volume more than half-a-dozen of the old stock trivialities which every schoolboy would discard were he seeking matter for a valentine—e.g., the suggestion to a lady to leave out the g in "gloves," and the comparison (a ne plus ultra of bathos) of love to a cobbler's awl. But these are sins of carelessness, it may be said, or they merely show a too catholic liberality of choice. The editor may have laid himself out to provide wares to suit every taste amongst his customers. Let us, then, look a little further, and ask whether Mr. Carey really understands the article he undertakes to purvey, and how far he fulfils the promise of his own preface. It is true that this promise is limited to the admission of "only such epigrams as have point, pith, and power," but by implication it commits him to the ideal of his poetical Introduction, where the first definition of an epigram is

A dwarfish whole,
Its body brevity, and wit its soul.

Does the compilation before us evince a recognition of the first of these essentials? In p. 141, amongst "Ungallant Epigrams," figures at full length Goldsmith's "Madame Blaise, the glory of her sex"; in p. 161, amongst "Historical Epigrams," we have a stanza from Childe Harold about the Maid of Saragossa. Long extracts from the Biglow Papers are made to do duty for "Political Epigrams," and if we go back to "Amatory Epigrams," we shall find vers de société by Herrick, Moore, Sir C. H. Williams, and Mr. Theodore Martin, it being apparently no disqualification that they run into several stanzas, and here and there fill the best part of a page. It is a ridiculous manner to call these pieces epigrams, even if, as is not always the case, they had an epigrammatic element in their composition; and it betrays utter dulness of perception as to the true scope of an epigram collector. Yet this might be forgiven were the body of the work composed of real and transparent wit, so set before the reader that he could see that the collector appreciated it. Is this, however, to be said of one who can admit into his collection such a type of epigram as the following, in which we scarcely know which to execrate most, the rhythm, the grammar, or the false point?—

A thief stole a tea-pot in a window placed:
Both pot and thief excessively were chased,
And after being taken, as they tell,
Were both of them directly sent to cell.
Still they were both alike, both still were suited,
For each of them was highly executed.

For the sake of an obscure play on words six lines are strung together, showing the writer's willingness to sacrifice sense, neatness, and good English to a catchpenny double entendre. It is much the same with an epigram on "Auricular Confession," and "growing Brighton Auriculars," which we hope and trust, for the credit of our comic contemporary, never really appeared in Punch. A much better epigram, and one more worthy to be preserved, is the Cambridge one "On Three Sons," to be found among the epigrams on Law and Lawyers; but even here we suspect that carelessness has done its worst in the dishing-up. The editor prefaces it with the explanation, "Mr. Baron Alderson and Mr. Justice Patterson held naizes at Cambridge, when Mr. Gunson was appointed to preach the naize sermon." Now, though the epigram requires that we should call the Judge Pateron, and thus far take a liberty with his surname, there was surely no occasion for Mr. Carey to mis-call him Patterson. Now for the epigram itself:—

* A Commonplace Book of Epigrams, Analytically Arranged. Compiled by Charles Stokes Carey, Editor of "Lord Chesterfield's Letters to his Son." London: William Tegg, 1872.

A Baron, a Justice, a Preacher—sons three;
The preacher, the son of a Gun is he;
The Baron, he is the son of a tree;
Whose son the Justice is I can't well see,
But read him Pateron, and all will agree That the son of his father the Justice must be.

Obviously either the editor or the writer has suffered from an imperfect ear for rhythm, or the fourth line would have run

Whose son is the Justice I cannot well see;

and the fifth line, with its point, should have precluded the possibility of mistaking how Justice Patterson's name should be spelt. We suspect that the faults of the epigram as here presented to us are attributable to the editor; and the more so as there are many signs of carelessness in the volume. Take the epigram on a Topping Club in p. 129, and can it be supposed that its anonymous authors ever turned it out as it stands in Mr. Carey's book:—

The jolly members of a topping club,
Like pipe-staves are but hoop'd;
And in a close confederacy link
For nothing else but only to hold drink.

According to all appearances the first two lines were meant, like the pair that follow, to be a couplet; and it can hardly be that the second has not been cruelly maimed in its presentment. Be this, however, as it may, there is certainly a prima facie case against a collector who (p. 178) can suffer the first line of Porson's epigram to stand

Venit ad Euphratim rapidis perterritus undis;

who (p. 98) can talk of a man's taking up a D.D. degree; and who to Lord Nouves's epigram—

We grease the axle that it may not creak;
We grease the lawyer's palm to make him speak—can prefix no apter heading than "Money commands eloquence," ignoring thus the contrast of the effects of "greasing" in the two cases.

It were easy to multiply the list of Mr. Carey's sins against metro and grammar, and against accuracy of reading and rhyme; but we forbear in consideration of the sprinkling of good epigrams which, his luck being not uniformly bad, have found a place along with bad and indifferent ones. Among the better sort are—

WINGED TIME.

"Tell me," said Laura, "what may be The difference 'twixt a clock and me?"
"Laura," I cried, "Love prompts my powers
To do the task you've set them;
A clock reminds us of the hours;
You cause us to forget them."

And this upon "Equality of Taxation":—

"Taxes are equal, is a dogma which I'll prove at once," exclaimed a Tory boor;
"Taxation hardly presses on the rich,
And likewise presses hardly on the poor."

But neither of these is traced home to its author, as is another very graceful epigram which no one will be surprised to find is Waller's; "The Better Life":—

Circles are praised not that abound
In largeness, but the exactly round—
So life we praise that does excell,
Not in much time, but acting well.

One fourth of the number of epigrams which Mr. Carey has strung biggledly-piggledly together (for his analytical method is too loose to be much better than no method at all), if traced to their authors, and arranged in order of time, would make a volume of infinitely more interest and value. Often where he might easily have given the authorship—as with the epigram "As in smooth oil" (p. 5), which is Dr. Edward Young's, and "As lamps burn silent" (ibid.), which is Aaron Hill's; or again with the translation from Owen, "That thou mayest injure no man" (p. 6), which is Cowper's—he has been content to produce them unfathered and unauthenticated, and so to rank them with the common herd of epigrams by nobodies. Would any one believe that "Go, you may call it madness, folly"—which surely is no more an epigram than any one of Moore's Melodies might be—is given in this volume amongst "Amatory Epigrams," and given without the name of Goldsmith appended? This is no unimportant matter. In p. 63 we find an anonymous epigram, as follows:—

Andrews, 'tis said, a comedy hath writ
Replete throughout with novelty and wit.
If it has wit, to both will I agree,
For wit from Andrews must be novelty.

And it at once occurs to us that the merit of it would be greater could we be sure that it was written before Pope's day. Pope, as everybody knows, divides with his contemporary Young the credit of the off-hand epigram written on glass with Lord Stanhope's diamond pencil:—

Accept a miracle instead of wit;
See two dull lines by Stanhope's pencil writ.

The thought here is the exact converse of that in the former epigram; and it is possible that it was prior to, and suggestive of, the poetical sneer at a forgotten comedy writer. In like manner other assessments of merit might be decided satisfactorily if epigram collectors would take the pains to find out, where possible, the authorship of the specimens they publish.

The poverty of this volume may be a warning to collectors not to think that credit can accrue to such hasty, aimless undertakings. Far better were it for those who have an eye and taste for epigram collecting to exercise them in the search of unused material, and to examine for this purpose the pages of particular authors or periods. The Elizabethan age would supply enough to repay the search. So would that of George III. Before us lies the little volume Chrestoleros, seven books of epigrams published by Thomas Bastard in 1598, out of which Dodd has taken three specimens. A dozen or two more would be worth reprinting, especially for the sake of the sort of readers for whom Bastard wrote, "An English reader with a Latin witt." We quote a couple:—

Sextus, upon a spleen, did rashly swear,
That no new fashions he would ever wear.
He was forsworn, for see what did ensue,
He wore the olde, till the olde was the newe.

The other is of the complimentary kind, one of two conceits addressed to the same fair lady, who had a mole on her face:—

As with fresh meats mixture of salt is meete,
And vinegar doth redde well the sweete;
So in faire faces moles sometimes arise,
Which serve to stay the surfeite of our eyes.

Out of the same epigrammatist might be culled numerous specimens of the historical type, referring to Sir Philip Sydney, the Devereux of the period, and other men of the time; and if this single writer yields a fair harvest, what might not be hoped for from a careful search among his contemporaries? And, to leap over a couple of centuries, and drop haphazard on a clever but half-forgotten writer, George Hardinge, some time Senior Justice of the Counties of Brecon, Glamorgan, and Radnor, we could cite half-a-score epigrams at the least for which any collection would be the better. One is on "Admiral Gell, an angel of goodness but a great swearer." It is, however, too long to quote here, and we must close with two shorter ones, to give a taste of his quality:—

TO TWO BEAUTIFUL SISTERS.

Were young Paris again to determine his prize,
And were you to solicit by tempting his eyes,
In a fit of despair, at the puzzling view,
He'd have taken the apple, and cut it in two.

ON A MAN ALWAYS IN DEBT.

An arch accountant here is laid,
Who borrowed and who never paid.
If he's in Heaven, I could swear
That he is upon credit there.

PERPLEXITY.*

THE modern novel is commonly said to have had its origin in the romances of mediæval times, and by a slow growth to have attained its present form. We ourselves should be inclined to assign a somewhat different origin to the sensational novel at all events, and to assert that, like Pallas, it sprang into being full-grown. From the witch's caldron in Macbeth, when the time was ripe, it came forth; and, however portentous were the three apparitions that appeared in times past, this, the last apparition of all, is far more portentous. When once this idea is presented to the mind, it will be admitted, we believe, without dispute that it is well founded. Who can compare for a moment the collection of incongruous horrors that is to be found both in the contents of the caldron and of the sensational novel, without at once recognizing the fact that the latter is to the sceptical nineteenth century what the former was to the credulous seventeenth century? The superstitious element alone is wanting, but to make up for its absence the hodge-podge is if possible more extravagant, more abounding in horrors, and far more minutely described. The mystical number is still preserved, and in the three volumes, and the three hundred pages which generally go to make up each volume, we still find a trace of those who sang—

Thrice to thine, and thrice to mine,
And thrice again to make up nine.

At the same time that the ingredients have been strengthened, the language has been rendered still more mystical, so that, however "imperfect speakers" were the witches, they are far surpassed in their imperfection by their modern rivals; and however "thick and slab" was the gruel of the caldron, far more "thick and slab" is the gruel, if we may so call it, of the sensational novel. Our only wonder is that nearly three centuries should have gone by before there arose any one to see that the witches' charm was capable of being expanded into an endless number of novels. When the thing was once done, when an author had once thought of taking all the crimes and horrors and fine language he could think of, and mixing them up into a confused mass, it was easy enough for any one to follow in his steps, and, by the addition of a little seasoning, to produce something which, though really the same, had yet a certain relish of its own. Though we have seen many novels where horrors and crimes were more abundantly supplied than in the novel before us, yet even in this respect it does not come far short, while in confusion of language it can hold its place with the best of them. The wicked hero is a drunkard, a robber, and a murderer, and only escapes hanging by getting burnt to death. He commits bigamy, and knows he does. The heroine intends to commit bigamy, but though she thinks she succeeds, it turns out in the end that she was mistaken. The good hero neither intends to commit bigamy nor really does, but yet he thinks he has, and for a while suffers as only a good hero can.

* Perplexity. By Sydney Montagu. London: King & Co. 1871.

Mr. Sydney Mostyn is aware that, however excellent these materials may be, they are not quite enough. He accordingly kills off the heroine's father in a snow-storm, and, quite as a piece of by-play, makes "the second partner" in a bank "abscond with fifty thousand pounds in gold and silver." He gives his readers a great deal, moreover, of a sanctimonious manufacturer of great respectability but of a vile nature, whose ill-used wife after all turns out to be no wife. He is waited on by an equally sanctimonious and equally vile footman, who, to relieve the story where it drags a little in the absence of the wicked hero, absconds with "a large quantity of plate and his master's cash-box," after first trying, like his master and every one else, to get the heroine to marry him. Even the murdering bigamist, the absconding banker, the sanctimonious master, and the plundering footman cannot be in every scene, and occasions would arise where all the characters would be as dull as they were virtuous. Happily the good hero is given an unscrupulous and most malignant mother, who fills up the gaps most conveniently. For, since the heroine is first married to a murderer, next lives as governess in the family of the hypocrite, then is married to the son of the malignant mother, and once more is claimed by the murderer, a pleasing succession is kept up of most unpleasing characters. By the end of the book, indeed, we must admit that the wicked characters have been all cleared away. The murderer leaves behind him "only some charred remains." The footman is transported. His master is exposed. The banker never returns. And, as for the malignant mother, she is dismissed by her son in the following words:—

I told her I would never again speak to her; that I repudiated every claim that she had upon me. I denounced her as cold and pitiless—the murderer of your life, and the slayer of the trust love that had ever entered the human heart.

There may be some who will think that after all Mr. Mostyn has been unusually moderate in the manner in which he has furnished his chamber of horrors, and that he has contented himself with an unusually small number of villains. But, just as on the stage a small number of characters can make a large army on the march, if only they run behind the back scene and come on again on the other side, so in a story a small number of villains can give the appearance of a great deal of villainy, by constantly turning up again as soon as they have gone off the scene. Even allowing, however, a certain deficiency in crimes, as compared with the ample allowance of the present day, Mr. Mostyn fully balances it by a more than usual absence of sense in the words he uses. He is aware that a substantive standing by itself looks cold and awkward, and as much requires adjectives to precede it as Her Majesty on her way to St. Paul's on the Thanksgiving Day required seven carriages of courtiers to precede her. But just as it mattered to nobody who were the occupants of these carriages, so it can matter to nobody what are these adjectives. They play the part, as it were, of gold sticks or silver sticks in waiting on their majesties the substantives, and as no one is impertinent enough to ask what is the meaning of a gold stick in waiting, so we hope that no one will be impertinent enough to ask what is the meaning of Mr. Mostyn's adjectives. We would suggest to him, however, that in all future writings he might save himself some trouble if, instead of selecting any particular words, he were to put in, whenever he sees that propriety might discover a gap, the word "adjective." The story is told of a celebrated artist of the present day, who in his hurry to get ready for the engraver a sketch he was taking of a crowd of people in evening dress, after drawing one or two of them, dashed down "shirt fronts as before." His engraver, either maliciously or stupidly, would not understand him, and when the plate was published, there appeared a long row of faces with "shirt fronts as before" written under them. Inadmissible as this is in pictures, we do not at all see why it should not be introduced into novels. For instance, would not "the adjective stars," "the adjective clanging of factory bells," "the adjective whistle sang a prolonged wail," read quite as well as Mr. Mostyn's "mellow stars," "mellow clanging of factory bells," "mellow whistle sang a prolonged wail"? As for the stars being "mellow" we do not object to that. Nor again do we object when he tells us that "the sombre deep sky was flaked over with pulsating stars," or that "the moon was rapidly focussing its light," or that "the darkness stirred, quickened into shapes, writhed with shadowy laughter, and hissed out of the perfect stillness," or that there was "a gathering darkness in the East, on whose pulseless breast beamed a single but gorgeous beam," or that "the morning was crisp, radiant, aromatic," or that there "was a crisp clear moon which was now broadening to its meridian height," or that a "great crimson pile of clouds had risen to receive the pulsating orb," or of "a lightning beam scathing my soul." He may play any tricks he likes with the heavens, but he shall not be allowed to call the whistle of a railway-engine mellow.

Est molles in rebas, sunt certi designis. Anon.

However, it would be well if Mr. Mostyn, before he writes about even the stars, were to get the most elementary knowledge of their motions. We remember a story in which the shipwrecked hero is saved by taking the greatest care to keep as he swam in the path of the moon on the water with a view to being seen and so picked up. But the absurdity of that is fully equalled by the following passage, more especially when we know that the heroine's "papa," whose astronomical knowledge is quoted, was an old sea captain. The heroine was some twenty miles or so from home, and was fleeing by night from her husband the murderer. She is thus saved from retracing her footsteps home in her ignorance of the country:—

One constellation I knew—the Great Bear. I had often viewed it at this hour from the cottage, and papa, I remembered, once told me that the Pointers directly indicated the position of Lichendale from our home. I gazed at them now, and remarked that they pointed in an opposite direction to what I was taking.

Happily she soon espies "a narrow galaxy" of light "marking a village or a hamlet," and gets into a train which bears her straight to the good hero and a second marriage. Mr. Mostyn's love for fine words is most remarkable. No one in his books has wrinkles, but "corrugations." We have "the swarthy corrugation of his brow," and "the corrugation of his white brow." We shall not stop to inquire whether a man, even if a murderous bigamist, can have a swarthy corrugation of a white brow. The heroine also in describing her own behaviour says, "I corrugated my brow, until sweat-drops reeked from the torture of the contraction." Happily she can add, "mentally I was still; I was despair typified by a shape of marble." Even the kitten in Mr. Mostyn's story indulges in "a metallic snore," and the horse's hoofs give "a metallic thud." Especially does he rise to grandeur of language when he has to do with the murderer. In addition to his "corrugations," we are told how, on one occasion, "a fitful wintry ray upon his tempestuous face writhed his mouth"; and how, on another occasion, coming to bed in the dark, "finding the candle, he ignited the wick." In one of the last views we have of him before he disappears in a tremendous fire, we are told how the eyes I recognized; that sinister ray, those crimson webbed whites, those lids scintillant with suspicion, hate, despair, were familiar to me as my hand.

Unfortunately Mr. Mostyn is not always content with being merely silly. For mere silliness we can feel some degree of indulgence. But no mercy should be shown to a writer whose rant, in one place at least, goes far beyond the limits of common vulgarity. He, and writers like him, may hide as much as they please the poverty of their thoughts under a cloud of words, but they shall not with impunity in their pretentious novels contend with the Illustrated Police Gazette in pandering to a depraved love of all that is horrible and repulsive. Even the Daily Telegraph, though it does occasionally give, under the inspiration of Mr. Sheriff Bonnett, a moral and minute account of the flogging of garotters, would scarcely contain such a passage as the following:—

"Do you think they should ever hang me? Oh, don't fancy you could escape by denouncing me! don't hope it. You'd like to see me strung to the gallows—what a revenge! My God! think of it! The fellow who used to bully you twisting at the end of a rope, with his hard eyes making bumps on the white cap, roared at by a mob—oh, you'd like that?"

The outrages on decency committed by some of the great novelists of last century are recognized by every one. We hope that the time will come when it will be no less clearly recognized that the mind is almost as surely corrupted by the description of bodily sufferings as of bodily pleasures.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WE really do not know whether the reputation of Synesius has gained or lost by being introduced to French readers under the patronage of M. Lapatz.* On the one hand, we think that if the style précieux is ever specially objectionable, it is when it is brought to bear upon topics of mere erudition; on the other, there is no doubt that the artificial mannerisms of Synesius are appropriately set off by a commentary where almost every word is a riddle and every phrase a jumble of incongruous metaphors. We used to think that in this peculiar style of composition M. Jules Janin had reached the extreme limits of absurdity; but M. Lapatz manages to out-herod Herod, and his preface in particular may be regarded as a pattern of nonsense. French criticism has always been considered as a model of perspicuity and of precision; in former days La Harpe, in our time M. Boissonnade and M. Egger, have carried on the tradition of the great scholars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; but if M. Lapatz should succeed in founding a new school, we shall require comments on the commentators of the Greek and Latin classics. This is the more to be regretted because the new translator of Synesius is undoubtedly quite equal to the task he has undertaken; the matter of his notes is often full of interest, and the curious details he gives us as to the state of Hellenism under the reign of Julian the Apostate are the result of considerable study.

M. L. Quicherat still keeps up amongst his countrymen the standard of sound learning, and is apparently determined to prove that true scholarship has not yet perished on the other side of the Channel, notwithstanding the ever-increasing pretensions of positive science, as it is sometimes called. The edition of Nonius Marcellus* which is now before us, although coming after the excellent ones of Gerlach and Rothe, is so far superior to them that it contains for the first time a complete collection of a MS. dating as early as the ninth century, which is preserved amongst the Italian treasures of the British Museum. The German savants we have just named had indeed consulted this MS., but only in a very imperfect manner, and the readings they gave from it were limited to a small number of passages. M. Quicherat, on the contrary, was enabled to obtain a transcript of all the varie lectiones, and although we do not find any new quotations given, yet the Harleian codex often supplies various readings of separate phrases, and enables us to trace the origin of errors which had crept into the work. The student who wishes to know all about Nonius Marcellus cannot do better than examine M. Quicherat's exhaustive preface; nothing is omitted of any importance as illustrating either the life of the grammarian or the plan he adopted in the composition of his work, and the difficulties which had to be overcome in the settling of the text seem to have been considerable. M. Quicherat gives at the foot of the pages all the readings to be found in the best MSS., and the work is followed by two copious indices; one of the words explained by Nonius Marcellus, and the other of the authors from which the old grammarian quoted his extracts.

The new volume of M. Bossert's lectures on German literature treats of Goethe, his predecessors, and his contemporaries.† The introductory discourse examines the characteristic features of classical literature in Germany, and compares them with those of the French chefs-d'œuvre. The word "classical" expresses entirely different ideas in the two countries. Amongst the fellow-countrymen of Racine and Boileau we find the utmost respect for tradition, a remarkable uniformity in all literary productions, and a striking absence of that individuality which stamps an author's writings as peculiarly his own. In Germany, on the contrary, what is called classical writing has essentially a personal character, and the harmonious blending of the critic and the poet in every great national author prevents literature from assuming one well-defined and unchangeable type. The lectures collected in the volume before us treat only of Goethe's early days, and take us down to the epoch of his departure for Weimar. The history of his relations with Klopstock, Lessing, Herder, Wieland, and Lavater is extremely interesting, and is illustrated by numerous extracts from their correspondence.

The Bibliothèque orientale which Messrs. Maisonneuve ‡ have undertaken is certainly a gigantic enterprise, and we heartily wish success to the committee of savants who purpose publishing in a cheap form the literary masterpieces of India, Persia, Egypt, and China. Many years ago the editors of the Pantheon littéraire had, if we remember rightly, included in their collection a volume of Eastern lore; but it was of course impossible to give an adequate idea of so vast a subject within the limits of a few hundred pages, and the exhaustless treasures of Sanskrit literature, for instance, were represented only by a translation of the laws of Menu. The plan laid down in the preface to Messrs. Maisonneuve's Bibliothèque orientale is much wider, for it comprises an annotated version of all the early works, both of a religious and of a literary character, on which the faith of primitive nations lived for so long a space of time. The first volume contains the Rig-Veda in the translation of the late M. Langlois, together with an introduction describing the different elements which constitute the Vedic books, and discussing their qualities both as poetical compositions and as witnesses to an old form of worship. The present collection being designed for general readers, the annotators have abstained from details of a purely philosophical nature, and their notes are limited to the explanation of mythological and historical difficulties. By way of supplement, we have, first, an imitation in Latin hexameters, by M. Eichhoff, of a few hymns taken from the Rig-Veda; and, secondly, an excellent analytical index, which will prove of great service to students. The second volume takes us through the golden age of Sanskrit literature, and brings us down to the period of its decay. As a supplement to the translation of the Rig-Veda, the editors have given us fragments from the hymns of the Sama-Veda, the Yajur-Veda, and the Attarra-Veda; these are rendered into French by MM. Barthélemy St.-Hilaire and G. Pauthier. Persia, Egypt, and Assyria likewise help to enrich this interesting volume; and, finally, China contributes several important items in the shape of old popular songs, hymns ascribed to Lao-tsen and to Confucius, and a version of the Chi-King. This book has never yet appeared in a French dress, and M. Pauthier, the author of the present translation, has completed his work by the addition of a few other short poems taken from Father Lacharme's Latin paraphrase.

Several able treatises on metaphysical science have lately been published either in France or in French Switzerland. The volume of M. Alaux § originally appeared a few years ago as the second part of a work entitled La Raison; essai sur l'avenir de la Philosophie; in which the author attempted to show, first, what is the part played by metaphysics in the history of humanity, and next, what metaphysics are, considered independently of all external circumstances. M. Alaux devotes the greater portion of his preface to a kind of apology for the task he has undertaken. He finds himself obliged to confront two groups of adversaries; the positivists on the one hand, who assert that metaphysical science has been for ever dismissed from the scheme of knowledge, and on the other those philosophers who even in the spiritualist camp exaggerate the merits of the experimental method. M. Alaux is a writer whose theories require close study, and will well repay the time spent in examining them.

M. Secrétan's lectures*, like the volume we have just noticed, are not strictly speaking a new book; and here also the author has given as two publications what are really two divisions of the same work. After having taken his position within the domain of pure metaphysics, and endeavoured to place before us an adequate idea of the Perfect Being to whom our reason is incessantly aspiring, M. Secrétan now aims at showing what position Christianity holds in the history of the world, and how the principles of revealed religion can explain the apparent paradoxes which we see around us. In the preface the author discusses the respective claims of Romanism, Protestantism, and free thought to the government of the moral world. Whilst exposing the fallacies of Popery, he is no less strong in showing the inconsistencies of Protestants, and he contends that although to a certain extent the libres-penseurs are right, since the distinction between good and evil can be appreciated independently of the notion of God, yet the distinction is comparatively useless so long as we leave moral order deprived of its explanation and its sanction. La Philosophie de la Liberté recommends itself equally to philosophers by the vigour of its reasoning and to Christian readers by the religious tone which pervades its pages.

M. Francisque Bouillier has contributed to M. Germer-Baillière's Bibliothèque de Philosophie an excellent little volume on Conscience.† What is conscience? and what place ought we to assign to it in the order of our faculties? These questions are connected with a number of interesting discussions which M. Bouillier notices as he goes on. Thus, if we wander on that debatable land where positive science and metaphysicians meet, we find ourselves face to face with the problem whether physiology can throw any light upon the nature and origin of conscience. Quoting the opinions of Professor Tyndall, M. Claude Bernard, and M. Taine in confirmation of his own views, M. Bouillier decides for the negative. Conscience, however, can be examined not only from an abstract, but also from a practical, point of view, and our author does this in the last five chapters of his work. After controverting the theory on which Mr. Buckle based his history of civilization—namely, the negation of the influence of the moral idea in the development of social progress—M. Bouillier takes up the famous quarrel as to the relative merits of ancient and modern writers, started by French critics two hundred years ago, and shows how the argument used by the champions of æsthetic progress is applicable to the questions discussed in his own volume.

M. F. Lenormant's commentary on the fragments of Berossus ‡ is a volume of which it is extremely difficult to give an adequate idea within our present limits; we can only say briefly that the work is admirably done, and that the old historian has now for the first time found a competent annotator. Previously to the philological discoveries of the last twenty years, and to the labours of modern savants on ethnology and mythology, it was impossible to elucidate in a satisfactory manner a large proportion of the historical monuments of antiquity. Herodotus himself can scarcely be duly appreciated by readers who know nothing of the results of the investigations of Champollion, Lepsius, Sir H. Rawlinson, MM. Oppert and De Rougé; how much less chroniclers like Berossus, with whom we are acquainted only through a few quotations handed down, we cannot say how correctly or incorrectly, in the writings of other men! The fragments illustrated by M. Lenormant are twenty in number, and they have afforded him an opportunity for discussing problems of great importance connected with Biblical and secular archaeology. Thus we find a curious essay on the contents of the libraries at Nineveh—libraries where each book is a collection of the bricks, and where baked earth serves the purpose of papyrus and parchment. The Chaldeo-Assyrian Calendar and the Chaldean origin of the Zodiac are minutely examined in another note; and, finally, the various traditions respecting the Flood, the Ark, the Tower of Babel, and the Confusion of Tongues are reviewed and analysed.

After having brought to a satisfactory termination his three volumes on the ethnology of Gaul, Baron Roger de Belloguet publishes a new edition of the Celtic glossary § which formed the first part of that publication. The rapidity with which the original impression was sold proves that the branch of philology taken up by M. de Belloguet is creating considerable interest; it is one which hitherto has been little studied, and for many * Nonii Marcelli de compendiosa doctrina ad filium, etc. Edid. L. Quicherat. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

† Goethe, ses précurseurs et ses contemporains. Par A. Bossert. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

‡ Bibliothèque orientale. Publié par un comité scientifique international. Vols. 1. and 2. Paris: Maisonneuve.

§ L'Amalgame métaphysique; méthode pour constituer la Philosophie première. Par J. E. Alaux. Paris: Sandoz.

* La Philosophie de la Liberté.—L'Histoire. Par Charles Secrétan. Paris: Sandoz.

† De la Conscience en Psychologie et en Morale. Par Francisque Bouillier. Paris: Germer-Baillière.

‡ Essai de commentaire des Fragments de Bérosee, etc. Par F. Lenormant. Paris: Maisonneuve.

§ Ethnographie gauloise. 1re partie: Glossaire gaulois. Par M. le Baron Roger de Belloguet. Paris: Maisonneuve.

readers it will have the attraction of novelty. The glossary properly so called is introduced by an able disquisition in which the author lays down certain principles which guide him in his explanation of old Celtic words. Although the language spoken by the Celts is of Indo-European origin, its Sanskrit elements belong neither to the German nor to the Latin vocabularies. Professor Holtzmann endeavoured, indeed, some time ago to revive in his Kelten und Germanen the theory formerly started by Tschudi and Glareanus, to the effect that the language spoken by the old inhabitants of Gaul was merely a variety of the Teutonic idiom; but M. de Belloguet refutes this opinion, and shows it to be untenable even in the modified form recently put forth by M. Kunsberg. The glossary itself is not strictly speaking an etymological one, and it would have been impossible to apply to the words which it contains that law of the permutation of letters which prevails in other branches of the Indo-Germanic family. Our author, under the heading of each word, simply gives its meaning, the historical circumstances connected with it, and the terms of similar origin which his researches have enabled him to discover. The volume closes with a discussion of the system of M. Amédée Thierry as to the duality of the Celtic language, a system which is, he argues, radically erroneous. The second issue of his Glossaire gaulois has received numerous and important additions, chiefly from inscriptions either lately discovered or lately acknowledged to be of Gallic origin.

The historical and geographical publications of the past month comprise a few volumes of permanent importance, and others which have originated with the Franco-Prussian war and the events of the Commune. Amongst the former we may name the first instalments of a Bibliothèque de l'Armée française, issued by Messrs. Hachette, at the suggestion of M. Thiers. Josephus has supplied to this collection two of his most remarkable pieces—the descriptions of the sieges of Jotapat and of Jerusalem. M. O. Rosset, who has the management of the whole series, and whose history of Louvois is well known, has revised the translation of Arnauld d'Andilly, and introduced it by an excellent preface. The military memoirs of Turenne are written in a dry, uninteresting manner, but they are most valuable for those who wish to study the art of war; the testimony of competent judges such as Marshal de Puységur and Napoleon is decisive on that score. They seem naturally destined to hold a prominent place in a soldier's library; and they have been included in M. Rosset's Bibliothèque, together with Napoleon's Précis des Campagnes.† Finally, three more volumes are taken up with the Emperor's own account of his campaigns in Italy, Egypt, and Syria.‡

M. Vivien de Saint-Martin's Année géographique § still presents the same mass of facts, ably classified and discussed, which renders his year-books the best publications of their kind. Amongst the principal topics reviewed by him we notice a chapter on the Mormons, and one on the ethnology of Gaul. Asia, however, has the lion's share in this new volume; and the details which we find respecting China, Japan, and Asiatic Russia cannot fail to interest the reader.

Colonel Accaldi's Lettres militaires ||, written for the newspaper Le Temps during the siege of Paris, and General Martin des Paillières's Orléans ¶, are important contributions to the history of the late war. Political animosity and private interest have so distorted the facts which marked the campaign of 1870-71 that the unfortunate generals who had to carry out the absurd plans of M. Gambetta and his lieutenant, M. de Freycinet, could no longer allow their reputation as soldiers to suffer from the blunders of the extemporized dictator of France. After the narrative of General d'Aurelle de Paladines, we have that of General des Paillières, equally interesting, and equally conclusive as to the necessity of a thorough reformation in the French army. Being himself a member of the Committee called together for that very purpose, the late chief of the 15th Corps is specially entitled to be heard when he seeks to apply the fruits of his experience in such a manner that his country may retrieve its old military reputation.

Baron Ernoul tells us in his preface** that the rare pamphlets from which he has compiled his new volume would certainly have been réquisitionnés by the Prussians if he had not, by a timely precaution, withheld his work from the press till after the conclusion of the war. It gives details respecting the campaigns of 1807-1808 which, if fully to be relied upon, would tend both to diminish the glory of the Germans in their resistance to Napoleon I. and also to prove that the depredations and insolence of the French army were grossly exaggerated. We must of course oppose to Baron Ernoul's statements those of Madame de Staël and of Madame Lenormant; the probability is that here, as in most other cases, things have been very much magnified on both sides.

All the books we have hitherto had to notice on the siege of * Siege de Jérusalem. Par Flavius Joseph. (Bibliothèque de l'Armée française.) Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

† Mémoires de Turenne, suivis du Précis des Campagnes de Turenne. Par Napoléon. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

‡ Campagnes d'Italie, d'Égypte, et de Syrie. Par Napoléon. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

§ L'Année géographique. Par M. Vivien de Saint-Martin (9<sup>e</sup>—10<sup>e</sup> année). Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

|| Lettres militaires du Siège. Par F. C. Accaldi. Paris: Plon.

¶ Orléans. Par le général Martin des Paillières. Paris: Plon.

** Les Français en Prusse (1807-1808). Par le baron Ernoul. Paris: Didier.

Paris were composed by persons residing in France during the war or engaged in defending the capital against the invading armies. The brochure now before us* contains the narrative of a girl of fourteen driven from her native country and obliged to seek refuge in England. Being the production of so young an authoress, it claims much indulgence; but we must acknowledge that its intrinsic merit would have secured for it considerable success even independently of the circumstances under which it was written. The present edition is the first that could be published on the other side of the Channel, and we doubt not that it will meet with the popularity which the former one obtained in England.

M. Taine, like M. Renan, is not in very good odour just now with his old friends the Republicans, and they accuse him of having endeavoured to calumniate the sans-culotte régime by exhuming from the dust of some library and translating into French the lies of an "emissary of Pitt and Coburg."† The draught is a bitter one, as M. Taine himself acknowledges; but that is precisely the reason why those for whom it is intended should swallow it; and besides, if the anonymous English lady judges so severely Robespierre, Danton, and the Terrorists, it is only because she feels the benefit of living under a Government where freedom and security are compatible with respect for the law.

The new poem of M. Victor Hugo § will not add much to the author's reputation from the artistic point of view; it contains many beauties, no doubt, but they are drowned in an extraordinary mass of verbiage and nonsense. The keynote, too, is essentially wrong. Men of as great experience as M. Hugo, and who enjoy the advantage of not allowing themselves to be led astray by their imagination, have long since declared that the source of all the misfortunes of France is the excessive vanity fostered by those writers who talk of Paris as la capitale des peuples, or la ville sainte. There is one point, however, on which the poet deserves much credit; he distinctly repudiates the pretensions of the mob whilst he advocates the rights of the people, and he separates the true Republicans from the Septembriseurs with an eloquence more sincere than consistent. Poetry is not bound to take much notice of logic, otherwise it would be easy to prove that 1793 was the natural offspring of a revolution cast in the mould of Rousseau's Contrat social. M. Victor Hugo's Actes et Paroles § show the part he has taken in political events since the proclamation of the Republic on the 4th of September.

* Récit d'une Petite Fille. Angers: Barassat.

† Un Séjour en France de 1792 à 1795; lettres d'un témoin de la Révolution française. Traduites par M. Taine. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

‡ L'Année terrible. Par Victor Hugo. Paris: Lévy.

§ Actes et Paroles. Par Victor Hugo. Paris: Lévy.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 862, MAY 4, 1873:

The American Compromise.
Women's Suffrage. The Carlist Insurrection.
The Dailot Bill. The Orleanist Party. The Debate on Lord Rotherley's Bill.
A New Reform Bill Threatened. The Licensing Bill.
The Opposition and Mr. Parnell's Bill.
May Meetings.
Post-Card. Parliamentary Eloquence.
The Endowed Schools Commissioners. Fools of Comedy and Farce. Vesuvius.
Cole C.B. "At Home." The Battle of Wakefield.
Lord Clarence Paget and the Admiralty. The Two Thousand.
Clark's Early Roman Law.
Levi's History of British Commerce. The London Parks.
Freeman's Growth of the English Constitution. Essays by the Author of "Vera."
A Colonist on Colonial Policy. Carey's Comprehensive Book of Epigrams.
Perplexity. French Literature.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—SPECIAL ATTRACTIONS.—THIS

DAY AND NEXT WEEK.

SATURDAY (May 4).—GRAND SUMMER CONCERT, at 3.
TUESDAY—OPERA IN ENGLISH. "Daughter of the Regiment," at 8.
THURSDAY—OPERA IN ENGLISH. "Barber of Seville," at 8.
SATURDAY.—THE GREAT FLOWER SHOW.

The Fine Art Courts and Collections; the Technological and Natural History Collections; all the various Illustrations of Art, Science, and Nature; and the Gardens and Park always open. Music and Fountains daily.
Admission, each day, 1s.; Saturday, May 4, 5s.; Saturday, May 11, 7s. 6d.; or by Guinea Season Ticket.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.—

June 27, 28, 29, 30, July 3, 4, 5, 1873.—PUBLIC COMPETITIONS between Choral Societies, Native and Foreign Church and Cathedral Choirs, Glee, Madrigal, and Part Song Vocalists, Military and Volunteer Bands, Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, and Bass Solo Singers, for Prizes amounting in value to Fifteen Hundred Pounds.
Special arrangements have been made with the Railway Companies to convey Competitors from and to all parts of the United Kingdom at greatly reduced fares.
A portion of the proceeds of the undertaking will be allotted to the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal Society of Musicians.
Musical List of Places to be prepared for Competition, the Council of Musicians, and all other particulars now ready.
All Communications to be addressed to Mr. WILLIAM BAZZ, of the Crystal Palace.
By Order, G. GROVE, Secretary.

Stewards and Members of the Corporation who have not yet given written notice of the Tickets they require are requested to do so immediately, in order that arrangements may be made for them.

10 John Street, Adelaide, W.C. OCTAVIAN BLEWITT, Secretary.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 863, Vol. 33.

May 11, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

THE confident rumours of last week had been dissipated before the appointed day for Lord RUSSELL's motion arrived; but the Ministers were entitled to claim still further forbearance from Parliament if they had reason to believe that there was still a chance of the withdrawal of the indirect claims. It might indeed be plausibly contended that the Government would only be strengthened in its avowed purpose by a Resolution of the House of Lords affirming the proposition to which Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord GRANVILLE are already pledged; but, on the other hand, the Resolution itself implied a want of confidence; and the Ministers would have been placed in the embarrassing position of opposing a motion in which they must be supposed substantially to concur. It was also possible that the American Cabinet, if it had been wavering, would have taken offence at a peremptory declaration of the irrevocable policy of England. The hesitation which has been already displayed shows that sounder counsels have sometimes almost prevailed over the policy which has been officially announced by Mr. FISH. The favourable reports which had revived general confidence were certainly not without foundation, although they were too confidently accepted as true. When Lord GRANVILLE urged Lord RUSSELL to postpone his motion, there had been no time to ascertain whether the PRESIDENT would be more or less disposed to concession in consequence of the Cincinnati nomination. It was evident that either pertinacity or a tendency to conciliation might affect General GRANT's popularity and the chances of his re-nomination; but only indigenous politicians are capable of balancing the advantages which might respectively result from the settlement or the reopening of the dispute. The contrivance which had been imagined to relieve the American Government from the necessity of simple retraction may perhaps have failed through its own intrinsic absurdity. It might have been worth the while of the English Ministry to concur in the frivolous declaration that consequential damages, as invented by Mr. SUMNER, should never be claimed by statesmen who must be assumed not to have forfeited all self-respect. It probably appeared on further consideration to the authors of the device that it would only entail ridicule on themselves; and they could not make up their minds to the more dignified course of simply correcting an error. It is not certain whether either House of Congress has had any influence on the latest decision of the PRESIDENT. The Chairmen of the respective Committees on Foreign Affairs in either House, Mr. CAMERON and Mr. BANKS, are not ordinarily disposed to promote friendly relations with England; yet it seems that Mr. BANKS called the PRESIDENT's attention to the motion which had been introduced into the House for the withdrawal of the claims, and that it was from Mr. FISH that the objection to any resolution of the kind seems to have proceeded. The members of the Committees who are friendly to the PRESIDENT were invited to discuss the question with the Cabinet, but they expressed their opinion that the whole body of their colleagues ought to have been consulted; and the Opposition members naturally resented their exclusion.

If it is true that the American Government and nation now regret the mistake of having preferred inadmissible claims, they may perhaps not think it necessary to abandon all parts of the Treaty when the project of arbitration has finally collapsed. It would be highly desirable that the San Juan controversy should be settled by the award of the German Emperor, and that the long-standing controversy on the Canadian fisheries should be removed from the sphere of contention. It is unfortunately too probable that the Americans will be irritated by their own miscarriage, and that they will reject any arrangement which can even partially amount to an amicable settlement. A disputant who is demonstrably and consciously in the wrong is often inclined to support an untenable argument by a display of temper. There may even be American politicians who suppose themselves to have made a valuable concession in the almost official acknowledgment that no consequential damages could have been justly claimed or rightfully awarded. To Englishmen it seems that the impropriety of Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS's indictment is aggravated by the improbability that it could have served the purpose of his clients. Demands too extravagant to have been entertained can only have been inserted either in the hope of misleading the arbitrators or for the purpose of affronting the adverse litigant. The objection raised on the part of England has from the first been exclusively founded on the language and spirit of the Treaty and of the preliminary negotiations, and not on the discreditable character of the claims. It is unnecessary to discuss the idle pretext that the claims were included in the Case for the purpose of settling them finally at rest. The amicable settlement which was contemplated by the framers of the Treaty would, if it had been allowed by the American Government to come into operation, have disposed of all causes of difference down to the date of submission to the award. Even if outstanding liabilities had been reserved, there were no indirect claims in discussion when the Commissioners met at Washington. Mr. FISH, when he borrowed a monstrous doctrine from Mr. SUMNER, expressly declared, at the time of his note to Lord CLARENCE, that the PRESIDENT made no claim whatever. A rhetorical menace is not converted into even an inchoate or disputable right by the fact that it is uttered. After the Treaty, and an arbitration on the matters covered by the Treaty, a fresh demand on account of the pretended prolongation of the war could only have been intended either as an idle insult or as preliminary to a declaration of war. If the American Government has offered not to insist on the demand for consequential damages, it has virtually admitted the impropriety of submitting the claim to the arbitrators. It is impossible to doubt the readiness of the English Ministers to facilitate any arrangement which would be compatible with their own declarations and with the national determination; but in allowing the arbitration to proceed until the claims were withdrawn they would have conceded the whole matter in dispute. It was possible that the American counsel might have held that, in simply presenting the claims to the tribunal, they were fulfilling the pledge that they should not be pressed. The arbitrators might then have awarded a gross sum for damages, the whole or part of which might have been attributed by the Americans to the objectionable claims.

Although it is possible that the nomination of a Republican competitor may affect the policy of the PRESIDENT, the remarkable selection made by the Cincinnati Convention is in England only a subject of curious speculation. No candidate could be suggested who, as President, would be less likely to cultivate friendly relations with England. The dislike which Mr. GREELEY expressed a quarter of a century ago by his subscription in aid of the Irish rebels has not been mitigated by the steady adherence of the English nation to the Free-trade doctrines which he has never succeeded in understanding. A narrow fanatic in all political and commercial questions, Mr. GREELEY has habitually attributed to opponents the worst possible motives. When Mr. WELLS published the statistical documents which proved the mischievous working of the American tariff, Mr. GREELEY repeatedly asserted that Mr. WELLS had been bribed with English gold. If the PRESIDENT had withdrawn the claim for consequential damages, Mr. GREELEY would in all probability have attributed the concession to similar motives. An English Mr. GREELEY would not be regarded as a serious politician, though he might perhaps be an estimable bigot; but in a country where political power is wielded by small farmers and mechanics, Mr. GREELEY has acquired extraordinary influence by his sympathetic reproduction of their own prejudices. The extent of his popularity is sufficiently proved by his success in the contest with Mr. ADAMS, who has, through circumstances, and perhaps by inclination, stood aloof from party, and who has proved himself to possess the acquirements and knowledge proper for a statesman. The managers of the Convention were perhaps the best judges of the comparative chances of the various candidates; but it is probable that Mr. GREELEY was elected by the votes of the Protestant members of the body. If he perseveres in the contest, a Democratic President will probably be in power after an interval of twelve years; and as the Senate and House of Representatives will continue to be Republican, the executive power will for the time be reduced to its lowest point. A President in difficulties is often tempted to bid for popularity by professions of hostility to England. On the whole, it is perhaps to be wished that General GRANT may succeed, notwithstanding the mismanagement by himself and his SECRETARY of STATE of the litigation consequent on the Treaty. It is possible that he may wish to repair his blunder; while a successor might perhaps be still more exacting. Whether the English Ministers incur any risk through the failure of the Treaty is a question which must remain open until the history of the negotiation is known. As there is no reason to fear that they will concede the vital point in the dispute, few persons will be disposed to blame any efforts which they may have made to prevent, even by moderate sacrifices, the abandonment of the reference to arbitration. They would have better commanded the confidence of Parliament if, during the progress of negotiation, they had more plainly announced their final resolution.

THE BALLOT BILL.

THE reconsideration of the Ballot Bill on Thursday night gave rise to discussions on points of some importance. One leading subject of dispute was as to nominations, and a last fight was made for retaining the old system. The evils and absurdities of this system were pointed out by Mr. DISRAELI with his usual vivacity a quarter of a century ago; and the member who read the passage in one of Mr. DISRAELI'S novels where nomination day is described managed to sum up the whole case against this most foolish of English customs in the tersest and most effective language, and to back his own opinion with the authority of the Conservative leader. In England, however, everything that is old has its sincere friends, simply because it is old, and Sir GEORGE GREY aptly represented the friends of that fine old piece of antiquity, the nomination day. Few customs have not had some sort of warrant in the times when they sprang up; and in old times when the nomination day was really the day of election, when the proceedings were serious, when the candidates really addressed the electors, and the show of hands really indicated the feelings of the constituency, everything that took place on that day may have seemed natural and proper to Englishmen. In modern times the custom has become very silly and very mischievous. There is not one vestige of reality about it. Those who are present are for the most part not electors; the candidates are not allowed to say a word that can enlighten or benefit any one; they are exposed to every kind of personal insult and annoyance; the show of hands does not indicate the opinions of the electors. No public order is served by it, while grave public evils attend it. The unruly mob which swears, reels, and throws dead cats on to the hustings, has to be kept in order, not only by the police, but often by hired prizefighters; and Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE amused his hearers by informing them that he used in former days to take care of his supporters and himself by stationing in the crowd a famous ex-champion of the Ring in the dress of a clergyman of the Church of England. A very large portion of the demoralization unhappily attending English elections can be distinctly traced to the custom of having a sham day of election prior to the real one; for the mob was thus encouraged to take the direction of affairs from the outset, and the constituency, being drowned in beer before it began to vote, never wholly recovered its senses. Of all the clauses of the Ballot Bill that which abolishes nomination days of the old type is the only one which we can regard with unmixed satisfaction. It is quite true that, strictly speaking, this clause has nothing to do with the rest of the Bill. Even if nominations continued in all their familiar atrocity, the poll, when taken, might equally well be taken by secret voting. But as the clause is in the Bill, there is every reason to seize the opportunity of doing away with public nominations. Nor can it be said that the first clause of the Bill, by which nominations are henceforward to be made in the quietest and most orderly manner, is not connected with the clauses that follow, although the connexion is of an indirect kind. There are many advantages and many disadvantages in adopting the Ballot; but one of its least disputable advantages is that it will make the process of voting orderly and decorous. No one, if the Ballot Bill becomes law, will know how an elector has voted, and, what is still more important, no one will know how the poll is going. It is impossible that much excitement should accompany proceedings of which the course and the result are alike unknown until all is over. To buy this advantage which the Bill promises at the cost of the disadvantages which the Bill will also bring with it, and then to diminish almost to nothing the value of this advantage by keeping alive the enormous nuisance of riotous, rowdy crowds establishing a reign of terror and debauch on nomination day, would be absurd; and thus it may be fairly said that justice could not be done to a Ballot Bill unless the foolish custom of public nominations was at the same time brought to an end.

Mr. FORSTER undertook on bringing up the Report to announce the manner in which the Government would show itself willing to consult the wishes of those who desire that the hours of polling shall be lengthened. He accordingly proposed that in the four winter months the poll should close at five, that in the four summer months it should close at eight, and that in the four intermediate months it should close at seven. The feeling of the House was so dead against this proposal that the Government abandoned it on the spot, and declared itself willing that the hours of polling should remain exactly as they are under the present law. As, however, there were devotees of long polling hours who deplored this sudden change of front, and insisted that a vote should be taken, the Government was actually obliged to vote against its own amendment, and succeeded in getting it rejected by an overwhelming majority. There really was not an argument to be used in its favour, and it is by no means creditable to Mr. FORSTER that he should have made a proposal acceptable to no one, and indefensible in itself, merely because he had not originally devoted sufficient consideration to the subject to have a clear opinion by which he might guide the House. Mr. FORSTER could not but show how strongly he felt the force of the argument that, if his proposal was accepted, elections held in the winter time would never be considered fair to the working classes. If the poll was to be kept open till eight in summer because working men could not vote until their hours of work were over, an election held at a time of year when the poll would close at five would be most unsatisfactory; for the Parliament thus elected would be always open to the reproach that it did not represent the real feelings of the constituencies, and the Government of the day would be perpetually challenged to test the question by a real, proper, fair election held in summer time. Mr. FORSTER had only one way of escaping from this difficulty, and this was by declaring that elections in point of fact never or scarcely ever take place in the winter. As he happened to be addressing a House of Commons elected in a November, it was scarcely worth while to consider how far his assertion was historically true. When the time of an election is in the discretion of a Minister, as, for example, when Parliament is dissolved because the seven years for which it has been elected are nearly expired, the autumn months, which are most convenient to every one, are usually selected. But it may be of the utmost importance to the Crown and to the Government to have an election in the depth of winter. WILLIAM IV., for example, suddenly took it into his head in the late autumn to make Sir ROBERT PEEL Prime Minister, and Sir ROBERT'S only chance of success lay in a dissolution. A general election was therefore held at Christmas time. The new Premier did not succeed in getting a majority; but if he had, and if Mr. FORSTER'S proposal had then been in operation with an electoral body largely composed of working-men, his Government would have been hampered at every turn by the suspicion resting on the validity of its title to govern the country, in consequence of electors alleging that they could have turned the scale of the election against it had the contest taken place in summer. It was the clas-tivity of constitutional government, one of the features most to be prized in it, that was really imperilled by this ill-considered proposal, and the House showed itself a much better guardian of the Constitution than the Government when it speedily consigned the proposal to a silent and ignominious grave.

There was, however, one change of considerable practical importance to which Mr. FORSTER induced the House to give its assent. Last week it was decided that electors unable to read might get the presiding officer to mark their papers for them, and it is clear that while this concession might possibly save a large number of voters from being practically disfranchised, it placed an enormous amount of power in the hands of the presiding officer. Mr. FORSTER strongly objected on this ground to the whole plan of getting illiterate people treated exceptionally, but he was obliged to yield. He has, however, now found a way of making the provision almost, if not wholly, nugatory. As the Bill now stands, if an elector is unable to read, he must go before a magistrate, who is to examine him and satisfy himself that he is really unable to read, and give him a certificate to that effect, and it will only be on the production of this certificate that the presiding officer will be enabled to offer him the help he needs. The number of poor men who will go through so laborious and distasteful a process as that of waiting on a magistrate, being examined by him, and then getting a public document stating that it has been satisfactorily proved that the bearer is totally uneducated, will be very small. Nor is it easy to see how a conscientious magistrate will be able to satisfy himself that a total stranger to him cannot read. It is easy enough to find out when a man can read, but it is impossible to find out when he cannot read. The duty of the magistrate will be to guard against a man who can read saying that he cannot read. But when a magistrate has put a book before a man who can read, and heard his statement that he cannot read a letter, it will be interesting to know what is the next step to be taken. Practically, the magistrate will have to certify that every one cannot read who says he cannot read. The use of the interposition of the magistrate is not really to guard against fraudulent statements, but to put the elector to so much inconvenience that either he will not vote at all or he will prefer to take his chance and vote as well as he can. Mr. FORSTER acknowledged this, and said that he firmly believed that every man could learn how to vote if he took the trouble, whether he knew how to read or not. In nine cases out of ten a man who cannot read, and who is not acted on either by intimidation or corruption, will not trouble himself to vote at all; and it certainly seems possible that the exceptional tenth man will prefer having a shot at making his mark when he wishes to make it rather than take a walk to a magistrate's, waste his time in waiting, and then get his certificate of incompetency. Mr. FORSTER will probably get his way, and men who cannot read will either not vote or will vote as they best can. But there is a considerable objection to any provision which, although inoperative, makes the Bill unpopular, and sets a barrier in the way of voting; and the knowledge that if they want to get helped to vote they must go through this painful process with the magistrate will seem a grievance in the eyes of men who cannot read and who do not really care about voting.

SPAIN AND THE CARLISTS.

IN one respect personal injustice has been done to the Spanish Pretender. It now appears that, after waiting some days in the neighbourhood of Bayonne, he crossed the frontier, and that soon afterwards he was present at an unsuccessful engagement with a portion of SERRANO's army. According to the Government papers, a glorious and decisive victory was obtained by the regular troops; and it seems to be admitted that they took many prisoners. As the dead and wounded of the defeated party were insignificant in numbers, it may be conjectured that the Carlists were surprised, and that those who were not taken lost no time in effecting their escape. It is difficult to judge whether the combat is to be regarded as decisive of the fate of the insurrection; but according to the latest accounts the insurgents are greatly discouraged. It was never supposed that the Carlists were capable of meeting the Government forces in the open field, except with an accidental and overwhelming superiority of numbers. If they can hamper the movements of SERRANO and intercept his convoys, they may hope to be able to maintain a desultory struggle during the summer, and that in the meantime the Republicans, or some other malcontent faction, may perhaps effect a diversion in their favour. The kingdom has been largely drained of men to supply the urgent demands of Cuba; and it is said that there are at present only 30,000 soldiers on Spanish soil. A third of the number present in the field will probably be required to pacify the disturbed provinces, and some difficulty will be experienced when it becomes necessary to draw on the reserves. There is at present no symptom of a tendency to desertion or defection, and an army in the field may be more implicitly trusted to follow its colours than in the idleness of barrack life. The insurrection seems at a distance to be extremely rash; but it must have been thought by its leaders to present some prospect of success. A few officers of rank and experience have accepted commands under Don CARLOS, probably without any intention of devoting themselves to an entirely hopeless cause. The memory of the civil war of thirty years ago can afford but faint encouragement to the Carlist leaders. At that time modern heresies and innovations had made little progress, and the influence of the Church was far greater than at present. ZUMALACARRREQUI was superior in ability to any of the Christino generals, and CABRERA and some of the other Carlist chiefs displayed considerable energy. Nevertheless the Royalists were never able to occupy either a considerable town or any of the Central or Southern provinces. If MAROTO had not sold his sovereignty to the enemy at Bergara, the war might have been prolonged for two or three years; but it had long before become evident that the cause of the QUEEN must finally prevail. The Duke of MADRID appeals to passions and prejudices which are rapidly becoming obsolete against a constitutional system which, notwithstanding many revolutions and one change of dynasty, has been established for an entire generation. In the interval neither the disreputable character of the Court nor the intrigues of factions have greatly impeded the advance of prosperity. Since the death of FERNAND VII., Spain has probably increased in wealth in a larger proportion than France, Germany, or England.

If SERRANO succeeds in suppressing the rebellion, the petty conflict will probably have contributed to the security of the throne. The army will have had an opportunity of displaying its fidelity; and the heads of the dynastic parties at Madrid have already been compelled to suspend their intrigues for a moment. The Republicans, on the other hand, are using their utmost efforts to excite agitation, and their principal club or representative body has, as if in anticipation of a crisis, ostentatiously delegated its powers to its President. Nevertheless SAGASTA ought to profit by the defeat of the least formidable enemy of the Government. The alleged irregularities of the general election will have been forgotten in the excitement of a war, although the conflict may have been on a petty scale. All the popular commonplaces are on the side of liberty, of democracy, and of every theory which is repudiated by Don CARLOS and his partisans. The cry of "Death to the foreigner!" is perhaps effective in Biscay and Navarre; but, although Spaniards may not generally entertain liberal feelings to aliens, the elected King is hardly more of a stranger than the Duke of MADRID, and he is less of an intruder. Although the Republicans in Spain, as in France, have always proclaimed the divine right of their favourite institution, they have never attempted, except in a few isolated outbreaks, to impose their doctrine on their countrymen by force. All reasonable persons will regard as criminal the promotion of a civil war for objects which, if they were desired by the majority of the people, might be attained by peaceful means. When PRAM spent nearly two years in hunting for a King, the friends of the Duke of MADRID had an opportunity of urging claims which must have been recognized if they had been acknowledged by the country at large. In the first freely elected Cortes after the expulsion of Queen ISABELLA the Carlists formed but an inconsiderable section. As long as the insurgents remain in their own mountains, they may perhaps maintain the struggle; but even if they had defeated SERRANO's army, they would be invading a hostile country when they ventured to march on Madrid. Although the Spaniards are said to be hostile to centralization, they are not so indifferent to national unity as to tolerate the virtual separation of the Northern provinces from the monarchy. Sooner or later the insurrection will be inevitably suppressed, and it is for the interest of all parties that the struggle should be as brief as possible. It may be worth the while of the Government to understand the causes which have induced a portion of the population to revolt. It is scarcely to be supposed that men risk their lives or that women send their sons into the field merely through religious enthusiasm, or in disinterested devotion to an unknown prince whose last reigning ancestor was CHARLES IV. Their grievances must be of a more solid kind, and probably they are in some degree well founded. It may be practicable for the Cortes to remove chronic dissatisfaction when armed resistance is finally suppressed. It will not be possible to satisfy the section of the priesthood which resents all modern infringements of clerical privileges; but, except in the districts which have returned Carlist members to Congress, the clergy would seem to have little political power. In Spain, as in other countries, owners of property and men of business prefer any tolerable Government which happens to exist to almost any alternative. King AMADEO may not be regarded with deep attachment, but he has been regularly and legally chosen as King; and his adversaries are as much opposed to the sovereignty of the Cortes as to the candidate whom they selected on the recommendation of PRIM.

If the Duke of MADRID is not likely to confer valuable services on Spain, either as an august master or as a rebel pretender, he may boast that he has already effected an important object in rendering the finances even less prosperous than usual. The cost of suppressing the insurrection will perhaps be smaller than the losses which must have been incurred through the disturbance of tranquillity, and the diminution of the credit of the Government. Spanish finances are not in ordinary times flourishing, and they will have received a fresh shock through the Carlist war, which unsettles business, while it both diminishes the revenue and largely increases the national expenditure. The mountaineers who follow the Carlist flag know nothing about the funds, but one of the objects of their rebellion is probably to avoid the payment of taxes, which it will for the present not be easy to collect. It is also not unlikely that the insurgents of Cuba may have occasion to regard Don CARLOS as their ultimate liberator. As long as a considerable force is required to suppress the Carlist rebellion, it will be difficult to detach reinforcements to Cuba. The conscription is always unpopular in Spain, and it must at least be necessarily interrupted in the disturbed districts. If the name and pretensions of the Duke of MADRID are known in the colony, they will suggest the suspicion that the restoration of absolute monarchy in Spain would not be favourable to the cause of emancipation in Cuba. The malcontents in the island are perhaps more likely to be encouraged to further perseverance by the knowledge that the Government of the Mother-country is harassed by domestic conflicts. The rebellion was first caused by the tidings of the September Revolution, although the Provisional Government can scarcely have been more obnoxious than the dynasty which was overthrown to the discontented part of the community. The energy which has since been displayed in the despatch of troops by PRIM and his successor has probably surprised and disappointed the insurgent colonists. Any interruption in the flow of reinforcements, and even any expectation that the resources of the Government were exhausted, would lead to fresh efforts on the part of the rebels, and furnish an additional pretext for interference to their foreign sympathizers. Whether the loss of Cuba would really be an injury to Spain is a question which has no concern with the patriotic character of the efforts of Don CARLOS.

There is some satisfaction in noting the changes which have taken place in international policy since the grandfather of the actual Pretender was engaged in a similar attempt. At that time it seemed to France, and especially to England, an object of paramount importance that the constitutional government which had been unwillingly conceded by FERDINAND VII. should be maintained and administered in the name of his daughter. Several years of incessant diplomacy were devoted to the establishment of the throne of ISABELLA, and the questionable enterprise of the Foreign Legion proved that the English Government had for once determined to pursue a benevolent neutrality, to the disadvantage of Don CARLOS. In the present day no foreign Power dreams of the possibility of interfering in a struggle which, however lamentable, regards the interests and wishes of the Spaniards alone. If, in defiance of all probability, Don CARLOS could make himself in fact, as by professed right, King of SPAIN, his title and Government would be acknowledged without the smallest hesitation. It is not for the interest of the Spaniards themselves that strangers should meddle with their domestic quarrels; yet it may be permissible to feel regret for the perversity which renders it impossible for a KING of promising abilities and of high character to commence the task of restoring order and harmony in Spain. The present insurrection appears to have nothing of the probability of success which can alone justify the promotion of civil war.

ARMY CONTRACTS IN FRANCE.

AT the end of last week the Duke of AUDRETTET PASQUIER made, as Reporter of the Commission appointed to examine into army contracts, a speech which produced a very startling effect in the Assembly. At the end of his address he was embraced by men of all parties, votes accepting his conclusions were unanimously adopted, and he was the hero of the hour. His revelations chiefly concerned the Empire, and an exposure of the scandals of Imperial misgovernment is equally welcome to the Right and to the Left. First of all he had to speak of a system which has long prevailed in French official life. When a contract is to be made, the Government, instead of buying directly what it wants with its own money, finds some one to make the bargain for it; and this person, according to the amount of interest he possesses, puts more or less into his own pocket by the transaction. Some very curious and edifying examples, mainly belonging to the epoch when the conduct of the German war was still in Imperial hands, were furnished to the Chamber. The Duke began by entertaining his hearers with a history of what he called the affaire CHOLLET. M. CHOLLET was a bankrupt dealer in vegetables, who seemed only to have to present himself at the War Office to get a contract for a supply of guns and cartridges by which he cleared nearly 100,000*l*. He was troubled with no surveillance, and he was allowed to supply exactly what articles he pleased; and as he had no ready money, the Office kindly advanced him a million of francs to start with. Then there was a M. HEDLEY, who "felt a wish for a contract for cartridges." He took a contract at a hundred francs for so many cartridges; but it immediately occurred to him that he was by no means getting the splendid bargain to which he was entitled. So he got a certain friendly Count to intercede for him, and this gentleman's influence was so powerful that, without any further inquiry or discussion, the figures 180 were substituted for 100. The price at which independent firms were then tendering similar cartridges to the Government was 87 francs; so that M. HEDLEY made an excellent thing by having so good a friend at Court. Then there was a M. LARIVIÈRE, who got another contract for cartridges, but whose cartridges never arrived. A Government agent, however, certified that they were on board a certain ship, and M. LARIVIÈRE got a large sum paid him. When the ship arrived there was nothing but sugar on board her. Ultimately M. LARIVIÈRE did furnish some cartridges, but he did not send them till the war was over, and then they were immediately stored in a damp cellar, so that when the Commission attempted to ascertain what they were like, it was found that they were so spoilt that there was no making out what they had been worth. Even, however, under the Empire the highest authorities set themselves in a feeble way against such jobs. But the officials ignored the views of their superiors, and gave contracts and shared plunder as they pleased. The EMPEROR and Marshal RANON on one occasion expressly forbade a contract by which a firm was to receive a commission of fifteen per cent. on muskets made with State funds under State inspection. But the firm got the contract all the same. The officials claim, in fact, a sort of right to do as they please, and have even tried to baffle the Commission of the Assembly. They tried to stop a prosecution which the MINISTER of WAR ordered to be instituted, and they very nearly succeeded. A captain was found to have been a party to a job, and he was reported to his commanding officer, who thereon immediately made him his aide-de-camp. Another officer volunteered to give information, and he was immediately made to feel the displeasure of his regimental authorities. As the Duke said with pitiful truth, Governments change, Empires fall, Ministers pass away; but the Bureaux remain, and intolerable abuses always co-exist with them. The first step to combat the abuses of Bureaux is to expose them; this the Commission has done with unsparring severity, and the Duke successfully appealed to the Assembly to pronounce that this was the true course, and that it might be hoped that a nation which has the courage to go down to the depths of the mischiefs preying on it is in a fair way to rid itself of them.

Evidently, however, histories of jobs perpetrated here and there, and entertaining tales of scandals with regard to particular contracts, only lead to the further question, what is the general state of affairs of which they are the symptoms? The Commission was led step by step to occupy itself with the wide issue of the real condition of the French army in regard to the supply of materials and equipments; when the Bureaux chose, in a moment of profound peace, to challenge Germany to fight. The Commission had to investigate what contracts had been made, what articles had been supplied, and what had become of those articles. In order to ascertain this, it was necessary to know what was the stock in hand when war was declared. The figures on paper seemed to show that the supply of materials in the summer of 1870 was by no means inadequate; but then what could have become of all these materials? An official statement put the cannon disposable for a campaign at 10,000, which was a most creditable and perhaps even excessive quantity. But then, on further inquiry, 7,000 of these cannon melted into thin air; and it appeared on equally good official authority that there were really less than 3,000. So, again, the official estimate of rifles in stock was nearly three millions and a half, but in fact there were only a million. Nor was this all. The fortresses most exposed to the enemy appear to have been absolutely destitute of most things that ought to have been in them. At Strasburg, supposed to be the great arsenal of Eastern France, there were scarcely any means of repairing a gun. The Commission only touched on this great subject, however, and recommended that a special Commission should be appointed by the Assembly to probe the matter to the bottom. Not only was this recommendation warmly welcomed, but the Assembly, without a moment's hesitation, conferred on the Commission of which the Duke was the Reporter the honourable office of itself making the inquiry. M. ROCHER, who was absent, but who spoke on a subsequent day, said that if he had been present he should have voted in harmony with the rest of the Assembly. If an inquiry is to be made into the military administration of the Empire, it was much better that the friends of the Empire should seem delighted that such an inquiry should be made. It is, indeed, the Imperial theory that the EMPEROR failed in 1870 because he had been betrayed. He believed in the 10,000 cannon and the three million and a-half of rifles. He thought Strasburg was full of every kind of material of war. He felt sure that his soldiers would get everything they could need in a campaign from his admirable organization of supply. When the critical moment came, he found out that he had been cheated, deceived, befuddled in every possible way. A good Sovereign outwitted by evil-minded subordinates is the character which since Sedan the EMPEROR has always tried to assume in the eyes of scornful France. No doubt he was cheated, deceived, and betrayed; but there are one or two things to be remembered as to this Imperial plea which France cannot forget. It is the one business of an Emperor not to be cheated and betrayed. If he offers himself as the one man capable of guiding such a country as France aright provided that everything is left to him, he abandons the very ground on which he has rested his claim to power when he owns that he has been a helpless tool of scheming, jobbing, lying officials.

The Commission had some suggestions to offer for the improvement of army administration, so that the evils of the future shall at least be less than those of the past. Everything they suggested was so rapturously received and approved by the Assembly that it is difficult to say what is the real value of suggestions that were exempt from criticism. It is not for want of a machinery for good administration that the military administration of France is so deplorably bad. There are most admirable regulations on every conceivable point; only no one thinks of attending to them. There is a Department of Control, but then the departments which it is intended to control politely ignore its existence. The Commission recommend two main changes. They wish that the regulations under which the army is to be controlled should be put into the form of a law, so that, if anything goes wrong, the Minister at the head of the department may be made directly responsible. We confess that this does not seem much of a remedy, for the Minister may be made responsible in whatever shape the regulations are framed, and the proposal seems not unlikely to lead the Assembly first into going out of its proper province and meddling with details belonging to the Executive, and then getting tired of so hopeless a task and letting the Executive do exactly what it pleases. Further, it is proposed that there should be a system of control by civilians entirely independent of the army, who shall ascertain that the State gets value for every halfpenny it lays out for stores. We can only say that if this does not plunge the French army into a chaos of red-tape it will be exceedingly lucky. But the remedies on which the Commission lays most stress are of a much more heroic character. The real safeguard against fraudulent army contracts, in the opinion of the Duke and his colleagues, lies in the adoption of the universal obligation of Frenchmen to form part of the army. The Assembly was most enthusiastic in its approbation of the suggestion, and the difficulties of M. TRASSAS, if he still wishes to oppose the general desire for compulsory service without exemptions, have been no doubt seriously increased by the success accorded to the appeal of the Duke. It might have seemed as if the French, who used to pique themselves on their gift for organization, could have managed to get their army supplied honestly and adequately with stores, whatever might be the principle on which it was raised. But the French have taken it into their heads that the military service of the whole adult male population will make France moral, and that nothing else will. The mainspring of fraudulent army contracts, the Duke and his hearers seemed to argue, is the dishonesty of fraudulent contractors; but if there are no exemptions from conscription, every one will be honest, and so there can be no more fraudulent contracts. Whether universal military service would be a good thing or a bad thing for France is a matter of grave consideration; but it is unsatisfactory to find that its admirers worship it as a kind of fetish before it has begun to exist, and that in their almost infantine belief that they have hit on a perfect plan for making honest men of thieves, they omit to balance the disadvantages against the advantages of making every man a soldier in a country where the elements of civil war seem dangerously strong and numerous already.

THE CORRESPONDENCE WITH CANADA.

A CORRESPONDENCE between the COLONIAL SECRETARY and the Canadian Ministry has led to a modified acceptance by the English Government of a proposal that it should guarantee a loan of moderate amount for the construction of an inter-oceanic railroad. As in the majority of money bargains, there was some higgling as to the amount of the guarantee, but the Canadian Ministers have prudently accepted Lord KIMBERLEY's offer of 2,500,000*l.* in answer to their request for 4,000,000*l.* The Canadians have at the same time been assured that any recommendation on the part of the Government to terminate certain articles of the Treaty would be acted upon, and that the greatest deference will be paid to the wishes of the Dominion. It would perhaps have been better to have been more liberal, especially as the high credit of the Dominion affords ample security against ultimate loss. It would even have been worth while to incur a moderate pecuniary risk as a just penalty for one of the gravest among many miscarriages involved in the unfortunate capitulation of Washington. The Canadians were reasonably discontented both with the provisions and with the omissions of the Treaty, as far as their own interests were concerned; and, as the Canadian Minister significantly remarked, "they have failed to discover that in the settlement of the so-called Alabama claims England "gained such advantages as to be required to make further "concessions at the expense of Canada." Although Lord KIMBERLEY makes the best of his case, he is evidently conscious that throughout the correspondence the Canadians are indisputably in the right. Their Ministers deserve credit for good temper which is not inconsistent with firmness, as well as for their prudence in obtaining an economical advantage which may afford some compensation for the unequal operation of the Treaty. During the negotiation the Commissioners made concessions at the expense of Canada, as if in consideration for the still larger sacrifices to which they pledged the Imperial Government. Having altered the rules of international law, having given the newfangled doctrines a retrospective operation, and having offered an apology for acts which had previously been avowed and justified as lawful, the English representatives at once acquiesced in the flat refusal of their American colleagues to include in the Treaty compensation for the piratical invasions of Canada. They also surrendered the right of the Dominion to exclusive possession of its own inshore fisheries, on condition of a colourable equivalent in American waters, and of a money payment. The concession of the fisheries was necessarily made contingent on the approval of the Canadian Parliament; but it would be dangerous for Canada to insist on the maintenance of a right which had been conceded in principle by the Imperial Government.

The remonstrance of the Canadian Ministry against the tame abandonment of the claims for damage through the Fenian invasion is not only unanswerable, but unanswered. Lord KIMBERLEY had referred to the rules relating to neutral duties during war, but "the (Canadian) Committee of Privy Council, "judging from past experience, are much more apprehensive

"of misunderstanding owing to the apparent difference of opinion between Canada and the United States as to the 'relative duties of friendly States in time of peace.' On two or three occasions the United States authorities have allowed troops to be publicly organized and armed for the purpose of invading Canada; and 'there seems no reason to hope that the United States Government will perform its duty as a friendly neighbour any better in the future than in the past.' The Imperial Government has never taken any vigorous measures for the protection of Canada. 'On the contrary, while, in the opinion of the Government and the entire people of Canada, the Government of the United States neglected, until much too late, to take the necessary measures to prevent the Fenian invasion of 1870, Her MAJESTY'S Government hastened to acknowledge by cable telegram the prompt action of the President and to thank him for it.' Exaggerated deference and undue eagerness to conciliate the goodwill of the American people largely account for the systematic encroachments which have lately culminated in the demand for consequential damages. The reclamations of the Canadian Government against the claims relating to the fisheries are less forcible, inasmuch as the case was more complicated, and also because the concession is nominally subject to the approval of the Parliament of the Dominion. The exclusive right of the Canadian fishermen, having been formally acknowledged by the Treaty of 1818, was suspended in exchange for commercial privileges in 1854, to revive on the denunciation by the Americans themselves in 1865 of the Reciprocity Treaty. The American fishermen have since been provisionally admitted on payment of license fees; but the restrictions have of late been systematically neglected or invaded; and there was frequent risk both of casual collisions and of wilful outrages promoted by American agitators. The American Commissioners declared that Congress would not sanction any relaxation of protective duties; and, as Lord KIMBERLEY argues, commercial reforms are more likely to be permanent and effective when they result from a conviction of the expediency of Free-trade than when they are made the subject of negotiation and barter. It only remained either to insist on the maintenance of existing rights, or to waive them for a pecuniary consideration. The decision of the Commissioners would have been defensible if it had been previously approved by the Canadian Parliament.

With a self-control which indicates practical statesmanship, the Canadian Ministers content themselves with their argumentative triumph, and proceed to make the best use of a legitimate grievance. Among the various liabilities which are likely to result from the Washington Treaty, it would be unreasonable to object to a guarantee which will ensure to the benefit of friends and fellow-subjects and not of litigious adversaries. As a reason or excuse for the concession, the Canadian Committee of Privy Council remind Lord KIMBERLEY that when the Western territories are opened by the Pacific Railroad they will sustain an enormous number of settlers. The population of the United States is tenfold that of Canada, and the inhabitants of the Dominion consume in proportion to their numbers three times as great a value of British products as the citizens of the United States. It is not perhaps a convincing argument in favour of a guarantee that the proposed railroad might perhaps convey the English mails to certain parts of the East. A better reason for the concession than the hope of postal or commercial advantages is supplied by the expediency of atoning for a diplomatic failure by a measure which will gratify Canadian feeling. Whether the connexion between the Mother-country and the Dominion is to last for one generation or for an indefinite period, no effort ought to be spared to cultivate the loyal goodwill of the Canadians to the English nation and the Crown. The animosity which has survived for nearly a century the independence of the other North American provinces is not the less a misfortune because it has been fostered by the ignorance and prejudice of an imperfectly educated community. The Americans perversely resent the natural reluctance of GEORGE III. and his countrymen to permit the disruption of the Empire. Colonists in the present day are frequently irritated by the opposite error of pedantic politicians who contend that the retention of distant dependencies is unprofitable and occasionally burdensome. It is fortunate that the new GOVERNOR-GENERAL of Canada is not likely to be insensible to imaginative influences and to Imperial sympathies. Lord DUFFERIN will never go out of his way to remind the Canadians that they may detach themselves from their allegiance without fear of coercion.

The Correspondence on the Treaty and the proposed guarantee illustrates the new constitutional relation which has arisen both in Canada and in the Australian colonies from the modern experiment of so-called responsible government. The Cabinet which, while it has absorbed the whole executive power of the Crown, has still no recognized place in the English Constitution, assumes in Canada, under its proper title of the Committee of Privy Council, an independent character in which it corresponds and negotiates with the Imperial Government. In theory the Governor-General selects his Ministers, though they are necessarily, as in England, the leaders of the Parliamentary majority; but, while it is his business to obey the instructions of the Crown, the Committee of Privy Council is already recognized as the authorised representative of the Parliament and people. A minute of the English Cabinet is intended only for the guidance of its members, except on the rare occasions on which a collective resolution of the Ministers is submitted to the Sovereign. A minute of the Canadian Committee of Privy Council, formally approved by the Governor-General, is a State paper embodying the decision of the Government on the most important affairs. It is convenient that a Ministerial body should be interposed between the Colonial Parliament and the Home Government; and there is a strong presumption in favour of institutions which owe their origin to practical expediency rather than to deliberate and theoretical legislation. The successive statesmen who, sometimes through indolence, and sometimes in accordance with their convictions, conceded responsible government to the colonies, probably persuaded themselves that the intercourse between the Secretary of State and the colonies would afterwards, as in former times, be conducted by the Governor. As the Ministers now exercise the chief political power, it is desirable that their position should be acknowledged, and also that colonial statesmen should be known to those who hold office at home. The Canadian Committee of Privy Council apparently consists of sagacious men of business who regard substantial advantages as the best results of a dialectic victory.

MR. GORDON'S VICTORY.

IN the position in which the Government now stands the Conservatives were wise for the moment when they determined to support Mr. Gordon's impracticable and almost meaningless Resolution. Nothing can make the fall of the Ministry more certain than the growth of an impression that there is not a single question upon which they can count with any confidence upon getting a majority. Until last Monday Mr. FORSTER's educational policy seemed to be the solitary fortress which they could regard as impregnable. Now this has proved as weak as the rest, and if the Government can still claim to be the stronger party in the House of Commons, it must be with the serious qualification that their strength usually fails them when it is most needed. Though the unlucky result of Monday's division is no doubt mainly due to the irritation caused by the fanatical hostility of Secularist and Dissenting zealots to religious education, it must also be attributed in part to the serious tactical blunder of which the Government were guilty in maintaining an almost unbroken silence throughout the debate. It is not an easy matter to keep a party together till past midnight without allowing them to hear their own voices. Nor can we believe that if Mr. FORSTER had from the first given the discussion the importance which, as the result proved, really belonged to it, the Conservatives would have given Mr. GORDON such an undivided vote. For reasons to be presently stated, the adoption of the Resolution would, if it could possibly be regarded as serious, be a heavy blow to the cause of national education even in England; and if the fact had been clearly brought out, there must have been some members of the Opposition who would have felt that this was too great a price to pay even for the pleasure of putting the Government in a minority. As it was, there were no timely reminders to check the excited zeal of assailants who saw victory within their grasp. The debate began and ended with scarcely a reference to the graver issues which underlay the terms of the motion. The only reason assigned by Mr. FORSTER for declining the challenge offered to him was his desire not to waste time by discussing, before going into Committee, a subject which he maintained could be more conveniently discussed in Committee. If there could be no such thing as a one-sided debate, this argument might have had some weight. Inasmuch, however, as the Opposition had it in its power to waste time in talking without any aid from the other side, the argument had been overturned by the time that Mr. FORSTER rose. Even if the division had been in favour of the Government, the evening would have been lost just as much as though their supporters had not been tongue-tied. If the consequences of Mr. GORDON's Resolution had been thoroughly sifted, the passage of the Bill into Committee would not have been more delayed than it has been by the course actually taken, and the Committee would not have had to begin its labours with a millstone tied about its neck.

The defeats sustained by Mr. DIXON and Mr. CANDLISH, and the dislike evidently felt by the majority of Englishmen to the arrogant pretensions put forward by the Manchester Conference, have unfortunately had their natural effect in turning the heads of the Conservatives. Hitherto they have taken their stand on the English Education Act, as embodying the best practicable settlement of the religious difficulty. They have assented to the impossibility of any direct teaching of religion by the State, and have found in the liberty accorded to each locality to teach what religion it thinks fit a substantial, if imperfect, recognition of the value of religious training. It was to be expected, therefore, that when a Scotch Education Bill, identical in all its essential features with the English measure, was brought forward by the Government, the Opposition would give it an equally cordial support. That the Secularists should oppose it was only consistent, for it reproduced in a stronger form the absolute freedom of every School Board to teach religious dogma. But that the men who have identified themselves with the Elementary Education Act as completely as though it had been their own production; who have defended it, in and out of Parliament, as the very mainstay of religious teaching against Secularism; who have cheered Mr. FORSTER's repeated declarations that from the principle of the Act of 1870 the Government would not stir a single step—that these men should join in denouncing an Education Bill because it leaves every parish free to deal with the religious difficulty as it pleases, is a revolution for which we were not prepared, and which even now it is difficult to regard as a literal fact. The true significance of the Conservative attitude upon Mr. GORDON's motion hardly came out in the debate. No attempt was made by any of the speakers to show why a settlement of the religious difficulty which has been generally accepted in England ought to be rejected as unholy in Scotland. The Conservative journals have been less reticent, and, if we are to accept their version of Monday night's division, the Opposition now think themselves strong enough to repudiate the compromise into which they entered in 1870. That compromise, so sacred in their eyes not three months ago, is now denounced as a futile attempt to meet the enemies of Denominational religion half way, and an ignoble compact with the foes of truth and religion; while the educational policy to which, when the Government were strong, the Conservative organs paid so many flattering compliments, is now described as a systematic attack on religion, none the less bitter and relentless because Mr. FORSTER pretends that it is an effort for its defence. The morality of this change of front is not worth criticism; but the consequences of the change will certainly be embarrassing, and may possibly be serious. It is impossible for a political party to take the line taken by the Opposition on Monday, and yet to find fault with the Education League for disturbing the compromise of 1870. If the Dissenters and the Secularists have tried to disturb the compromise, the Conservatives and the Denominationalists—so far as they are represented by the Conservatives—have, in words at least, utterly torn it up. For the time the current of public feeling may be in their favour. They may construct a Scotch Education Bill after their own hearts, and then go on to alter and amend the English Education Act. But, if this is to be their policy, the punishment that falls on men who repudiate compromises when they think themselves too strong to need them will certainly overtake them in the end. By and by popular sympathy will once more have gone round, and a Liberal Government will again find itself confronted by educational difficulties. It will be vain for it to propose to meet them by another compromise, for the Secularists will say, and say truly, that the Conservatives cannot be trusted to abide by a compromise a moment longer than it happens to suit their purpose. The educational strength of the country will be hopelessly arrayed in hostile camps, and the progress of popular education will be suspended, that the rival factions may fight their battle out.

It is some satisfaction to think that this betrayal of the cause of education is sure to bring with it its own punishment. We said that the Conservatives were wise for the moment in supporting Mr. GORDON's Resolution; but, considering the obvious tendency, if not the inevitable consequences, of the act, that moment will be a very brief one. Mr. HARDY put forward the one plea on which the adoption of such a Resolution could be justified when he challenged Mr. FORSTER to prove that, because certain principles were enacted in the English Bill, they should be necessarily enacted also in the Scotch Bill. It may be maintained no doubt, with much show of reason, that so long as Scotland wishes to have Presbyterianism taught at the public expense in every national school, the fact that in England the school authorities in every district are allowed to teach the religion professed by the local majority, or, if they prefer it, none at all, is nothing to the purpose. But if this absolute educational independence is to be accorded to one of the three kingdoms, it cannot in any fairness be refused to another. The Scotch are not more deeply attached to Presbyterianism than the Irish are to Roman Catholicism, and if to please the former the Imperial Parliament is to pass a Bill providing for the teaching of Presbyterianism in every school in Scotland, common consistency will demand that to please the latter it shall pass a Bill providing for the teaching of Roman Catholicism in every Irish school. In all probability it will fall to the lot of a Conservative Government to deal with the Education question in Ireland. It is difficult to believe that if the Conservatives had realized this prospect more clearly, they would have spoken as they spoke on Monday. They have refused to plant in Scotland a system as secular as the English, because the Scotch wish their religion to be taught universally. Are they prepared to maintain in Ireland a system far more secular than the English when the Irish wish precisely the same thing as the Scotch? It is not wise to quarrel with compromises until you are quite sure that they will not be wanted again. On the whole, we can quite understand that the Conservatives vastly liked the twofold sport of beating the Government and snubbing the Secularists; but we hardly think that the evening's enjoyment was of a kind to bear the morning's reflection.

M. THIERS AND THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

M. THIERS seems bent upon showing that historians, unlike history, constantly repeat themselves. He cannot throw off his habit of threatening to retire from office whenever he has failed in getting the Assembly to do what he wishes. The vote by which the nomination of the members of the Council of State is vested in the Assembly instead of in the Executive has furnished him with another occasion for waving his favourite weapon in the eyes of the Deputies. The PRESIDENT has allowed it to become known that his retention of office depends on the action of the Assembly upon the third reading of the Bill. If the hint is taken in a proper spirit, and the recent decision is reversed, all will be forgotten. If the Assembly stands by its vote, M. GUYOT will again receive the PRESIDENT's resignation. It will be no wonder if the Assembly should prove to have lost faith in these repeated threats. They have been so often uttered, and so invariably withdrawn, that they cannot but have lost something of their original power. Whether M. THIERS does or does not mean what he says at the moment of saying it, this method of managing the Assembly is equally to be regretted. M. THIERS is something more than a Minister, and he has no right to divest himself of the more than Ministerial obligations which belong to his position. He embodies in his own person the whole Government. Cabinets may resign, for the vote which ejects them from office virtually designates the politicians who are to take their place. Kings may abdicate, for their crowns will devolve by force of law upon their ascertained heirs. The Presidents of ordinary Republics may lay down their office, for the process of electing a successor is defined and understood. But M. THIERS has no lender of Opposition ready to take his place; the Provisional King has no ascertained heir waiting to mount the throne; and it has not yet been decided who is to elect the President's successor, or whether he is to have a successor at all. In such a state of things as this a sudden resignation on the part of M. THIERS might be equivalent to a proclamation of anarchy. It is hard to believe that any patriotic statesman can deliberately contemplate an act so fraught with disastrous possibilities. Resignation seems to be the one step which circumstances absolutely forbid M. THIERS to take. It is conceivable that he might be driven to dissolve the Assembly by a coup d'état; for the inability of the Executive to get at the real opinion of the country by means of a general election is so monstrous a defect in constitutional machinery that a ruler may be pardoned for consulting the spirit of representative government in preference to the latter. It is conceivable again that, rather than have recourse to this extreme measure, he might bring an amount of pressure to bear upon the Deputies which in ordinary cases would be wholly illegitimate. A President who is denied the commonplace expedient of a dissolution may be excused if he resorts to strange methods of controlling an Assembly which he has no regular means of sending to its constituents. But to retire from office does not even cut the knot of a difficulty. It may gratify the irritated feelings of M. THIERS, but, with this single exception, it can only exaggerate existing evils. Yet if we suppose M. THIERS to appreciate these objections to the course which he talks of taking, and consequently to have no real intention of taking it, he cannot be acquitted of a grave fault of another kind. He is treating the Assembly as a nurse treats a naughty child—he threatens to go away and leave it to itself unless it promises to be good directly. There is no need to inquire whether the French Assembly deserves this treatment. It is enough to say that it is not a child, and that its faults cannot be corrected like the faults of children. The great want of France at the present moment is that the nation should get accustomed to respect and submit to the decisions of a representative body. It cannot be expected that political parties should learn this lesson when the example of despising such a body is set them by the PRESIDENT himself.

The particular vote which M. THIERS is anxious to have rescinded is one which need never have been given if he had been wise enough to let the constitution of the Council of State alone. A great deal has been written in this country about the inconsistency of the French Liberals in wishing to retain the Council of State as an agent of administration. What, it has been asked, can be more laughable than to see Republicans trying to strengthen the hands of the Executive by setting up afresh a power which has heretofore been able to reverse the acts of the Legislature itself? It would need a very careful and exhaustive examination of the incidents of government in France to determine the validity of this objection. Much is done there by the central authority which in England is done by the local authorities, or left altogether undone; and it may be necessary that the central authority should have a stronger instrument at its disposal than would be wanted in a system under which less was expected from it. Whatever may be the motives of individual Republicans in giving increased powers to the Executive, it cannot be denied that a strong Government is at least as necessary under a Republic as under any other form of polity. In France especially one main reason why Republics have hitherto failed is that this essential requisite has been wanting. No doubt there has often been great need of some better protection of individual liberty against executive encroachment, but there are other and more effectual ways of securing this end than by simply weakening the authority against the abuse of which it is desired to guard. Nor can there be much question that, if there is a Council of State at all, its members ought to be named by the President and not by the Assembly. The object for which the Council of State exists is to assist the Executive in governing the country. The object for which a Council nominated by the Assembly would exist would be to act as a check upon the Executive in governing the country. It may be expedient that both, or neither, or one or other of these bodies should be created in France, but it is certain that the functions of the two are distinct. If the members of the Council of State are appointed by the Assembly, the Council will not answer the same purpose or play the same part as if they were appointed by the PRESIDENT. In other words, the Council will not be what has hitherto been understood by the Council of State; it will be much more like the Permanent Committee which the Assembly has instituted to keep watch on M. THIERS during the Parliamentary vacations. But while it is natural that M. THIERS should resent a process by which what he meant to be a weapon in the hands of the Executive has been converted into a check in the hands of the Assembly, it is his own doing that the controversy has been raised. Under the Government of the 4th of September the Council of State fell into abeyance, and since then such of its duties as had to be performed have been performed by a Provisional Committee. If M. THIERS had been content to leave well alone he would not have provoked a collision between himself and the Assembly. He has managed to rule France for more than a year without any regular Council of State, and there is nothing to show that he could not have gone on doing so with equal ease until the time when it will become necessary to decide under what institutions France is to live. M. THIERS insisted on dragging this solitary question from the obscurity which veils the constitutional future of the country, and he has only himself to thank for the complications in which his restlessness has involved him.

THE SHUNTING OF THE PERMISSIVE BILL.

THE latest reinforcement to the Alliance comes from the National Assembly of France, which we are told has held "an interesting debate on inebriety." It is announced as a new and important discovery that there is drunkenness in Paris, "although France is a light-wine country." The fact does not surprise us, but we are curious to see what argument can be founded on it. The introduction of a Permissive Bill in France is hardly probable, although, if the principle of the Bill be sound, it ought to be capable of universal application. Let us imagine two-thirds of the inhabitants of a district resolving to discontinue wine-growing themselves, and to compel the other third to do the same. Or, to take an example nearer home, we may inquire what is to happen in Devonshire, where almost every farmer grows cider. Suppose that the Alliance send their most eloquent apostle into that county, and that he persuades a large majority that the apple pip is the seed of evil. We have heard of an attempt, which might be thought equally hopeful, to persuade the townsmen of Doncaster that horse-racing is wicked. But in order to test the principle of the Bill, we are entitled to assume that a majority of farmers determine to prevent a minority from growing cider. Of course we shall be told that the Bill only prohibits sale, and does not interfere with growth or manufacture. But we answer that, if so, the Bill is no better than a sham. A farmer who makes cider must either sell it or give it away, and from the point of view of the Alliance he is a heavier offender than the publican whom they so vehemently denounce. The effect of the application of a Permissive Act in a parish would be that "no licence whatever should be granted for the sale of alcoholic liquor" in that parish, neither to the wine-merchant proper, nor to the grocer, nor to the publican, nor to the beer-house keeper. The Alliance is so far consistent that it does not, like some other assailants of the publican, allow his competitor the grocer to escape. The only exemption which it contemplates is that of sellers of methylated spirit for use in art or manufacture, who may perhaps find themselves doing a considerable business after the adoption of the Act. Experience shows that deprivation of ordinary stimulants will drive those who are accustomed to them to adopt disagreeable and even dangerous substitutes. Whatever the heads of the medical profession may say upon this subject, we should fear that the body and tail of it would discover a disposition to prescribe for patients suffering under a Permissive Act "strengthening medicines," which druggists would be ready to supply. The evasion of the Act would be enormous, and a trade would spring up something like that which existed formerly in the West of England, where even the parson of the parish obtained—for we do not say he bought—spirits of a gang of smugglers. By a stroke of humour, the Bill proposes to subject liquor-dealers to Excise penalties, although it will deprive them of all benefit from Excise law. "Any person selling or disposing of any alcoholic liquor" shall be dealt with as selling without licence. The vagueness of the word "dispose" is perhaps more frightful than anything else. The operation sometimes described as "putting oneself outside liquor" appears capable of being included in it. Whatever the word comprises will be an "offence" subject to all the penalties provided by any existing statute for purposes either of revenue or police, which might easily amount to 100*l.* a day. Let us picture to ourselves the suspense of all dealers in a district during the canvass and voting on the adoption of the Act. If they escape this year they will be in equal peril next year, and they will be always liable to stoppage of their business at the expiration of the licence which they then hold—that is, within a year. Not only the sale of liquor to be consumed in the parish, but every sale of liquor within the parish will be prohibited. A dealer in a market town cannot supply a farmer who lives ten miles distant with a jar of whisky. The sale is complete when the jar is delivered to the farmer himself, or to his servant, or to a carrier by road or rail. The authors of the Bill did not perhaps mean all this, but they say it. They propose to turn the exciseman into a sort of attorney-general of the Alliance.

The only novelty in this week's debate on the Permissive Bill was that it did not finish. It does not matter much what may be the result of the division, if it ever takes place.

because the Bill is certain never to pass; and its supporters have told us that, whether they gain or lose votes as compared with last year, they will be stimulated to greater energy in years to come. They have, indeed, a happy faculty of making the best of everything for their own purpose. One provincial speaker approves the Bill because, if factory-hands were sober, they would not turn out; another approves it because they would. Sometimes we hear that drunkenness is increased by distress, and at other times that it is increased by plenty of work at high wages. The latest announcement is that the Commune came to grief through drink, and whether that effect was to be desired from that or any other cause is matter of opinion. We learn on the same authority that during the siege of Paris the National Guards, "not being well supplied with food, took to drinking," and they have, as soldiers say, continued the movement since the surrender. It is odd that an intelligent person should be able to make this statement without perceiving its application. There is a principle in human nature which demands alcoholic stimulants under circumstances of peculiar hardship. It is said that a distinguished general who was a teetotaler, being about to start on a difficult and hazardous expedition, directed his commissariat officer to be particular about the supply of rum. When preparations were made for the siege of Paris, the authorities doubtless collected all the wine and brandy they could lay hands on. Turning from the horrors of war to the festivities of peace, we find a supporter of the Permissive Bill remarking on the liberal presents of liquor sent to the refreshment department of a bazaar at Liverpool. It was, as we understand, the intention of the givers of this wine and beer that it should be sold retail for the benefit of some charity for which the bazaar was held. We regret to observe that this transaction, however laudable, would be a "selling or disposing" of alcoholic liquor liable to the penalties of the Bill. This is a clear illustration of the impossibility of passing a measure which nevertheless certain members of Parliament support as "a step in the right direction." Some members doubtless mean, although they do not say, that the votes which they intend to give will make things pleasant for themselves, and will do no harm to anybody else. This at any rate was the notion which used to prevail in the House of Commons; but it has lately appeared that the choice between the Alliance and the publicans is like that between Scylla and Charybdis. The contrivance of discussing the Permissive Bill until it was too late to divide upon it is advantageous; but we greatly doubt whether any new feature can be introduced into the annual performance unless Sir WILFRID LAWSON will go to America and personally test the operation of the Prohibitory Law. We had thought a member of Parliament who desired this Bill to pass a strange animal; but a member who desired to hear more than one morning's talk about it must be stranger still. Another and even more remarkable variety of the Parliamentary mind is the member who contemplates the possibility of considering in Committee on the Bill the question of compensation to interests affected by it. We have heard of a claim to compensation by the landlord of the "Pickled Egg," whose business was affected by a railway. In such cases, if compensation is given at all, it is assessed liberally, and sometimes amounts to large sums. But it would be extravagant to propose that the ratepayers of a parish adopting a Permissive Act should pay compensation on a scale similar to that imposed on Railway Companies, or indeed on any scale at all.

It is in vain to disguise the character of this Bill. It seeks, as Mr. HENLEY said, to destroy a large existing trade which has been permitted to grow up in this country with the sanction of the Legislature, and which is founded on the ordinary and true principles of supply and demand. The spectacle of workmen devoting their leisure moments to the collection of signatures to petitions in favour of the Permissive Bill has, in the eyes of the author of that Bill, "something touching in it," and ought not to be laughed at. Certainly this spectacle would be no laughing matter to the publicans if the Bill as well as the agitation had "something touching" in it. But Parliament will never consent to place a vast property under liability to be destroyed by a chance vote of ratepayers. The owners of that property know that it can only be preserved by regulating the trade in which it is invested, and brewers and publicans appear alike desirous that a well-considered Licensing Bill should pass. The HOME SECRETARY is able to expect that, by a stringent application of the Act for plucking beer-houses from under magisterial control, and of the Act for the prevention of crime, a large number of the worst class of liquor-shops has been closed. "The reduction in crime in certain districts has been out of all proportion to the reduction in the number of those houses, because the houses suppressed were the worst of all." If this be the first result of an obvious and easy reform, it is surely worth while to try for a few more years the effect of perseverance in the same unambitious course, instead of throwing the entire liquor trade of the Kingdom into an annual panic by a Permissive Act.

OUR FOREIGN VISITORS.

THERE are various indications that the tendency of recent events has been to shift the social as well as the financial meridian of Europe, and to make London more than ever the centre of affairs. Our capital has always been a tolerably cosmopolitan city, but the number of our foreign guests appears to be increasing in a remarkable degree. In all public places and large assemblies a Babel of strange tongues may now be heard. Of the French emigrants who were cast thither by the war and the Commune, many from choice or necessity still remain. Indeed, not a few Frenchmen at the present moment feel almost more at home in London than in Paris; and it is not perhaps surprising that the Germans should reckon upon a more agreeable reception here than in the city which was lately surrounded by their armies. There used to be a saying that good Americans expected, when they died, to go to Paris; but even the Americans are wavering in their allegiance. The democrats of the New World appear to be of opinion that it is hardly worth while to cross the Atlantic except to be presented at Court; they can shake hands with a President any day at home. However Paris may settle its relations with the rest of France—and the exile of M. THIERS and the Assembly at Versailles must soon draw to a close—it will be many years before it regains, if ever it does regain, its supremacy in Europe. Its importance for politicians has declined with its influence; and the financial world obeys a natural instinct in establishing its head-quarters on less volcanic soil. For pleasure-seekers of course Paris has still attractions, but even for this class it has lost much of its old charm; its gaiety is rebuked by painful associations, and the rapacity of its shopkeepers has been sharpened by a series of misfortunes and the pressure of augmented taxation into something like ferocity. Berlin has made a sudden start of late, but it can hardly hope to supplant Paris as the chief place of Europe; Vienna is under a cloud, and St. Petersburg is too remote. So, for the moment, it has come to pass that London is in fashion. The Germans who are kept away from Paris, and the French who will not go to Berlin, are willing to meet in London, and other nations find that the rendezvous is not an inconvenient one. If our city cannot boast of the amenities of Paris, it is not without attractions of its own, for those who understand it, and who do not expect it to be something which it is not, and cannot be. Its society is varied and interesting; and in recent years its appearance has certainly been improved. The Embankment has added to its dignity, and supplies a magnificent open terrace from which the city may be viewed; its Parks are more artistically managed than they used to be; and its environs in natural beauty have always been unsurpassed by those of any other capital. It has been so long the custom to disparage and abuse London as a bewildering labyrinth of dingy streets and a vast overgrown mass of houses, that people who now visit it for the first time are probably surprised to find how much better it is than they expected.

Our two most important guests at the present moment are the King of the BELGIANS and the German EMPRESS, who may perhaps be regarded as relations with whom no great ceremony need be used; and it is probably well that other Royal or Imperial personages should defer their visits until some arrangements can be made to give them a reception suitable to their rank. With Buckingham Palace hardly occupied, and Marlborough House not occupied at all, it rather jars on public feeling that the King of the BELGIANS, to whom everybody is anxious that attention should be shown, should have to put up at an hotel. The King is no doubt as comfortable as he could desire to be, and the popular feeling on the subject is only a sentiment, but it is a sentiment which is not unreasonable. It is true, however, that the King has been invited to Windsor, and the German EMPRESS has really been treated as a guest of the QUEEN. It is a small matter perhaps, but it may be observed that the Court Circular, in making HER MAJESTY EMPRESS of, instead of in, Germany, confers on her a title which, we believe, is not recognised by her husband's subjects. It is well known that HER MAJESTY takes a deep interest in all benevolent and philanthropic efforts; and during her brief stay in town her attention has been mainly directed to the management of our hospitals. The EMPRESS acquired great experience on this subject by her personal supervision, so anxious and incessant that it affected her health, of the military hospitals and the arrangements for the sick and the wounded during the war; and her testimony to the sound administration of the institutions which she has just visited is therefore valuable. There is no reason to regret that it has not been deemed necessary to entertain either the King or the EMPRESS with an exhibition of military force. The melancholy absurdity of these displays when offered as a hospitable attention culminated when the late Emperor of the FRENCH drew out his troops as a pretty show for the King of PRUSSIA, upon whom he was then meditating an attack, while the KING returned the compliment by sending his great KRUPP gun to be one of the chief ornaments of the Paris Exhibition. The visit of the King of the BELGIANS had its origin in an eminently peaceful object, for he came to preside at the annual dinner of the Royal Literary Fund. Mr. DISRAELI remarked on the agreeable inconsistency of a Sovereign presiding over the Republic of Letters; but there is no jealous Moxon doctrine to forbid the connexion; and it must be acknowledged that for geniality, good taste, and personal sympathy with the object in view, a better chairman than the King of the BELGIANS could not have been found. An English audience is naturally flattered by being addressed in its own tongue by a distinguished foreigner, and the KING, as his speeches showed, not only speaks English, but speaks it well. It was inevitable perhaps that an occasion of this kind should be largely used for mutual admiration. Mr. DISRAELI was good enough to give the "Sovereign Chairman," as he called him, a first-class certificate for constitutional qualities; and the KING returned the compliment by stating that he had heard his father say that the author of Vivian Grey was a man of talent. His MAJESTY also testified that he had himself found Lord STANHOPE's historical writings very entertaining, and the observation was the more gracious as it presented his lordship's History in a new light. Lord STANHOPE in his turn expatiated on the political wisdom of the Belgians, but the evidence which he offered was of a somewhat negative character. It appears that some years back one of the Swiss Cantons fell under the control of a small despotic party, which, finding itself in a minority at a general election, decided that all who had abstained from voting should be numbered on the side of the Government, and thus made its minority a majority. It is true that nothing of this kind ever happened in Belgium, but this is surely rather a roundabout way of proving that the Belgians have always been distinguished for their love of freedom and their resolute adherence to constitutional principles.

Mr. DISRAELI did no more than justice to the wise statesmanship of LEOPOLD I., which, with his grateful attachment to England, his son has in no small degree inherited. It was the peculiar merit of the former that he knew exactly what it was proper and necessary to do within the limits prescribed, not merely by the letter, but by the spirit of the Constitution, and what it was well to leave undone. He never hesitated to exert his personal influence and to assume responsibility when it seemed to be probable that his intentions would be attended with good results; but he was also aware that the greatest service he could render his adopted country might be to go away for a time and leave the strife of parties to work itself out. His subjects used to be amused by the errant habits of le roi voyageur; but his travels were sometimes strokes of policy. A statesman of the calibre of LEOPOLD I. is not reproduced in every generation, but his successor has already shown that he possesses much of his father's resolute tact and diplomatic judgment. The policy which secured the political neutrality of Belgium, and, as Mr. DISRAELI observed, consorted to perpetual peace the battle-field of Europe, has certainly been successful; but this has been owing to the energy of Belgium as well as to the contingent protection of her allies. It has been said that a country that has no history may be supposed to have been happy; but the King of the BELGIANS, reversing the rule, suggests that the peacefulness and prosperity of England during the present reign render this period a particularly "magnificent theme" for the poet and the historian. It is true that peace has her triumphs as well as war, but it has usually been observed that poets and historians prefer to seek their inspiration in incidents of a more exciting character than those of quiet respectable domestic life. Whatever use may be made of the present reign by the poets and historians of the future, it is undeniably true that it has itself been abundantly fruitful in literary results. Literature as an industry never was more active or prosperous. It has been suggested that, as literature pays so well nowadays, it should not go begging for alms; but there is no reason, as far as we see, why all classes should not contribute to the relief of destitute and meritorious men of letters if they choose to do so; and it is known that the profits of literary labour are not invariably measured by its intrinsic value. In associating himself with this charitable work the King of the BELGIANS performed a genial act in a very graceful manner, and some unfortunate writers or their families will perhaps be the better for it; but it is perhaps rash to assume that it will make much difference as regards the general course of European politics.

THE PECULIAR PEOPLE.

THE "Peculiar People" who every now and then crop up in an obscure corner of our newspapers are not by themselves a very wonderful phenomenon. They are simply one more illustration of a truth which we ought to be in no danger of forgetting—the extraordinary vitality, namely, of forms of superstition long exploded amongst thinking people. The explanation is of course that a very small part of the population is really capable of thinking at any time, and that new ideas percolate down to the lower social strata with extreme difficulty. The people who are capable of rejecting the absurdities of witchcraft, or fortune-telling, or astrology, by their own unassisted powers, are a trifling minority; and of the great mass who are obliged to trust to the authority of their wisers and betters, few are capable even of appreciating the value of the authority. There is still as much soil as ever suitable to the growth of fine crops of superstition; the only difference is that not quite so many seeds are planted. We are more inclined to wonder at the rarity than at the occasional occurrence of queer forms of belief once supposed to be extinct. The fundamental tenet of the Peculiar People seems to be that not only is every word of the English Bible absolutely true, but that every fragment of a sentence taken by itself conveys a complete and unerring rule of practice. They are not so far removed from many persons who even make some pretensions to learning that we need wonder much at their peculiarities. Incidentally, however, their relations to the rest of mankind have suggested a problem of some interest. The Peculiar People think it wrong to call in medical assistance in cases of disease, and allow their children to die for the want of it. How far are we justified in interfering with this practice? and how far does the fact that it originates in a genuine religious belief render a course of conduct improper which would otherwise be permissible? The problem is not an important one in itself; but it involves some nice questions of casuistry, and its full discussion might tend to throw light upon the general principles of toleration. A few observations on the subject may therefore not be out of place.

The question is, whether we may rightly punish a man for not obtaining medical help for his children. If the patient himself declined assistance, we might be disposed to give a very short answer. It would certainly be a piece of tyranny, or so we should say at first sight, to force a man to take medicine if he did not believe in its efficacy. Indeed it is almost an open question whether he would not be generally right. It is a delicate problem whether the health of the world would be improved or deteriorated by the extermination of all doctors. It is certain that in the last century Government would have enforced remedies, such as excessive bleeding, which we should now hold to be directly injurious; and it is not impossible that our descendants may think that the popularity of some remedies now popular is also an illustration of our ignorance. Indeed the question would at once occur, whether we should administer homoeopathic globules or the orthodox medicines, and such a discussion would very soon become as bitter as any that rages over State interference in religious matters. In order to enforce any practice by forcible measures, it is clearly necessary that something like certainty should have been obtained in regard to the principles upon which it is founded. It is more generally admitted that we have no infallible authority in medicine than that we have no such authority in religion. Why then not tolerate a medical secularism, if we may use the expression, as freely as we tolerate Mr. Bradlaugh? Why force people to take pills any more than we force them to go to church? And if this be admitted, as will probably be the case, does it not also follow that we should allow people to treat their children according to that unmedical system which they prefer? Is there any matter in which the sense of parental responsibility should be more anxiously maintained than the care of their children's bodily health, unless, indeed, it be the care of their spiritual health? If we should allow a man—and it is generally agreed that we have, in point of fact, no other choice—to bring up his children without a belief in God or a future life, to say nothing of any more special form of creed, why should we not allow him to bring them up without the pills or potions of any recognized sect of physicians?

To this it will be answered that there are some matters which must evidently come under the control of the State, and cannot be removed from it by a simple allegation that they are instinctively associated with religious principles. There is, for example, the generally quoted case of the Thug; the State must put down murder, whether it is or is not regarded as acceptable to the deities of the animal. The same principle would of course justify us in enforcing necessary regulations for the restraint of infectious diseases. A man has no more right to give his neighbour the smallpox than to put a rope round his throat; and we must in each case adopt such measures of prevention as experience proves to be effective. If we are compelled, in so doing, to assume the truth of certain medical theories, it is not that we wish to enforce any theory by law, but that we are taking the only means open to us of securing a strictly legitimate end. Nothing can be more distinctly within the proper sphere of legislation than to say that a man shall not wantonly spread disease; and the medical rule is enforced merely by way of inseparable corollary, and not as our principal motive. Putting aside, however, this consideration, the case is rather different when we confine ourselves entirely to the children. It is plain, indeed, that there are some rules which we must enforce unless we intend to make the paternal authority equivalent to the severest form of slavery. A father must be bound to feed and clothe his children, because otherwise we give him leave to starve them to death whenever he likes. If he should lock up a child without food for a fortnight, he would be properly treated as a deliberate murderer, even though he had brought Scripture to justify an absolute confidence on his part that ravens would bring them bread and meat. There are, however, actions in regard to which it is not easy to draw the line, or even to discover the guiding principle. A gentleman started the theory not long ago that children ought to wear no clothes for the first years of their lives. He put it in practice in regard to his own sons; and, if we remember rightly, he describes his boy as running about in the snow stark naked at the age of ten, and rather enjoying it than otherwise. According to the theory of the father—and probably it rested on as sound a foundation as a good many other medical theories—the constitution of civilized mankind has been seriously weakened by an effeminate indulgence in clothes; and if his boy had died from diseases brought on, in the opinion of jealous physicians, by exposure, his parent would of course have considered it to be a vexatious but accidental coincidence. Would it then have been proper to convict the father of manslaughter, and punish him for trying on his own flesh and blood an experiment which, if successful, would certainly possess a high medical interest? If we say that the father should be excused in consideration of his good intentions, whilst everybody would admit that a father who did precisely the same thing out of avarice or malice should be severely punished, we introduce a fatal element of uncertainty. Anybody would be enabled to indulge in any atrocity towards his children by inventing a theory for the occasion. The tutor who beat his pupil to death out of pure desire for his spiritual welfare would escape scot free; and it would soon be discovered that every ruffian who kicked his wife into a jelly was merely adopting some new method of sanitary treatment.

The simple truth is that in such cases as these it is impossible to lay down any infallible rule. We are compelled, however reluctantly, to choose between making a few martyrs and allowing a great many innocent people to be made victims. It is unpleasant to punish a man for conduct towards his own children which, as we see no reason to doubt, is dictated by a genuine religious conviction and by real affection, though undoubtedly perverted by some stupidity. But then it is impossible to leave such a man unpunished and to punish others who act in the same way out of sheer brutality. Having no mode of testing the state of mind which leads to an overt action, we must sometimes confound the fanatic with the ruffian; and it is perhaps possible that we may sometimes confound them both with men who are really in advance of their age. Some comfort indeed may be derived from two or three reflections. In the first place, these delicate questions very rarely occur in practice; secondly, there can be no reasonable doubt that the immense majority of the sufferers are simply a set of stupid bigots—which, it is true, is no excuse for treating them unjustly, but is still some comfort so far as the practical effect of the interference is concerned; and, thirdly, persecution is in our days of that moderate type which is more likely to give fresh energy to any genuine spark of belief than to extinguish it. We cannot suppose that the Peculiar People are destined to be the regenerators of the universe; indeed we have a strong suspicion that they are a very poor and humble little sect, and likely to disappear altogether at a moment's notice. So far, however, as they have any faith in their tenets, it is not likely to be quenched by the persecutions of the Central Criminal Court. And if only for this reason we may perhaps venture to express a hope that they will not have very severe sufferings to undergo. After all, what is the worst that is likely to happen if the theory upon which the Peculiar People act turns out to be as groundless as we venture to suppose? There would be a practical experiment as to the value of medical attendance which would be not altogether without its interest; and if that value turned out to be great, the Peculiar People would tend to die out. The human mind, moreover, is so strongly tempted to apply for assistance, even to the lowest variety of quack, that the medical profession need be in little fear of ultimately becoming obsolete. When the Peculiar People have been punished by a few epidemics, we suspect that their faith will grow weak, and that heresies will spring up. Probably some innovator will discover that, though paying over sick people is essential, religion no more forbids medicine than food. We shall be disposed to rely more for conversion on the profound longing of the British rustic in distress for some kind of doctor's staff than on any punishment from without. When the question is raised it is impossible to refuse interference on behalf of the luckless infants who are born in this enthusiastic sect. But the difficulty of forcing people to take medicine when they don't want it is proverbially great; and therefore we should venture to hope that the law will be administered with due consideration. It is as well that they should know that there is some limit to the tricks which may be played with helpless children; but, after all, the crotchet which they have got into their heads is singularly harmless compared with many which claim to be regarded as sacred.

TRIALS.

THERE are perhaps few words in common use that have such a variety of different, though not divergent, senses as the word "trial." Schoolboys often speak of "the trials," meaning the half-yearly or scholarship examinations, while the cognate verb is probably most familiar to their sisters as applied to trying on a new dress. Any contest of rival forces, from a game of cricket or croquet to the more serious struggles of later life, may be called, according to its demand on the intellectual or physical resources of the combatants, a trial of skill or of strength. The mediæval ordeal was an appeal to the judgment of God in the trial by fire, as the legal procedure which has superseded it is called a trial now. An institution which has been newly started, or is threatened with attack or decay, is said to be on its trial—a remark applied some years ago by the late Prince Consort to constitutional government. Then, again, a tried man is a man who has had something of the experience of life, whether generally or in some particular line, and has profited by it; while in such phrases as the trials of life, or a great trial, we usually understand the word in a sense almost synonymous with afflictions. The latter sense seems to predominate, though without excluding the idea of probation also, in the use made of the word by the English translators of the New Testament; or at least it is the sense which would most naturally suggest itself to an English reader unacquainted with the original, where the different Greek words rendered by "trial" point to the etymological rather than the derivative sense. And it is in this strict sense of testing or proving, "as silver is tried in the furnace," that the verb, both active and passive, is ordinarily used in both the Old and New Testament. In modern parlance the active voice conveys the notion of enterprise, and the passive of suffering. A man tries to do his best, and he is tried by a severe illness or the death of a friend; while, again, a very trying occasion suggests the double idea of suffering and undergoing a test. It is obvious at once that all these various uses of the word, however widely some of them may appear to differ, have a common origin and scope. They are all reducible to two, not at first sight necessarily connected, but which the immemorial use of language proves to have a very close interdependence on each other in the common experience of mankind, and thus in fact are ultimately resolved into the one strict and original sense of the word. A trial simply means, as its equivalents in other languages mean, a testing or proving; and it is because tests are so various in their kinds and their consequences that it has come to embrace such a variety of distinct applications. But it may be interesting to examine the connexion of thought a little more closely.

The original sense, then, of the word trial is that of probation, or applying a test. It is in this way that a competitive examination comes to be called a trial; or any contest, from a game of cricket to a war between two great nations, a trial of strength. And thus individuals or governments or institutions are put on their trial when we are taking stock of them, so to speak, to see what is in them and what they are worth. A trial in a law court is a testing or sifting at once of the prisoner who is being tried and of the evidence alleged against him, as the old method of decision by single combat or burning ploughshares was supposed to test his innocence by the infallible criterion of a divine judgment expressed in his endurance or failure under the ordeal. All this is clear enough as soon as it is stated. But it may not seem equally obvious to everybody that when we say, for instance, that the loss of a passenger ship at sea is a most heavy trial to the near relatives of those on board, we are using the word in the same, or at least in a strictly cognate, sense. We referred just now to the language of the English version of the New Testament; and this may help to illustrate the perplexity and its solution. It is said in a well-known passage that God will not suffer men to be tempted above what they are able to bear, and this is usually explained to mean that they will always be enabled by divine assistance to conquer any temptations to sin, however powerful, although the temptation will be a real probation of their fidelity. But suppose, instead of "tempted," our translators had rendered "tried"; scholars and theologians might have given the same explanation, but the general public would certainly have understood that they were not to have more suffering inflicted on them than they could reasonably be expected to endure. Yet the very same Greek words which are here translated by "tempted" and "temptation" are elsewhere translated "trial" and "tried," the difference of rendering being evidently suggested by the context. A temptation, in the religious sense of the word, may in fact just as accurately be called a trial as the loss of a husband or a son, and for the same reason—it applies a touchstone to the character, and serves to discriminate and exhibit its moral strength. It is perfectly true that in many, perhaps most, cases the original sense of the word is almost or altogether lost sight of, and that in talking of a severe domestic trial we are thinking simply of a great affliction. But how came the word to acquire this connotation? Surely because all trying, or proving, or "tempting"—to revert to the Scriptural term—involves something painful, and, on the other hand, all suffering has also the nature of a trial. It is so common an observation as almost to have passed into a proverb, that the trials of life leave men very different from what they were before, which is another way of saying that their characters are influenced, whether for better or worse, by the sufferings they have undergone. Here, however, one or two questions naturally present themselves. It may be objected that every event or action of life, pleasurable or painful, leaves its mark on the character, as well as what are called its "trials"; and, again, it may be asked whether by speaking of suffering as trying men's character, we mean that it moulds, or only that it reveals their true nature, and whether we mean to imply that its influence, if it has any, is beneficial.

As to the first point, it is of course a truism to say that character is tested and acted upon by every action and circumstance of daily life, great or small. We are "the creatures of habit," because habits are formed by acts, and when formed react on our conduct and ways of thinking. In this sense a man is always on his trial, and is never in precisely the same moral condition when he goes to bed that he was in when he got up in the morning. Every day has its trials, whether they are trials in the popular sense of the word or not. But it is not therefore unreasonable to connect the term especially with those great crises of life which bring out what is in a man more rapidly and more completely than months or years of an ordinary routine existence. Marie-Antoinette's hair turned white in one night through excess of suffering, and the bodily change is but an outward sign of the inward action on the mind. A sudden access of prosperity may act as quickly and as strongly on the mind as a great sorrow. But the hero of Ten Thousand a Year is not often to be met with in real life, and as great afflictions are far more common than great successes or wonderful luck, we have naturally come to associate the former rather than the latter with the idea of searching tests of character. It is a fact, broadly speaking, that the great sorrows of life are also the great trials of life, and hence both ideas have come to be expressed by a common term. The second question has already been in some degree answered by implication. Strictly speaking, of course, to try is to test, and not to mould, character. It is a process analogous to "proving" cannon. But then there is just this difference between things and persons—that moral agents cannot be tested without their character being at the same time influenced, and very decisively influenced, by the process. Even a school examination, to go back to our old example, does not simply ascertain a boy's mental calibre, but very materially affects it, if he takes any pains about the matter at all. And much more is this true of the trials of his after life. It is often said that some men "come out" under great trials, and show a depth and power we had never before credited them with; and no doubt in such cases there must have been good stuff in them, as the phrase goes, or they would not have borne the test when it came; but still the result is something more than a revelation. The trial was needed to bring out, as well as to exhibit, their latent energy, at least as much as the action of fire is needed to bring to the surface the letters written in sympathetic ink. There is a natural inertness about the great majority of men, which requires the application of some powerful external stimulant not only to exhibit but to develop and bring into play the capabilities that are in them, and trials are the touchstone and stimulants of character, as necessity is the mother of invention.

The third question does not admit of so simple a solution. All trial involves discrimination, and to discriminate is to separate the base coin from the good. If there are men whose merits shine out under adversity with a lustre we had never suspected, there are others whose demerits are for the first time brought to light when they are tried without being purified. A sudden and severe demand develops as well as exhibits latent forces, but it cannot create what had no previous existence. It is a principle of Christianity that suffering is a means of sanctification, but then everything depends on the nature and attitude of the mind to which the test is applied. A soldier's life is a hard one, but the army is not usually considered a school of saints. Perhaps we cannot be far wrong in saying that, as a rule, trials make good men better, and bad men worse. Persons who have no depth of character, who, as Dr. Johnson used to express it, have no bottom, succumb; the tinsel is rubbed off, and their innate shallowness and worthlessness becomes manifest both to themselves and others, and gets more hopelessly ingrained into them by the very fact of its manifestation. But then, on the other hand, experience goes to prove that lofty moral altitudes are seldom, if ever, reached without trial. It is a common remark that children are never considerate, and are therefore deficient in the kindness which, unlike mere good nature, implies consideration for the feelings of others; and certainly the exceptions are comparatively rare. But the same may be said of grown-up people who have led an easy, unshattered sort of existence, and have had little experience of the ups and downs and sufferings of life. It is only those who are not unacquainted with trial themselves who can truly say, misericordiam accipere debetis. And that is precisely because endurance of trials, if they are patiently and bravely endured, not only braces the moral nerves, so to speak, but adds a depth and tenderness to the whole character. Coarse natures, unless they are hardened by suffering, are sure to be softened by it, and refined natures gain in strength and power of active sympathy without losing anything of their refinement. There are some trials which directly tend to embitter a man's feelings against his fellows, and so to produce a hard and cynical temper; but even these will be turned to account for an opposite purpose by the nobler natures, though the effort is at first a hard one. The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius supply an illustration of this, as it would be called under different circumstances, Christian use of suffering, though there is in his case a dash of Stoic hardness about it. But this is a point in which it may fairly be said that Christian society has made a distinct advance both on the moral standard and the actual practice of former ages. There is a "tender grace" about the private virtues as well as the art, the literature, and the poetry of the modern world, which is all but wholly wanting in classical antiquity. And the added dignity and appreciation of suffering, which is indicated by the very use of the word "trial" most familiar to our ears, is one chief reason of the difference. Under the old Pagan civilizations, pain, in all its forms of bodily or mental suffering, was an object either of contempt or dread. It offended the fastidious delicacy of Hellenic taste, and could only appear despicable to those who expressed strength and virtue by a common term. But in proportion as the providential office of trials is recognised as no more penalty to be endured as best it may be, but as at once a test to discriminate the genuine ore from the dross, and a discipline to evoke and perfect nobleness of character, will be their beneficial effect. If to be a tried man is to be a man who may be trusted and looked up to, then to have borne trials, and borne them well, is not only to have established a fresh claim on general sympathy and respect, but to have acquired an additional power of goodness and a larger heart.

THE MEANNESSES OF RESPECTABILITY.

FOREIGNERS are usually much impressed by the announcements which appear in large type at the end of the leading articles in the Times, stating that A. B. or C. D. has sent a remittance to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in payment of arrears of Income-tax. As far as we are aware, there is no other country in which anything of the kind has ever been known to happen. It is the practice in the United States to publish the list of assessments, and occasionally rivals in trade or deacons in the same chapel denounce each other for defrauding the public by an under-estimate of income; but it does not appear that Americans are in the habit of denouncing themselves, even under initials or a nom de plume, and remitting the balance due to the Treasury. In most countries the Government is regarded as a body which is quite capable of taking care of itself, and if in a trial of wits and smartness the Government should get the worst of it, the clever person who has cheated it is thought to have fairly earned the advantage. We are afraid that the delicacy of conscience which is shown by some of our fellow-citizens does not always win unqualified respect from foreigners. It is regarded as absurdly Quixotic, and indeed rather invidious to the Government, which is thus made to look like a stupid sportsman who is always missing his aim, so that at last the hares and pheasants take pity on him, and offer themselves as a voluntary tribute to his bag. Assuming that the relations between the Government and the taxpayers are similar to those between a sportsman and his game, there is perhaps something to be said for this view of the matter. On the other hand, it may be observed that there is a curious perplexity among ourselves as to how the question should be regarded. Sometimes the anonymous people who send Income-tax to the Chancellor of the Exchequer are laughed at as fools, while at other times they are extolled as a proof of the fine morality and sensitive conscience of the nation. As a rule perhaps laughter predominates. It has probably not escaped observation that the sums thus remitted are comparatively small, although there is reason to suppose that considerable amounts are withheld from the Treasury by means of fraudulent returns or other means of evasion. Not long ago a comparison of the returns of Income-tax in a particular district with the amount of compensation demanded for certain demolitions in the same quarter, and supposed to be also based upon calculations of income, disclosed some startling discrepancies. It is apparently not an unfair inference that when the people who have begun by cheating the Chancellor of the Exchequer take it into their heads to make their peace with conscience, they try to do so on the easiest terms; if it is a very costly operation they let it alone, but a modest outlay on this account is regarded as not a bad investment. On the whole, we are disposed to think that these remittances are, as far as they go, a healthy sign. Even a sluggish conscience is better than none at all, and although the restitutions may not amount to a large sum at the end of each year, they are continually being made, and would seem to indicate a sound appreciation of the relations between the Government and the people. There can be no doubt that a great many persons contrive to evade the full payment of their taxes; but it is at least satisfactory to observe from these sporadic symptoms that there is a certain degree of sensitiveness as to the obligations of citizenship.

Some of these days we shall perhaps find people sending remittances to the secretaries of the Railway Companies, just as they now do to the Treasury. Scarcely a week passes without somebody—usually a respectable middle-class man, solicitor, clerk, or trader, or something of that kind—being pulled up at the police-court for swindling a Railway Company by riding in a first-class carriage with a second or third-class ticket, by pretending to have a season ticket when he has none, and so on. Every now and then the Companies begin to look after the matter very sharply, and it is then discovered that a large body of people, not poor rogues and sharpers, but highly respectable well-to-do folk, are in the habit of systematically and constantly evading the payment of the proper fares. Anybody who travels much by any of the metropolitan lines must have had many opportunities of witnessing examples of this loose morality. These people would be shocked and horrified at the idea of stealing anything from a shop, and are no doubt most edifying in the severe morality with which they condemn the offence of a cook who has helped her sweetheart out of the pantry, or of a shopboy who has made free with the till. Yet there is of course just as much dishonesty in riding first-class with a third-class ticket as in appropriating anything else which does not belong to one. The attempt to ride on a railway without paying any fare at all is a more naked and unequivocal kind of theft; yet it appears from some recent cases that there are people, who certainly cannot plead poverty or necessity in extenuation of their offence, who not only stoop to this roguery for the sake of the most paltry sums, but who even resort to elaborate shifts and stratagems to accomplish their purpose. Stolen fruit is proverbially the sweetest, and we are bound to suppose that there is something peculiarly exquisite and luxurious in cheating a Railway Company out of a ride. The unpopularity of the Companies has perhaps something to do with it. It may be argued that, as they take so much out of the public, the public is entitled to take its revenge when it has a chance, without much regard to the morality of the transaction. This was the sort of excuse which used to be made for smuggling in former days. Apart altogether from its cheapness, whisky which had been distilled over a peat fire in a cleft of the rocks was supposed to have a better flavour than any which had been lawfully manufactured under the eyes of the Excise. Even now, when smuggling and illicit distillation have been practically put down by the reduction of duties, there are people who like to fancy that they are tipping contraband spirits, and who would be sadly disappointed to find that their liquor had had a perfectly innocent and lawful origin. No doubt railway managers behave very badly in many ways; but respectable people who do not like hard words should remember that robbery is robbery, whether practised on Railway Companies or on anybody else. There is evidently a strong affinity to kleptomania in this habit of cheating the Companies out of their fares. If we could analyse the state of mind of the offenders, we should probably discover that they were prompted by an odd combination of motives, such as a vague notion that the Railways represent a kind of Ishmael who deserves no pity, a morbid passion for small economies, an idea that the smallness of the sum takes the fraud out of the category of serious offences, and a chuckling sense of superior cleverness in evading payment. There can be no doubt that this is a species of dishonesty which the Companies are bound, not only in their own interest, but in the interest of the public, to expose and bring to punishment. One or two severe examples will perhaps have a good effect, and the appearance of respectable offenders of this class before a police magistrate in the place usually occupied by pickpockets and housebreakers will help to attach a social stigma to an act which is at present apt to be regarded too much as a mere freak or foolish eccentricity.

Everybody, it has been remarked, has a pet virtue or a pet vice, and it may almost more truly be said that everybody has a pet meanness. The meannesses of respectability are of all kinds and degrees. They vary of course with different people. Some can never settle with a cabman without a desperate struggle over the odd sixpence, and a rankling sense of injury and ruin if the obdurate Jehu happens to get the better of them; others are dismayed if they are unexpectedly caught at church when the offertory bags are sent round. With others, again, the weak point is perhaps stationery, or some other cheap article for household use; they can never bring themselves to make a bold investment of a few shillings' worth at a time, but go on from hand to mouth with petty purchases which may have an economical appearance in detail, although they are pretty sure to prove more extravagant in the long run than a larger order. There are even rumours that a raid upon club paper is not absolutely unknown. We wonder how many people ever think of buying a few new pens. There seems to be a superstitious notion among a large class that pens never wear out; they must be handed down in families almost as if they were articles of great cost and rarity. Blotting-paper, too, is apt to be cherished as an object of extravagant luxury, over which persons of moderate means are bound to be very careful. People who think nothing of going to considerable expense for a dinner or a trip to the country will go on for months painfully economising with a few wretched blackened leaves rather than spend sixpence on a fresh supply. The old system of franking letters produced a characteristic development of meanness. The shifts and contrivances to which people used to resort to procure a frank; the labour, and sometimes even, as it would appear, the expense, to which they put themselves to get at some one who had it in his power to confer the coveted favour; the intrigues, entreaties, supplications to which they stooped, are almost incredible. It is only fair, of course, to remember that the rates of postage were enormously high as compared with the rates of the present day, and also that eighteen-pence or a couple of shillings was then a relatively larger sum than now. Yet, after making every allowance on this account, it is amazing that persons who were not in pinched circumstances should have thought it worth while to hunt after a frank, valued at perhaps two shillings or thereabouts, with such keeness and unblushing mendacity. It was a fashionable meanness, and everybody practised it. It is amusing to note in the letters and diaries of the last generation how the getting of a frank, or a fruitless pursuit of one, was deemed quite important enough to be recorded, and how frequently the incident turns up. The parallel to this morbid passion in our own day is perhaps the mania for orders for the play. M. Taine has remarked with some astonishment in his recent letters that amusements of this kind form a small item in the expenses of an English middle-class family, and that it is thought a necessary economy to go to the theatre only when free passes can be procured. Managers, actors, dramatic critics, newspaper editors, whose pockets are supposed to be stuffed with orders, are importuned recklessly and shamelessly, in order that well-to-do people may be provided gratuitously with what they could themselves purchase for a few shillings whenever they chose. During a discussion of the subject a year or two since, it was stated that managers and actors frequently receive letters from persons who are entire strangers to them, expressing a desire to witness their performances, and begging for orders. Perhaps the lowest depth of meanness to which respectability descends is in seeking medical attendance at the hospitals, thus abusing the charity of these institutions and defrauding the poor, whose places they occupy. At a recent Poor Law Conference it was asserted that cases were known in which respectable householders had disguised themselves as servants in order to procure gratuitous advice and medicine; and, even without disguise, people in comfortable circumstances not unfrequently avail themselves of the hospitals rather than call in a doctor to attend them. This, however, is not merely a meanness, but an act of dishonesty, and it is a pity there is no means of punishing it as it deserves. Reasonable economy is always respectable in small things as in great; but the meannesses of which we have been speaking are at the best but bastard economies, and serve not unfrequently as an excuse for extravagance in other ways. Wasteful people often have fits of petty parsimony, and will squander a pound with great equanimity on the strength of the supposed virtue and self-denial which has been exercised in some shabby trick for saving sixpence.

PEEPS AT SPIRITS.

THERE can be no doubt that Spiritualism, or Spiritism, for we decline entering on a question about which "eminent lexicographers," as the Medium News tells us, are at variance, is really marching on. It is rapidly freeing itself from the baser elements of table-turning, rapping, "tipping," and planchette writing, and attaining a far more direct faculty of converse with the ghostly world. It is true that some of the lowlier incidents of its early origin still cling to it; that, with a few exceptions, its séances, so far as London is concerned, seem to be held in queer quarters—in London Fields, Clerkenwell, or Bethnal Green—and that its mediums still rejoice in the oddest of all possible names. Since the heroes of Mr. Dickens's later fictions, we have met with no odder group of designations than those enjoyed by Messrs. Guppy, Mummier, Shorter, Cogman, and Simkins. But it must be owned that greater names are dropping in. "The People's Post" and "the Discoverer of Thallium," titles which certainly throw a halo of grandeur round the rather commonplace personages of Mr. Crookes and Mr. Gerald Massey, are at the head of the movement. It has been formally announced by the spirits themselves that all criticism on their doings and sayings is simply the result of "weak blood and a strumous temperament." The movement is widening its borders beyond Clerkenwell and Bethnal Green; there is "a respectable church" of Spiritualists at Melbourne, in which we are glad to remark the new peculiarity of "a marked predominance of intellectual physiognomy," and there is a circle at Cairo where "Madame Blawatsky" is willing for a consideration to reproduce the plague of frogs or any similar incident of Pharaonic life at a moment's notice. Spiritualism has at last a worship, which is described as consisting of "invocations, the singing of suitable hymns, and the delivery of addresses without any ceremony or ritual." To conduct worship without ceremony or ritual of any sort is an achievement which even Quakers despair of, and of which Spiritualism may be justly proud; though we are bound to say that the accounts of such services as we have seen have the familiar twang of the conventicle, and little besides to recommend them. The address of the "Medium in a Trance," which closes the proceedings, reads wonderfully like the ordinary discourse of our friend Mr. Stiggins out of it. But this is of little consequence when, as the Spiritualist organ triumphantly observes, "Science is on our side, and the spirit of the age is with us." It is of still less importance when the spirits themselves, after a good deal of ghostly coquetry, have been at last wheedled into coming fairly to the front, when these ghostly visitants are no more like Wordsworth's cuckoo, "a wandering voice," but are good enough to take material form, and to allow themselves to be seen of mortal eyes and photographed in common cartes-de-visite.

The first photographic manifestation took place, of course, in America, but the Yankee seer experienced the usual prophetic fate, and the discovery had to be made over again in less sceptical climes. It is only fair to Mr. Samuel Guppy that he should tell his own story. He had accompanied his wife with conjugal solicitude to a photographic studio, and "after the sitting was finished I asked her to try an experiment to see if I could get a spirit photograph. I arranged the drapery, sitting myself in front of a screen of black cloth, my wife being behind it. While so sitting, waiting for Mr. Hudson to bring the prepared plate, a wreath of artificial flowers was placed on my head. Mr. Hudson brought the plate, took and developed the picture, which showed a draped figure in white standing behind me." We see the result in a copy of the carte-de-visite which is now before us. The world knows nothing of its greatest men, and we were a little startled at first sight of the venerable person with whom spirits take such affectionate liberties. If we may trust the photograph, Mr. Guppy is a rather short and podgy person, with an extremely ill-fitting coat, and leaning back in a chair with that air of attempted serenity which is common in photographic studios. His head appears to be bald, and is certainly covered by a wreath of flowers, which, as big cabbage roses of this sort hardly bloom in the month of March, we may presume to be artificial. Behind Mr. Guppy is a white erection, which might be a spirit, and which might be a pump, but which to mortal eyes would rather suggest a couple of broomsticks draped in a white sheet. Altogether, let us frankly own, this first spiritual photograph is a little destructive of reverence. The mind instinctively quits the veiled broomsticks to fasten itself on Mr. Guppy, and that comfortable face, the face of a cozy tallow-chandler, when crowned with paper roses becomes absolutely irresistible. We should tremble for the domestic happiness of Mrs. Guppy if Mrs. Guppy had not claimed her share in these spiritual interviews. "I will go with Tommy," said Mrs. Guppy in words which throw a certain subdued light on the inner life of the Guppy circle, "I will go with Tommy to get a spirit photograph, but I must have my own way entirely. I am always interfered with, and told to do this or that, but this time I will have my own way!" The result of this spirited conduct shall be told in her husband's words:—"We went at three o'clock to Mr. Hudson's. A snow-storm came on. However, she placed herself kneeling with the child in front. She desired me to look at her through the cloth screen all the while. . . . Though I say it as shouldn't say it, I think it is the most beautiful photograph I have ever seen, and worthy of copying by a first-rate painter." We may fairly pardon this little outburst of Mr. Guppy's artistic enthusiasm, as we have pardoned his little irrelevance about the snow and the exquisite "however" which follows it, but to ordinary eyes the photograph is a very inferior photograph indeed. Our natural curiosity about the spirited wife who "will have her own way" is disappointed by so terribly blurred a face that not a feature can be made out. Such as she is, however, Mrs. Guppy kneels in the foreground, holding "Tommy," whose hair does not appear to have seen a brush for some months, in her arms, while a very unmistakable spirit towers high behind them. Unluckily the countenance of "the spirit Katey"—for Mr. Guppy is good enough to supply us with her name—is less distinct than Mrs. Guppy's own. She is got up in the usual stage ghost fashion—indeed, we think it reflects credit on our dramatic managers that they should for so many years have known how a ghost would be clothed when it was actually good enough to appear on earth. A fillet is tied over the brow, and a loose white drapery is thrown loosely and vaguely over the rest of the figure, leaving a little hole for the face and two smaller apertures for a couple of ghostly hands. It is a little trying to faith to remark how easily the whole thing could be imitated with a common white pocket-handkerchief and an ordinary sheet. We have not had the privilege of seeing any spiritual representations in which the ghostly sitter appeared in a more distinctive garb, though we are led to hope that such may soon be vouchsafed. Mr. John Jones has indeed succeeded in inducing spirits to appear in a more earthly guise. In the photograph of his daughters "one of the spirits has on a dark shawl, is stooping, and reading a book; the other standing and thinking." Of course, when one can photograph a spirit, it is easy to photograph thought into the bargain. But the greatest success was achieved in a second attempt, where "a spirit seems to have come in with bonnet and lace fall on, as if a visitor, to see the group of three taken by the camera." It may have been a little jealousy of the "lace fall" which induced "the spirit Katey" to dispense, after Mr. Guppy's interviews, with photographs altogether. Mr. Smith gives us an account before which that of Mr. Jones fades into insignificance. At the séance which he describes, "Katey came over to the side where Mr. Harrison and myself were sitting, and showed two brilliant lights, one in each hand, the fingers of which could be seen as though grasping the light. She said to Mr. H., 'Now, Willie, can you see me?' and as she spoke she turned the light upon her countenance, which could be seen distinctly, the taper moving as she spoke. He then illuminated part of her dress, which she said was such as she wore in India, referring to me at the time for confirmation. 'Now can you understand?' 'This is the way we show ourselves in the photographs.' Mr. H. requested and was permitted to touch the figure which we saw. Katey only disappeared to make way for a dear friend, every feature of whose face was distinctly to be recognized. 'Yes, Willie,' said the spirit—Mr. Smith's name, we may remark, is

"Clifford," but spirits have their little familiarities—"you recognize me; you recognize me!"

After manifestations of this kind, we must own that the more ordinary spiritual demonstrations pall a little on our taste. We don't think we can be rallied into vivid interest, even when the spirits ram our strong-minded friend Mrs. Guppy headlong through the stout brick wall of her bed-room, and leave her in a light and airy dé-habillé to be picked up by the policeman or other kind friends on the pavement. A flower-pot, it is pathetically added, accompanied her in her flight and stood uninjured beside her. We doubt whether our curiosity will be greatly raised even should Miss Lottie Fowler be transported a second time out of an omnibus without notice (or, we fear, payment) to the conductor, and brought into a séance through the keyhole, although it may be interesting to know that "the conductor has been sought for, but not as yet discovered." Mr. "Punch" will, no doubt, learn with interest that "the liqueur-bottle with silver top and stopper," which mysteriously disappeared at a séance which he was good enough to comment upon, has returned in answer to his remonstrances. It fell suddenly from the ceiling in the presence of the two mediums who assisted at its disappearance, and to whose honesty the "silver top and stopper" bear convincing witness, though by an accident nothing is said about the liqueur. After all liqueur-bottles are only liqueur-bottles and spirits are spirits. The appearance of "Katey" in her Indian shawl, and of Mr. Jones's anonymous friend in her "lace fall," puts all other wonders out of court. We cannot help, however, feeling a certain anxiety as to the ultimate issue of these spiritual appearances. When the spirit of "John King" flings sofa-cushions about the room and puts his medium, Mr. Williams, through the roof as a punishment of disobedience, we see that we have some spiritual rough customers to deal with. And our comfort is by no means increased when we are introduced to Mr. "Jack Todd," a Liverpool spirit who amuses himself with tearing a table to pieces and flinging the legs of it at the heads of his visitors. As he turns out to be the spirit of a highwayman, we are hardly consoled by the assurance that "he will no doubt improve in time." But if Mr. King is to appear in person for the purpose of hurling us through the roof, and Mr. Todd in visible shape is to reappear with his highwayman's pistols, it is clear we shall be driven to ask for the institution of a Spiritual police. There is no need, however, to anticipate dangers, and meanwhile these visible apparitions afford a timely check to the merely "sensational" critics who, out of sheer "weak blood and strumous temperament," are for ever insisting on the test of utility. As to utility, we have Mr. Sharp's confession that "the Sharp rifle was wholly invented for him by the spirits, and that he merely obeyed their injunctions." Detectives, too, would become at once unnecessary if our present criminal code were only reformed. "Tracing murders and other criminal occurrences is quite practicable, and will be common to mediums whenever society is enlightened enough to make a proper use of the information thus obtained. All clairvoyants and mediums, with hardly an exception, decline to give information in such cases because of the very unpleasant moral relations that it subjects them to." The spirit world will have nothing to do with our present system of criminal punishment, or it would not be honoured with the patronage of Mr. Jack Todd. But, setting aside all merely practical results, we may clearly expect some remarkable changes in the spirit-conduct should spirits be good enough to come face to face with us. The sentimental tone which unhappily pervades all the communications we have ever seen from the spirit world will no doubt pass into a tone more common among persons of average intelligence. "Ellen," for instance, when consulted about the health of a living friend, will hardly reply in a rhapsody of this sort:—"Ellen sees her friend's wasting form is nearly extinct. She may reach the first cheerful warbling of the birds, which invite her to the bright shores of that ever-blissful land of happy angels, who are standing to aid her to ascend those beautiful regions of ever-reigning harmony, where the angels of bliss are singing their welcome chants of melody ringing through the groves of the most luxuriant plants and trees, whose fragrance perfumes the air. As you glide through, scarcely touching the soil, you feel to soar the air like the things of winged creation; but pride does not exist among the dear angel spirits." If "Ellen" would only allow "Cliff" to recognize her, or "H." to touch her, she might allow some less intimate friend to suggest that a "form" can be hardly "extinct," and that "ascending a region" is almost as difficult as "soaring the air." It is, perhaps, hardly safe to entertain the more ambitious hope that an Ecumenical Council of visible spirits might settle some of the difficulties which seem to exist in the Spiritualist Church itself. There is a schism on the subject of vaccination; there is another schism on the subject of Christianity. Mr. Jones still seems to cling to the Christian tradition, while the freer Spiritualists call up the spirit of Tom Paine, and declare "there are vast asylums in the spirit world where the victims of dogma are placed until they are able to perceive truth independently." There is a schism as to "psychic force," where the followers of Mr. Hume find no words too emphatic for Mr. Serjeant Cox. Unhappily the spirits seem as divided as their followers. Those who look for theologic peace in the after world have still to learn that Unitarian and Trinitarian spirits carry on their dogmatic controversies as busily as if they were on earth, though, as it seems to the "strumous" critic, with even less intelligence of the subject discussed. But if we cannot get a council, we can at least get a photograph, and spirits that can do so union in theology can find a common ground of enjoyment in crowning Mr. Guppy with artificial roses, and in gladdening the heart of Mr. Jones with a "lace fall."

METROPOLITAN SCHOOLS.

THE "Report of the School Board for London to the Education Department," which has recently been issued, enables us to supplement the information we gave in a former article on metropolitan schools (November 4, 1871), in which we speculated upon the probable consequences which would result from the inquiries conducted during the course of last year, and suggested some of the difficulties likely to occur. The Report before us consists of fourteen pages, and is followed by three appendices, containing the census of children, the tabulation of the reports sent by the inspectors of schools and of returns, and the deficiency of school accommodation. It begins by describing the labours of the Board since its first meeting in December 1870. On the 20th of April, 1871, the Board received instructions to report upon the following points:—

1. The number of children within its limits for whom means of elementary education should be provided between the ages of three and five, and between the ages of five and thirteen.
2. The provision to meet the requirements of these children already made by efficient schools, or likely to be made by schools either contemplated or in course of erection.
3. The deficiency (if any) in the supply of efficient elementary education, as shown by comparing 1 and 2.
4. What schools are required to meet this deficiency.
5. The localities in which such schools should be provided.

Of these five points the first alone can be said to be accurately ascertained. The Board, with the help of the Census Office and their own staff of enumerators, after eliminating children who attended or should attend a school not elementary and children in institutions, arrived at the conclusion that the gross number of children between the ages of three and thirteen who were attending elementary schools was 398,679. The number of those who required elementary schools, but did not attend, was 176,014. After deducting the reasonable and necessary causes of absence, it was computed that 80,039 had no excuse for non-attendance, and consequently that the whole number of children for whom elementary schools should be provided was 478,718. With regard to the second point, our readers are aware that the Education Department conducted this branch of the investigation ("the Board having no staff immediately available for the purpose"), made inquiries into the efficiency of the public, private, and adventure schools existing or projected in the metropolis, and concluded its labours at the close of last year; 3,275 existing or projected elementary schools had to be taken into account, affording accommodation for 413,233 scholars. Had, therefore, all these schools proved efficient, additional provision would only have been required for some 40,000 scholars. This, however, was far from being the case, and out of these 3,275 schools, 1,876 were condemned, consisting of 74 public, 122 private, and 1,680 adventure schools. With regard to these latter schools, the Report says:—

Under the circumstances of the case, the Board submitted to the Department that it would not be advisable to interpret too literally the requirements of the Department as laid down in the new Code. Some latitude must be allowed, so that if a school could pass in a certain standard in the first instance, time might be given for the attainment of a higher standard. As the Inspectors completed their examination of different districts, their conclusions were communicated to the Board. Some schools were passed both for buildings and instruction, and these are consequently classed with the efficient schools. Others were condemned in both respects, and have, therefore, not been taken into account as providing suitable accommodation. But an intermediate class of schools has been reported to be efficient either in buildings or instruction, but not in both; and with reference to these, the Board have obtained the consent of the Department that a period of grace should be accorded to them. To the managers of all schools in this category a circular has been addressed inviting them within three months to bring their schools up to the necessary standard of efficiency, and undertaking that meantime the accommodation they provide shall provisionally be taken into account.

The consequence of this period of grace, which appears to us a needless complication, is that at the present moment there are two classes of schools recognized; first, the schools reported to be efficient in both building and instruction, amounting in number to 1,149; and, secondly, those efficient in either building or instruction, of which the number is 250. These latter provide accommodation for 37,995 children, and are composed of sixty public, ninety-six private, eighty-one adventure, and thirteen projected schools. Of the adventure schools, thirty-two are reported as efficient in building and forty-nine in instruction only. We have pointed out before the extreme improbability of any change being effected in the constitution of these schools, and therefore these eighty-one may be regarded as condemned. The inquiries made last year were conducted on the assumption that where the buildings were unfit for educational purposes it was useless to enter into the question of instruction; had it been otherwise, a considerable fraction of the 1,680 condemned adventure schools might have been reported as efficient in instruction only. The character of the instruction was virtually a second test, to be applied in those cases where the condition of the premises was satisfactory. It is quite evident, however, in looking over the tabulated returns in the second Appendix of the Report, that different standards have been applied in different districts in the examination of these schools. In Lambeth alone 89 adventure schools out of 413 have been recognized—that is to say, more than one-half of the whole number of adventure schools pronounced efficient (162) are in one single district out of the ten of which the metropolis is composed. On the other hand, if we turn to Southwark, we find that only seven out of 276 have been recognized, in the Tower Hamlets two out of 297, while in Marylebone only one out of 81 has been passed as efficient, and no dame's school reported as efficient in instruction only. There is no reason to suppose that a lower standard of education is required for Lambeth, nor is the deficiency of school accommodation as great as in the division of the Tower Hamlets, where nearly one-third of the children requiring accommodation are unprovided for. It is clear from this that, had the instructions issued by the Education Department been understood and acted upon in the same manner by all the inspectors, not more than a score of these schools would have been left in existence, and the provisional recognition of 243 out of 1,923 must be ascribed to a relaxation of these instructions, and an amiability of disposition on the part of the official employed. The inspection of adventure schools appears to have been a kind of compromise between the School Board and the Education Department, offices which naturally looked upon the condemnation of schools in different lights, as upon the former devolved the duty of making good the deficiencies created by the reports of the latter. The object of the Education Department must have been simply to put an end to education as a means of subsistence for the teachers, and the conditions of efficiency they required were precise enough to leave but little scope for the exercise of individual opinion. At the time the Department issued these instructions they must have been aware that they would disqualify all save a fraction, and we may doubt whether it would not have been better to have ignored these schools altogether, and spared 1,923 teachers the shock which their nerves sustained from a visit on the part of the Government. Had this been done, the grievance would have been universal, and no provisionally recognized teacher could have excited envy. It is of course possible that the 1,876 condemned schools may all be remodelled, and that all those which have received invitations to better themselves may respond to them. But we believe that further investigation will only tend to diminish the amount of accommodation provisionally recognized; some of the proposed enlargements will never be carried into effect, many of the projected schools will remain projected, others will be reconstituted as non-elementary schools, and others fail to attain the standard which they may be required to reach during the course of this year. The results of this inquiry will not, however, make themselves felt for a long time. Did we see any likelihood of the dames being immediately affected by their condemnation, we should recommend them to migrate in a body to Lambeth; but they are still unconscious of their doom. We made an expedition to a street rife with "seminaries" to see whether the Report before us was a common text-book. But no one had seen it. Strange to say, no dame had endeavoured to seduce her neighbours' children by an advertisement stating that, though deficient in officers, her instruction was excellent; or that she herself would spell correctly in the course of three months, and bring herself up to the level of her educational furniture. The dame is probably well aware that her life is not worth the number of years which will elapse before the erection of the new metropolitan schools—an interval long enough in all probability to enable an architect to appear to whom their construction might be entrusted with safety. The chief difference between the condemned and the partially recognized school is that the owner of the former will be left in peace, while that of the latter will, we suppose, again receive visits from enumerators or inspectors. The remarks of the School Board do not tend to increase the value of the statistics upon which they purpose to act; the data which have been arrived at are based upon an allowance of eight superficial feet to each child, concerning which the Report says, "It may be doubted whether this amount is sufficient in any case"—a statement the reverse of assuring.

These two classes of provisionally recognized schools are calculated to afford accommodation for 350,920 children, while the accommodation required is for 478,718. The Board, therefore, after deducting a percentage for temporary causes of absence, has arrived at the conclusion that places must be provided for 103,863, and they ask the Department to authorize the immediate provision of schools for 100,000 children. In five out of the ten divisions accommodation in excess of the deficiency to the extent of 9,790 school places is recommended, owing to the unequal distribution of the schools in existence. Marylebone has a deficiency of 3,140 places, and it is proposed to provide accommodation for 7,900 children. The City of London has an excess of 1,418 places, none of which are available to balance a deficiency of 673 places in one of its subdivisions. Of the remaining five divisions of Finsbury, Hackney, Lambeth, Southwark, and the Tower Hamlets, Hackney, which includes the districts of Bethnal Green, Shoreditch, and Homerton, is relatively to its population the most ill-provided with school accommodation, having only 34,851 existing and projected places for 56,906 children, or a deficiency of more than one-third. In these five divisions where the estimated deficiency is 94,121, the Board recommends the immediate provision of school accommodation for 79,650 children:—

The reasons for this modified proposal may be briefly stated as follow—To provide schools even for 100,000 children, will be a task which will not easily be accomplished in eighteen months or two years. During that time the Board will have the opportunity of watching the operation of many causes, the effect of which is at present wholly undetermined. How will the By-laws work? the second, which enforces the attendance of children at school; and the fourth, which exempts them from attendance under certain conditions? Will the Half-time Act, which at present is almost a dead letter, come into more general operation? To what extent will schools which have been condemned by Her Majesty's Inspectors transfer themselves to the Board, and be made efficient? These and other causes may contribute to reduce the deficiency of school accommodation which now appears to exist. Lastly, there is the growing difficulty of obtaining qualified teachers for elementary schools, the number of which is increasing day by day.

The chief point in the above quotation is that the effect of many causes is wholly undetermined, and we may add will probably remain so, until a certain number of mistakes has been made. The Report asks various questions without much expectation of receiving answers, and we shall venture to imitate their example. Will it be easier to find teachers for schools of from 750 to 1,500 children (the number preferred by the Board) than for communities of a smaller extent? How will the payment of school fees be enforced? What is to be the future system of investigation and examination of private schools? The Report before us seems to imply that the inspection of last year was undertaken by the Education Department because the Board had no staff immediately available for the purpose. It is a matter perfectly immaterial to the public who the officials are who inspect metropolitan schools, but it is important that it should be done as simply as possible, and that the expenses of a dual government should be avoided. It may be that all these matters remain to be decided, like the sites and the sizes and the number of schools which it is proposed to erect; the next Report of the School Board will, we trust, enlighten us upon many points "at present undetermined."

A POSITIVIST ORACLE.

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON has been good enough to favour us with a copy of a Report on the "New Social Movement" of last autumn, to which his name is attached, and which appears to have been written by him and presented to a body called the "Positivist Society." No information is given as to the constitution of this Society, nor is it stated whether it invited or adopted the Report, or whether it is prepared in any way to act upon it. Probably we should not be far wrong in assuming that the "Positivist Society" is the congregation of Comtists which meets in Bedford Row to listen to sermons from Mr. Congreve and other "directors" of the order; but it will be safer to take the Report as simply an expression of Mr. Harrison's individual opinions, without making the Society responsible for any of his proposals. As the world, we are assured, is about to be made regenerate through Positivism, it is worth while to observe some of the practical aspects of this regeneration, as expounded by an authoritative interpreter. When we are fortunate enough to meet with any of these philosophical gentlemen on their rare visits to the prosaic level of this work-a-day world, it is as well to ascertain from them precisely what it is they want to do; indeed it is only in this way that common people can test their magnificent speculations. Mr. Harrison begins by remarking that the importance of the New Social Movement consists in the fact that it is a social and not a political movement, "one, that is, which appeals to social feelings, and not to political parties." It seems to us that, so far as this antithesis is not meaningless, it is inaccurate. It is notorious that the Movement was hawked about from one political party to another; and its promoters have since issued a standing advertisement that they are ready to range themselves under the banner of any body of politicians who will help them to carry out their programme. In point of fact, however, the distinction which Mr. Harrison would draw between social feelings and political parties, as if they were separate and even antagonistic forces, does not exist. A political party is simply the organized expression of social feeling, and it is only by political action that social wants and aspirations can take effect. A number of men agree to work together, and to sink minor differences, for the sake of attaining certain objects which they regard as of paramount importance—this is a party; and this was precisely the way in which Mr. Scott Russell and his workmen offered to join first the Liberals, and then the Conservatives, and to allow either party to govern the country as it liked, if it would only help them to country houses, sunny gardens, and unadulterated provisions at a nominal cost, these things being, it appeared, all they cared about. "The true nature of public problems," says Mr. Harrison, with the air of a deep philosopher announcing some great discovery, the result of years of patient and painful meditation, "is essentially social"; but this is obviously only another way of saying that the problems which relate to society are of a social character, and reminds one of a famous answer about archidiaconal functions. He might have added with equal truth that, though social questions may not be political, as when they deal with matters which are left to private and voluntary arrangement, yet all political questions are essentially social, inasmuch as their ultimate object is the good of society. The difference between the sort of measures with which Parliament is constantly engaged and the wild schemes of the so-called Socialist reformers is not that the welfare of society is disregarded in the former, but that they aim at doing indirectly, and in such a manner as to allow of as much personal freedom as possible, what the latter are intended to accomplish directly and by means of the compulsory intervention of the State. Nothing can be more shallow than the notion that only direct and local treatment is required for social difficulties. When Mr. Harrison goes on to say that the evils complained of should be met, not by political remedies, as the artisans propose, but by moral remedies, the distinction is more substantial; but we soon come upon political ground again, for the moral remedies are, it seems, to be enforced by an "organized moral power," and voluntary effort is to be stimulated by compulsion.

Mr. Harrison has of course no difficulty in picking out the weak points of Mr. Scott Russell's foolish and fantastic scheme. He ridicules the chimerical idea of planting out great cities "in the clear"; and he remarks sarcastically that self-government in smaller circles is scarcely a gain in the eyes of those to whom mere self-government itself offers no hope. In a proper state of society the functions of Government would, we presume, be exercising by a select body of Positivist Professors. "The Positivist system," Mr. Harrison explains, "presupposes, as a condition of all healthy social life, the formation of an organized social power entirely independent of the State, and therefore in no sense a State Church, charged with the moral control and elevation of persons, families, and institutions, with the task of all higher education, and with the expression of systematic public opinion." When put into plain language, this would seem to mean an imperium in imperio of a peculiar kind, for the organized moral force would practically become an independent and irresponsible hierarchy, invested with supreme authority. It will be observed that the pretensions of the Positivists very closely resemble those of the Ultramontanists; and, in fact, Positivism might be not unfairly described as Ultramontanism minus Christianity. Positivism, as Comte understood it, was a grand scheme for elevating society in all directions all at once, and it was supposed to be essential that nothing should be done until everything was ready for a simultaneous and universal movement. His disciples are, however, beginning to discover that this is rather too long to wait. As a concession to the weaknesses of humanity, Mr. Harrison is good enough to suggest that, pending the formation of the "organized moral power," and in some degree as a step towards it, Positivism might favour a practical attempt to realize the parts of a Social Programme, "provided it be sufficiently comprehensive, so as never to degenerate into Specialism, and sufficiently inspired with moral aims, so as never to end in a mere political cry." And then he proceeds to offer some suggestions for a practical Social Movement from the Positivist point of view. To begin with, the houses of the working classes both in town and country must be entirely reorganized, so as to satisfy health, the conditions of morality, decency, self-respect, and the convenience of cultivated life. The Positivists, we believe, are not alone in desiring that this result may be brought about; and we have never heard of their being conspicuously active in any practical measures for accomplishing it. Indeed, the sort of people who have done most in this way, who have given their time, money, and close personal attention to it, are the very classes whom Mr. Harrison and his friends are usually engaged in denouncing. The problem is not exactly of the easy kind which can be settled offhand by the fiat of a glib essayist. It is not enough to provide houses that will satisfy the conditions enumerated by Mr. Harrison; the people for whom the houses are intended must also be qualified to appreciate them, and this is a slow and tedious process. Mr. Harrison thinks it will be necessary to rebuild London, so as to economize space by loftier buildings. This little job is to be accomplished partly by private enterprise or munificence, largely and mainly by local municipal effort, partly as a stimulus and example by the State, in all cases assisted by State inspection, loans of public money, local Acts, &c. &c. It is amusing to observe how at the very first step Mr. Harrison, who affects to despise what he calls political remedies, is obliged to resort to them as the chief agency in carrying out his plans. He looks round and sees that things are not exactly as they should be, and then in his grand way he exclaims, "Let London be rebuilt, let the country towns and villages also be rebuilt"; and when the question arises how this is to be done, his only answer is, "If private persons will not do it, then let the State and the Local Boards see to it." We must say that this sort of advice does not strike us as particularly brilliant or helpful. How the State and Local Boards are to be got to work without appeals to political parties and the usual course of political controversy and agitation, Mr. Harrison naturally does not condescend to explain.

One of the essential conditions of the reorganization on which Mr. Harrison insists is not only that houses shall everywhere be rebuilt, but that they shall be made the absolute property of the people who live in them. It is true that he limits this demand to the "workman in town or country." "The workman," we are informed, "can never be a free man or a full citizen until his home is his own—a castle really sacred from private or public oppression." But if this is true of the working class, it would seem to apply equally to a considerable part at least of the middle classes; and we are driven to the conclusion that England has hitherto known very few free men or full citizens. We are afraid the citizen will never have a castle really sacred from private and public oppression unless the possession of his house in absolute freehold is supplemented by some similar kind of protection against the Water Company, which might cut off his water; against the baker, butcher, and grocer, who might withhold supplies unless their tyrannical demands for regular payment were complied with; and against employers, who might take it into their heads to dismiss a workman if he did not give satisfaction, or if they happened not to have work for him to do. This part of Mr. Harrison's scheme evidently requires a little more elaboration. It might perhaps be suggested that the convenience of the workman himself is promoted by the system of leases and rents, inasmuch as he may have to move from one part of the country, or one part of a town, to another, and cannot carry a freehold house on his back. But when Positivism gets into full swing, these migrations will be unnecessary. It was, we believe, one of Comte's first principles that the amplitude and uniformity of Positive education would confer on workmen an equal capacity for all trades; and the fluctuations of the labour market would thus be met, not by a movement of men, but merely by drafting so many artisans or labourers from one craft to another. The Harrisonian oracle next proclaims that "Health ought to be at once a State department, including therein, first, the negative requirements of removal of nuisances, of stopping infection and contagion, the rigorous suppression of all adulteration in articles of food, &c.; secondly, the positive task of securing adequate fresh air, numerous and accessible grounds for recreation, and a supply of faultless water." Here, again, we find Positivism, if this is Positivism, parading the stale commonplaces of every-day talk as if they were the most tremendous philosophical discoveries, things hitherto unimagined by man, and now for the first time disclosed by a Saviour of Humanity. Everybody, except Mr. Harrison, knows that health is already a State department; and there is no dispute as to the expediency or necessity in a general way of attempting by the application of public power to improve the sanitary conditions of society. The only question is a practical one as to the extent to which the State can usefully interfere, so that it shall not attempt more than it can actually perform, and lull the public into a false sense of security.

We have no time to go through Mr. Harrison's proposals in detail, and it may probably be thought that it would hardly be worth while to do so. We will take only another example—Mr. Harrison's conception of the State as a model employer. He would have an entire reorganization of the public service, docks, factories, post-office, and administrative departments, on the principle of excluding all competition in wages. "Instead of making public employés public slaves, the service of the State should be a type of good employment." "All roads, railways, harbours, piers, docks, bridges, lighthouses, &c., &c., and all other works open to common use of all travelling by sea or land," which would include, we suppose, steamboats, omnibuses, and cabs, are to be transferred to the State, to be worked on the system just described, "especially excluding all competition in wages, and all purely economic objects at the expense of public convenience and the welfare of the public servant." Moreover, the hours in all kinds of Government employment are to be reduced as far as possible. This, it must be confessed, is a noble programme; and if Positivism would really do all this for us, we might wish that the "organized moral force" (kept ready to order in Bedford Row) would take charge of us at once. Apply it to cabs, for example. In this showery, sloppy weather it would obviously be a matter of great public convenience to have comfortable, rapid, and cheap cabs always at hand. The Positivist cab would be provided with the best springs, nice cushions, a fleet steed or steeds, and would be got up generally regardless of expense. The fare would be perhaps a farthing a mile, or less. The driver would be of course a highly superior man of universal culture, who could converse through the roof of a Hansom on the Hierarchy of Human Conceptions or the Calculus of Society. He would be engaged at a handsome salary, and would be provided with a neat freehold residence. We do not know whether there would be any taxes in a Positivist world, but considering how much is to be done by the State, and the noble disregard of all economical considerations which the State is to display, the expenditure would be considerable and would have to be met somehow. It is possible that the cabman and his fare, after they had paid their contributions to the common fund, might be tempted to reflect that the advantages of a freehold house or a cheap ride at the expense of the State were rather nominal than real, and that it would be better to let things find their level in the old way. It is clear that if the State were to undertake all the functions which Mr. Harrison assigns to it, it would become the great employer of all kinds of labour, and would practically fix the rates of the market. Small private employers would have to follow suit, and as they did so the State, in order to maintain its superiority, would have to go on continually raising wages and reducing hours till it could do so no longer. Mr. Harrison's Report might perhaps be considered creditable as a Utopian sketch by a smart schoolboy, who was not yet old enough to know what was being done in the world, and the practical limits of public action; but it certainly does not raise our conception of the rational capacity of the "Positivist Society" to find such crude, childish, and, for the most part, nonsensical suggestions set before them as the sort of thing to which they are likely to attach some value. If this poor stuff is the best outcome of the Religion of Humanity, we are afraid the world will have to look elsewhere for its promised regeneration.

JUSTICES' CLERKS' FEES.

EVERY measure of local reform in this country seems to go through two stages. It is first permissive, and then compulsory. It is plain that a certain administrative change would be an improvement; but improvement is not to be at once forced upon those who do not seek for it. Before everybody is compelled to accept the change, those who of their own free will are disposed towards it are allowed to accept it if they think good. Thus, when it was found out that order and property in the rural districts needed some better protection than that of the ancient parish constable, each county that thought fit was allowed, but for a while no county was compelled, to set up a reasonable and effective system of police. In this case the permissive stage is passed, and the safety of life and goods is no longer exclusively entrusted to a venerable shadow of patriarchal times. Reform of the highways was introduced in the same fashion, and reform in this case still lingers in the permissive stage. There are still counties where no Highway Boards have been organized, and where the roads are left to the care of the brother of the ancient parish constable, the ancient parish surveyor. Now there is on the whole something to be said, in certain special cases, not involving any general question of national policy, for this gradual way of doing business. It suits the English mind, which does not like to do things in a hurry, which likes to do things for itself, and objects to being dragged into even the most desirable reforms. It gives opportunity for discussion, and gives those who consent to the change the pleasure of thinking that it was by their own wisdom that it was brought about. And it also affords the opportunity of trying and judging how the measure really works in particular districts before it is made obligatory on all. By the time the measure rises to the compulsory stage it is no longer a matter of speculation how it is likely to work, but a matter of experience how it has worked. And its working is to be judged of all the better from the first experiment having been made in quarters where it has been accepted willingly. No county or other district would like to be picked out by the central authority to have an experiment made upon it. The experiment would be sure to fail, because it would be sure not to be carried out with any hearty good will. But when a district volunteers to make the experiment on itself, then there is every chance that the change will be carried out with hearty good will; it will be a point of honour to do a thing thoroughly which has been undertaken willingly, and each district which accepts the reform will feel itself in the proud position of a light and a pillar among its benighted fellows which are still blind to their own interest. When measures are adopted in this way, there is every chance of their being fairly tried under favourable circumstances before the whole country is called on to receive them. If under such circumstances they should fail and turn out not to be real improvements after all, the country is able to draw back before the mischief has become universal.

We have spoken of the rural police and of the Highway Boards. A third measure which is now in the permissive stage is one which is less likely than the other two to force itself on the public eye, but which is really of no small importance for the good local administration of justice. This is the question of the payment of Justices' Clerks by salaries or by fees. At present the prevailing mode of payment is by fees, but it is open to the authorities of each county or borough to substitute payment by salary at its discretion. The system of salaries has as yet been adopted by about twenty-four boroughs, including such important examples as Liverpool and Birmingham, and by seven counties in England and Wales—a small proportion certainly, but including counties differing widely in area, population, character, and geographical position. For the seven burning and shining lights in this matter are the counties of Surrey, Warwick, Northumberland, Northampton, Leicester, Glamorgan, and Flint. Of these Northampton, Warwick, and Leicester certainly lie all close together in the middle of England; but Surrey, Northumberland, Glamorgan, and Flint are about as widely cut off from each other as any four counties can be. For it may be needful to explain that, though Glamorgan and Flint are both in Wales, yet they are a good way apart from one another, and we cannot see that the presence of coal in three out of four of the isolated counties can have had any tendency to make them band together to substitute salaries for fees. Altogether the counties which as yet have adopted the change seem to supply a very fair presumption in its favour.

As for the system itself of payment by fees, it is a mere relic of an antiquated way of doing things which has been given up in nearly every other case. In almost every other department it has been found that a public officer ought not to be paid by the piece, but that he should have a fair and liberal payment according to the general worth of his time and labour. But least of all should a public officer be paid by the piece when it lies a good deal in his own power to increase the number of pieces. A Justices' Clerk, who is brought into constant and close connexion with the magistrates, and who must be their adviser on many important points, ought to be a man of character and standing in his profession. Such a man ought not to be put under the necessity of eking out his income by the exaction of shillings and sixpences; he ought to be paid fairly and straightforwardly according to the value of his services. As it is, every stage of any proceeding before magistrates is marked by the payment of some fee to the clerk. Each summons issued, each oath administered, each statement recorded, carries with it some petty payment. It is wonderful how costs mount up in the most trivial case. There is a shilling for this and a shilling for that, till the magistrate's hands are really tied, and he is obliged to sit and bear the sword in vain. That is to say, in a crowd of petty cases the mere fees run up to a sum which of itself is penalty enough, or more than enough, for the offence. What is the magistrate to do? He cannot remit the fees, to which the clerk has as good a right as to anything that belongs to him. He can hardly ask the clerk to remit them of his own free will, and the culprit is already mulcted, perhaps more than he deserves, before the law has pronounced any penalty on him at all. The magistrate is driven to "dismiss with costs," or to impose a fine which is purely nominal; that is to say, the actual sentence of the law is made lighter than it ought to be, because the expenses of the law of themselves impose a penalty which is higher than the two together ought to be. The penalty, in short, becomes indirect instead of direct: a man is punished, not for the offence which he has committed, but for his ill-luck in being brought into court for it. The magistrate is not to blame because the fine which he puts on is too low; for, if he made it higher, he would be doing a practical injustice. The clerk is not to blame because his costs are too high, for he must live and his fees are a part of his livelihood. But it is not a satisfactory state of things when the administrators of the law cannot venture to pronounce the proper sentence of the law because a further penalty, great enough, or greater than enough, is indirectly inflicted by a process beyond their control.

This line of argument may possibly to some appear over subtle; and no doubt there are many defendants who simply feel that they have to pay, and who do not greatly care whether what they pay is taken from them in the form of costs or of a fine. Still the state of things is unsatisfactory. It has an ugly look that the penalty directly inflicted by the law should be next to nothing, while the fees that go into the clerk's pocket run up to a considerable sum. But there are other practical evils about the system of paying by fees. The fee system gives the clerk a direct interest in increasing the amount of business brought before the court. The greater the number of cases brought before the magistrate, the greater the number of witnesses examined in each case that is brought, the greater is the gain of the clerk, who has his fee on every summons and every oath. It is thus the direct interest of the clerk to encourage litigation, to encourage the bringing into court of trumped-up cases which come there only to be dismissed. No doubt there are many Justices' Clerks who are quite capable of rising above any temptations to increase the number of their shillings and pence in this fashion. What we say is that the law should not expose public officers to temptations of this kind, which many doubtless withstand, but to which some may possibly yield. When this argument is used, it is commonly met by saying that, if the clerks are paid by salary, they will be equally exposed to a temptation of another kind. As it is, we are told, it is the clerk's interest to let nothing slip by, to do everything thoroughly. If he is paid by a salary, he will be tempted to be less vigilant, and to do his duty in a mere perfunctory manner. No doubt there is truth in this. It is hard to find any circumstances in life in which there are not some special difficulties and temptations; but those who use this argument seem commonly to take for granted that the balance of vice and virtue is so oddly arranged in the mind of a Justices' Clerk that, so long as he is paid by fees, he will be quite safe against the temptation of unduly increasing those fees; while, if he is paid by salary, he will at once yield to the temptation of pocketing his salary and neglecting his duty. As a matter of moral philosophy, the danger would seem to be equally great in either case, and as Justices' Clerks are men, and differ among themselves like other men, it may be that the one temptation might have most influence on some minds, and the other temptation on others. But the argument about the clerks, if paid by salaries, being tempted to neglect their duties is an argument which proves too much. If it is worth anything at all, it would show that all public functionaries should, whenever possible, be paid by fees rather than by salaries, because all public functionaries, and not Justices' Clerks only, must be liable to this temptation of neglecting their duties. But experience has shown in most other cases that this danger is not so great as the danger the other way, and the tendency of modern legislation has steadily been to substitute salaries for fees whenever it can be done. We think that the onus probandi lies with the defenders of fees. It is for them to show that there is some reason why Justices' Clerks should be an exception to a rule which is now generally accepted. For our own part, we should think that the temptation to neglect of duty would be less strong in the case of a Justices' Clerk than in that of most public officers. For the Justices' Clerk discharges the greater part of his duties immediately under the eye of those by whom he is appointed, to whom he is responsible, and by whom he may be dismissed.

The Bill now before the House of Commons, brought in by Sir David Salomon, proposes to carry out everywhere the change which has already been made in certain counties and boroughs. An equivalent salary is to be paid to the clerk instead of fees, the fees going to the county or borough, and the magistrate having the power of remitting them at his discretion. The clerk would thus no longer have any pecuniary interest in the business of the court. And the magistrate would be able to meet the class of cases of which we have spoken, where the fees run up to an amount utterly disproportioned to the fine which is the actual legal penalty. He would be able in every case to impose a fine, without regard to anything but the justice of the case; remitting, whenever there was any reason, the whole or any part of the fees.

As some county economists may possibly fear that the payment of a salary to the clerks, and the power of remitting the fees, may between them amount to a fresh burden on the county rate, it may be well to mention that, according to a Parliamentary return, the change is on the whole economical. Among the counties which have made the experiment some have gained and some have lost. If mineral Glamorgan has lost 218*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, suburban Surrey has gained 289*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* But on the aggregate of the seven counties the loss is 363*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.*, while the gain is 468*l.* 4*s.* These figures are decidedly cheering for rural Chancellors of the Exchequer.

A question was raised some years back whether the preamble of an Act of Parliament was necessarily infallible truth. When we think of the Acts of the sixteenth century out of which the question arose, the question is, to say the least, a knotty one. But if the present Bill becomes law, those who give to the preamble what they refuse to the Pope will have a new argument in their favour. We hold it for incontestable truth that, in the words of the present preamble, "it is expedient to improve the administration of justice at petty sessions by providing for the payment of Clerks to Justices by salaries in lieu of fees."

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

ONCE again it becomes difficult to answer the question universally asked, "Is the Academy Exhibition good or bad?" Of course the Prime Minister and other distinguished guests at the annual dinner proclaim each year with flourish of trumpets that the Exhibition at which they are called on to assist does infinite credit to all concerned. But the Academy dinner-table cannot be accounted, at least since the days of Sir Charles Eastlake, a board of criticism, though we have seldom met with a better defence of independent and truth-seeking criticism than in the speech of Mr. Gladstone. Yet one characteristic of the present Exhibition, in common with its immediate predecessors, is that the majority of the works have no claim to criticism at all; any one accustomed to these annual gatherings will find that the rooms present so much their accustomed aspect that even a catalogue is almost superfluous. The collection may serve, however, to suggest some not unimportant conclusions. The year 1872, if ever it shall be remembered in the history of art, will be conspicuous by the paucity of great works; not a single Academician can be named who has surpassed himself. The pictures selected for the large salon d'honneur prove by their small dimensions that artists, governed probably by commercial considerations, do not care to commit themselves to creations for which there is no immediate market. The three works honoured with chief places in the Banquet Gallery compare to disadvantage with pictures thus distinguished in former years. Sir Edwin Landseer's "Baptismal Font" (190) is but the ghost of a picture. Mr. Sant's Royal portraits (259), though painted by command, can scarcely compare with the historic and imaginative compositions produced in former years by Mr. Maelise and Mr. Leighton. The third picture signalized by the hangers is for art merit the foremost in the Gallery; it occupies the place of Moses in the last Academy, and the painter is the same. But in lieu of Moses, Aaron, and Hur, Mr. Millaud favours us with the portraits of three young ladies at a game of cards—"Hearts are Trumps" (223). A like descent might be pointed out in the other rooms; and even when high art has been aimed at, the good intention fails of realization. Thus we must regard as partial failures Mr. Poynter's "Perseus and Andromeda" (505), and Mr. Watts's diploma picture, the punishment of Cain (658). Yet in the same imaginative sphere we may name, as successes, "Summer Moon" (202), by Mr. Leighton, and "The Lament of Ariadne" (498), by Mr. W. B. Richmond, the son of the Academician. This last ranks as one of the grandest conceptions of the year. But these more ambitious creations are few and far between; indeed full nine-tenths of the wall space are occupied by superlative mercantile products which appeal to a public that deems imagination a snare and intellect an intrusion. An educated foreigner who should visit the Exhibition for the first time would feel himself a little perplexed. The Academy, so the President informs the world, is an ancient, venerable, and wealthy institution which uses its money and power for the welfare of art, and especially for the education of the artist. And yet the intelligent stranger, applying to the exhibition the standards upheld in the Academies of the Continent, would be led to the conclusion that English painters belong to the class of self-educated men who do not gather learning in the lecture-rooms or ateliers of Academies, but casually pick up such knowledge as they need by the wayside, and thus end pretty much where they began, incompetent to encounter technical difficulties, or to compass complex and weighty arguments. And yet we think it must be conceded that in no Exhibition throughout Europe is the general average so uniformly good. Whatever may be wanting to the 58 members of the Academy here represented is supplied by the 861 outsiders who rush to the rescue. So large a constituency renders the collection truly representative; thus this one hundred and fourth Exhibition, though it falls short of what we have a right to hope for, may be considered as a true index to the contemporary art of the country.

So evenly is the Exhibition balanced that it is a little difficult to know where to begin. On entering the first room a picture of unusual power meets the eye, "King Charles I. leaving Westminster Hall after Sentence of Death had been Passed" (42), a work which fully justifies the election of Sir John Gilbert. The King, though not quite up to the Vandyck type of dejected dignity and high-born grace, bears himself nobly and quietly. The scene is clearly and compactly told; the situation well seized; the action, specially in the hands, has dramatic intensity. The heads too are firmly modelled and forcibly painted. Yet, taken altogether, this oil picture is inferior to the artist's drawings in the Old Water Colour Society; the pigments are less transparent and lustrous, the draperies are wanting in definition, the execution is ragged. The study to which the artist has submitted is scarcely sufficient for canvas of this large scale. Yet in the essential elements of conception and noble treatment there is no more worthy historic work within the Academy.

An identical subject, "Charles I. leaving Westminster Hall after his Trial" (107), we owe to Mr. Potts, who a year ago entered the ranks of historic art. The picture is a relief for dramatic effect, which however he achieves too fully and coarsely intensifies, on the strong contrast between Charles, calm in bearing, and the riotous rabble with clay pipes and leather aprons. It is easy for an artist to go too far in the realization of revolting scenes of violence. Delaroche, when depicting the indignities thrust on the martyr-king, transgressed the bounds of moderation; and if we may be permitted a further illustration, we would say that painters in the decadence of Christian art carried the scenes of scourging, buffeting, and spitting to a point not permissible. The moment the right limit is transgressed high art becomes low art. In the picture before us it may be pleaded in extenuation that touches of pathos and of pity are thrown in. On the whole the composition has been well thought out, and the execution is vigorous, yet painstaking. Mr. Ward is another artist who makes good capital out of the calamities of kings. But the incident he chooses has the misfortune of being crowded together within the narrow confines of a coach, and want of light follows want of space. The subject is impressive, and the treatment is in more senses than one, weighty. This "Return from Flight" (182), is the return of the French Royal Family to Paris after their unsuccessful attempt at escape. Louis XVI., Marie Antoinette, the Dauphin, Dauphiness, and Princess Elizabeth are all huddled together in "a cumbrous, top-heavy vehicle, which required six horses to draw it. . . . Henceforth the life of the monarch, of the queen, of his family, the throne, and the safety of France were at the mercy of the caprice of the most capricious people." At the window of the coach are seen a clamorous rabble thrusting on the inmates bayonet, dagger, and the red cap of liberty; but the Royal Family, though fear-stricken, are calm and resigned. The story is told with clenching power; the handling, though occasionally heavy and dense, manages to unite delicacy with force. We incline to think that the colour would gain refinement by the use of quiet greys in place of hot browns and piercing reds; the red cap of liberty unfortunately serves as a keynote to the violent conceits. Yet the picture, though not faultless, must be accepted as one of the most earnest of recent efforts to reach to the dignity and solemnity of historic art.

For lack of these qualities several minor works fall short of the goal which cleverness and agility might win. Mr. Marcus Stone has chosen for play of wit "Edward II. and his Favourite, Piers Gaveston" (111). We are told that Gaveston, the Adonis of the Court, was accustomed to deride and mimic the English nobles for the amusement of his thoughtless Sovereign. The artist, accustomed to tread with light fantastic step the byways of history, excuses frivolity by cleverness; a jeer and a jest, fleeting as if writ in water, are fixed in perpetuity on canvas; the picture, when complete, becomes pointed, smart, and sparkling as a scene at the Gaiety Theatre. Mr. Stone seemingly shirks labour; with the confidence of an expert he strikes with direct thrust at his results. "Hollywood, 26th May, 1563" (479), by Mr. Kilburne, is yet another composition wholly wanting in historic import. It is of little avail that the catalogue identifies the canvas with Mary Queen of Scots and the palace of Hollywood; the smallness and triviality of the style, the dressy prettiness of the whole get-up, belong to the boudoir and the drawing-room. Painters should not attempt history save when they know how to impart to their characters dignity of manner and nobility of motive. Mr. Kilburne, favourably known in water-colours, is a very neat workman; indeed the picture in question has a finish and refinement altogether faultless. Mrs. F. M. Ward favours us with a pleasing and sparkling scene—"Mrs. Delaney at Court," "The Queen's Lodge, Windsor, in 1786" (510). The canvas is spangled with colours like a garland of flowers; the eye finds delight, but no repose: the picture wants unity and tone; the gay pigments are not sufficiently modified by shade. And yet in this home gathering, where are seen pleasantly occupied the King, the Queen, and the Royal children, there are passages supremely well painted; and as a study of character the Academy does not afford a head more striking and expressive than that of dear old Mrs. Delaney, here seated as much at her ease as if in her own parlour. "The Arrest of Anne Boleyn" (497), by Mr. Wynfield, may be mentioned as a painstaking work. The Queen's proverbially fine profile is brought out with good effect. We add, only for the sake of an example of what may be termed a parody or burlesque on history, Mr. Cope's feeble yet pretentious composition, "Oliver Cromwell receiving a Deputation of Ministers and Elders accompanied by the Dutch Ambassador" (368). The catalogue kindly informs us of the presence of John Milton; the head does indeed need an explanatory or apologetic label of some sort. Historic art is in fact here carried back to those pre-portrait days when the name of each figure, with an appropriate sentiment, was clearly written out, so that the painter's shortcomings might be supplied by the penman.

"A Dream of Fair Women" (365) pleasantly takes us back to the period when architecture called in the aid of her younger sister, painting. Mr. Armitage in this "design for a frieze" groups in one long panorama "the women of the Old Testament," beginning with Eve nude, and ending with Semiramis robed and crowned. Jephtha's daughter, the Queen of Sheba, Judith, and other Biblical characters identified with beauty, dignity, or heroism, are ranged in processional sequence on an elevated plateau looking down upon palm trees and distant hills. Symbols and accessories, such as a leopard, a leveret, a lamb, or some flower or leaf, which bespeak a character or define a country, are so placed as to add circumstance to the story and completeness to the composition; the purpose being balance, symmetry, and just apportionment of space, which are conditions essential to mural decoration. Carl Muller in the painted chapel at Romagen on the Rhine has executed in fresco a lovely group of "Women from the Old Testament," but his style is somewhat romantic. In comparison Mr. Armitage throws into his treatment less beauty and more dignity, less softness and more severity, and thus conforms to the requirements of monumental decoration. This composition, the first of a series, is well fitted for the painting in fresco of a spacious and stately interior. The general conception owes much to the processional frieze of M. Flandrin in Paris, and to the not less famous friezes in the churches of Ravenna. Another study by the same artist commemorates "The Great Fire at Chicago" (1323). America and England, personified by beneficent maidens, bend over a figure stricken down and desolate. "I was thirsty and ye gave me drink, naked and ye clothed me." The study of the figure naked and prostrate on the ground might have been made in the school of Raffaele; but before the design is carried out on a large scale it will be well for the artist to revise certain lines which repeat themselves weakly and monotonously. Mr. Armitage in a third work, "The Dawn of the First Easter Sunday" (41), does not lack power; the action of Mary Magdalene is highly dramatic; we might, however, desire more dignity for Simon Peter; objection, too, may be taken to the topography of Jerusalem; the position given, for instance, to the three crosses would seem an impossibility. We have walked over the ground, but cannot identify the sites here depicted; yet the painter apparently aims at matter-of-fact realization. Close by we encounter a picture by an artist who has never been known to sacrifice his ideal to sober facts or simple nature; and yet in the whole Exhibition there is not a more commonplace composition than Mr. Thorburn's "Song of the Heavenly Host at the time of the Nativity" (37). It says little for the high estate of our English school that the weakest works are those which concern religion. "The Children rise up and call her Blessed" (235), by Mr. Dobson, is refined, but conventional; the forms are of a pre-conceived ideal which dispenses with nature; the hands and the articulations of the joints are without definition, the draperies are little more than sacks. Such art, though not without a charm, has finality written against it. Mr. Houghton errs in quite an opposite direction; "John the Baptist rebuking Herod" (1132) is in a style more prone than sacred. Herod and the Baptist are so disfigured as to raise a smile; the whole composition—one figure of Sibyl-like grandeur only excepted—seems to pertain to the region of comedy. The clever but eccentric painter has committed a grave mistake; evidently his walk in art does not lie in the Holy Land, but in America; an Indian with a tomahawk is more in his way than a prophet or a king.

The rapid survey we have now attempted of the comparatively few historic and semi-historic works on view leads to the conclusion that Academicians and others had never heard of the golden transe enunciated over the dinner-table by Mr. Gladstone, that "the intelligent worship of beauty constitutes the basis of all excellence in art." Next week we propose to turn to works of the imagination.

THE THEATRES.

THE production at the Queen's Theatre of a new comedy called Ordered by Touch deserves special notice, because the author appears to have acted under the belief, which is not shared by all his brethren, that the composition of a drama is a literary work. He has written his play as carefully as another author might write a poem or an essay, and as this is said to be his first work, there is hope that he may produce other and better works which may help to preserve to the English theatre the character which it has nearly lost, of an intellectual amusement. The descriptions which have appeared of the first night's performance may possibly have produced an impression that this play has greater merit than it really has; but probably the audience only expressed, although with some extravagance, their delight at discovering one more Englishman who could write what might almost deserve to be called a comedy. The success of the play was, however, remarkable, and all the more so because the earlier part, which is in itself merely tedious, was rendered positively disagreeable by the superabundant energy of Mrs. Scott Siddons. There is a scene in a garden in which two other characters discourse, while this lady crouches behind an exceedingly small flower-vase and performs an accompaniment of vigorous gesticulation. This perhaps is the way they do it in the provinces, where, as we understand, Mrs. Scott Siddons has been practising her art. If we were to seek for what is called in critical jargon the "accentuation" of this lady's acting, we should find it in every word she utters, every look she assumes, and every movement she makes. In a play of this kind scenery and accessories are of small importance; but still we would venture to suggest, as an improvement, that the flower-vase behind which Mrs. Scott Siddons crouches should be made rather larger. As a beautiful mechanical contrivance, nearly approaching to perpetual motion, this lady might be surveyed by a succession of admiring crowds at the International Exhibition, but at the Queen's Theatre she needs, we think, occasional mitigation. It so happens that the scene in the garden is well acted by the parties to it, but the amusement of the audience is probably not enhanced by the energetic pantomime which is proceeding behind the flower-vase. They cannot need to be reminded that this is the celebrated Mrs. Scott Siddons who has been engaged expressly for the part; and although Widow Coralie is a sort of Providence in petticoats, she might usefully consider that omniscience is usually associated with invisibility. We do not in the least undervalue the talent of Mrs. Scott Siddons or the success which she achieved, and it is an unpleasant duty to advert to the possibility of an able performance approximating to the confines of boredom. But still it is undeniably possible to have too much of a good thing, and if we might venture to give a word of familiar advice to this clever actress, it would be, in her earlier scenes, "to draw it mild." Conceive a male orator doing what is vulgarly called the pump-handle business incessantly throughout a long speech, and you will gain some idea of the effect upon spectators of the indefatigable activity of the muscles of Mrs. Scott Siddons. She exhibits at the same time a self-confidence and complacency which are rather irritating to observers who think that, even if she knows how to do everything, she still has to learn how to leave some things undone. She has probably heard of flashes of silence, and she may be recommended to aim at producing bursts of inactivity.

The literary aspect of this play deserves almost unqualified commendation. There is one rather unfortunate passage which suggests that it has acquired some of that maturity which high authorities recommend both for wine and manuscript. A French officer exchanges compliments with an English officer in reference to the Crimean war, and adds that his nation were never defeated except by that to which his new friend belongs. But when an author is advised to keep his work so many years in a desk, it is implied that he should revise the work when he takes it out, and in that process he might be expected to have regard to such an important event as the Franco-German war. It is undesirable that foreigners should derive from this play the impression that in England it is generally believed that Waterloo is the last great battle that has been fought, and that we are as well satisfied with our military position as Mrs. Scott Siddons is with her own acting. The tone of public feeling is much more nearly expressed in an amusing adaptation of La Vie Parisienne at the Holborn Theatre, where a Swedish baron, newly arrived in London, is introduced to General Post Office as one of the military celebrities of England. The Baron, who is purposing to write a book on the country which he is visiting, naturally addresses to the General a question as to the strength of the army of which he is a distinguished officer, but the only answer is a mournful shake of the head. "Oh!" says the Baron, "I perceive that I have touched a delicate point"; whereupon there is considerable applause. The British public is well aware of the absurdity of demeaning itself on the political stage as a combination of Providence and Mrs. Scott Siddons, the influence of which everywhere operates irresistibly for good. To do ourselves justice, the nation is not content to repose on the memory of a time when it showed to Germany the way to contend successfully against France. However, we have dwelt sufficiently upon a single blemish of a play of which the ultimate success was rendered more conspicuous by the difficulties and disapprobation under which it struggled in its early scenes. The critics recommend, as usually they may safely do, compression; but a manager must always remember that he cannot greatly reduce the length of a play without putting something in place of the omitted matter. And further, there is such a thing as tediousness with an object. It may be said in favour of the padding of this, as compared with other plays, that at any rate the characters talk, and do not merely perform the sword exercises or pour out tea. Moreover the young gentlemen and ladies who make love in the studio of Madame Coralie, although their business is at the best insipid, might do it better than they do. It must be remembered that the passion of the banker's son for the sister of his cashier is the foundation on which the whole structure of the play depends, and although many of Madame Coralie's displays of sagacity might be made elsewhere than in her studio, or even omitted, yet her profession of sculptor is essential to that close observation of the banker which gives her the clue to his past life. We think, besides, that critics are ill advised in encouraging the public to believe that impatience is a proof of intellectual superiority. The French dramatist has this enormous advantage over his English brother, that he writes for a public who will listen with critical attention to long speeches. The Elizabethan dramatists, like all other writers of the same age, seem to have gone upon the principle that, if you have anything to say, you should be as long in saying it as possible. It is remarkable that an age which exhibits an enormous, and even expanding, appetite for long-winded oratory in Parliament and at the Bar, should demand that upon the stage speeches should be cut as short as possible. Like people who travel always by express trains although they have nothing whatever to do at their journey's end, an audience at a theatre can endure only exciting scenes, although even a moderately good play well acted ought to be more entertaining than an evening at home. We admire a French audience listening with almost religious devotion to every line of a comedy of Molière, and we envy authors who can write plays like that most agreeable trifle, Les Pattes de Mouche, feeling certain that they cater for a public which will be content to dine on nothing if it is elegantly dressed.

The Prince of Wales's Theatre has acquired a high reputation for care and finish, and the experiment of producing Lord Lytton's Money has been so conducted as to ensure considerable success. Yet we cannot help remarking that author, or manager, or both, must have a strange conception of the interior of a West-end Club-house, and we cannot admire the farcical expedient adopted of introducing a testy gentleman who calls loudly and frequently to the waiter for a snuff-box which exists for the general use of members of the Club. The combination of reading, smoking, and card-rooms in one may perhaps be conceded to dramatic exigency, but unless we had been informed by the playbill that the scene was a Club, we might have supposed ourselves to be contemplating the interior of a pothouse. On the morning after the gaubling scene at the Club the hero receives visitors at home. He is arrayed suitably to the time of day in a dressing-gown of overwhelming splendour, and perhaps we are to infer the intensity of the previous night's orgies from the circumstance that he appears to have forgotten to take off his black trowsers and boots before going to bed. The weight of the piece rests mainly upon this one character, and it is no mean test of an actor's skill that he can deliver a succession of sentimental speeches, all beginning "Clara," without becoming ridiculous. Some other parts which are in themselves of no great importance derive interest from the appearance of favourite actors in them. It is satisfactory to observe that an English comedy well performed will attract a full house of the upper classes, and managers of other theatres will do well to imitate as far as possible that careful preparation which has made Money acceptable to a fastidious audience. The difficulty of inducing actors of marked merit to accept any except leading parts accounts for most of the imperfections which we painfully observe in the production of almost every considerable play. The newspapers inform us that Mr. Pennington has been reading Shakspeare before a fashionable audience at Mr. Gladstone's house, and we are reminded that some months ago Mr. Gladstone witnessed this gentleman's performance in King John at a decidedly unfashionable theatre. We did not ourselves imitate the Premier's example, and we do not mind confessing that, however well Mr. Pennington was likely to act, we expected that some of his associates would act atrociously. It is a pity that every promising actor demands for himself leading parts; and there is no theatre rich and popular enough to make even small places in its bills worth acceptance by rising men. The play of Virginia was lately produced at the Queen's Theatre. The father and daughter were excellently performed by Mr. Ryder and Miss Hodson, but there was ample room for one or two more good actors in the cast. The same remark applies to the new comedy at the same house. Admit that it depends for its success almost entirely on Mrs. Scott Siddons, and that she is fully equal to the burden, still the quality of a good actor or actress might be shown in making the early scenes of the play endurable. Perhaps in his next play this author will contrive to give his subordinate characters greater weight. It must be owned, after all, that Ordeal by Touch is a work of great and varied power, and the prospects of the English stage are brightened by the production of such a comedy.

REVIEWS.

THE FOUNDERS OF THE BELGIAN MONARCHY.*

UNDER the title of "The Founders of the Belgian Monarchy," M. Théodore Juste has written an interesting series of biographies of the principal statesmen and diplomatists who co-operated in an enterprise which was more difficult and more perilous than, after forty years of success and prosperity, the present generation would readily suppose. If there are any who, in spite of that success, are still inclined to doubt whether the separation of the Belgian provinces from the kingdom of the Low Countries was conducive to the interests of European peace, or to that equilibrium of forces which was formerly considered the surest guarantee for weaker States against the ambition of the strong, there can be none who do not recognize in the admirable example of ordered freedom, of political sagacity, and of industrial and commercial progress which the Belgian kingdom has afforded to its neighbours, the extraordinary merits of the men who laid the foundations of its independence. Of these men, the one who forms the subject of the ninth of M. Juste's biographies has especial claims upon the regard of Englishmen; indeed by long residence among us, by family alliance, and by a peculiar and quite exceptional position as the representative of the Court most nearly allied to our own and the most intimate and confidential adviser of his sovereign, M. Van de Weyer has for the best portion of a public life concerned with the highest cares and responsibelieve, made England something more than his second country. It may be said without exaggeration that of the two countries, the country of his birth and the country of his adoption, he has loved both with little difference of affection, and served both with little difference of fidelity. And if in these pages it is the Belgian patriot and the Belgian statesman that shines out conspicuous for his public virtue, his undeviating loyalty, his strength of purpose, his fertility and flexibility of intellect, his rare discernment and various capacity, we in England are particularly attracted to this story of an illustrious career by the testimony of his biographer that his name and fame belong to us only less than to his own fellow-citizens of Brabant. The study of the negotiations, in which M. Van de Weyer played the most important part, for the establishment of the Belgian kingdom, inspires M. Juste with the generous reflection that "the Belgians hardly know enough what they owe to England." However this may be, it is probable that not even all the Belgian readers of this biography know how much their country owes to the revolutionary leader who never departed from moderation and good sense; to the diplomatist who overcame all difficulties by fortitude and firmness of spirit, by force of character, by a judgment never at fault, by an equal temper and an exquisite courtesy; to the statesman who to wide knowledge and various learning united the wisdom of the philosopher and the genius of good sense; to the jurist, to the professor, to the advocate, and to the man of letters who, armed at all points and never at a loss for an argument, an illustration, an epigram, or a word of good counsel in season, was strong enough to abash a Talleyrand, to convince a Wellington, to persuade a Palmerston, and to take his place, as one native and to the manner born, in the loftiest and the most cultivated regions of the proudest and most fastidious society in the world. Nor is this biography rich in personal interest and instruction only. It is charged with interest for every new comer into public life, for it shows that true simplicity of character and goodness of heart may strengthen rather than impair the qualities which command success in public transactions and in the pursuits of personal ambition. M. Van de Weyer was a devoted student and an indefatigable worker for years before the grand opportunity of his life arrived—an opportunity which he could not have foreseen, but for which he was found fully prepared. A glance at these chapters will, unless we are greatly mistaken, supply a moral lesson to be learnt with profit by political beginners.

* Les Fondateurs de la Monarchie Belge: Sébastien Van de Weyer, Ministre d'Etat. Par Théodore Juste. 2 vols. London: Trübner & Co.

M. Sylvain Van de Weyer was born at Louvain in 1802. His father, a patriotic citizen of substance, had served as a captain of Volunteers during the Brabant Revolution; and his mother, according to Sydney Smith's testimony, was a woman of remarkable character and intellect. After the annexation of Holland to the French Empire his father became a special commissary at Amsterdam, and the son was destined for the navy, and as a pupil at the Naval School took part in a review held by the Emperor Napoleon in 1811. A little later the boy was by no means an unconcerned witness of the national rising against the foreign conqueror. After the fall of the Empire and the creation of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, he returned to his native town, and became a pupil of M. Van Meenen, a celebrated jurist and an ardent Liberal, under whom he studied law and philosophy with earnest diligence, and took part in the management of the Observateur, a journal of which his master was chief editor. He worked so diligently and to such excellent purpose that in his eighteenth year he was admitted, after a summary examination, to the Faculty of Law at the Louvain University; and in the autumn of 1820, being on a first visit to Paris, he was charged to hand to M. Laromiguière, whose course of moral philosophy was then in great renown, a communication from M. Van Meenen, with some remarks in the form of an essay on a recent work of Condillac's eminent disciple. In his letters describing this interview the future Minister of State displays the lively and penetrating observation which was afterwards to be so brilliantly employed on more difficult and delicate missions. It was on this occasion that he made acquaintance with Béranger, who was surprised to hear that the Belgians were not at all desirous of being reannexed to France. One of the Professors at Louvain had conceived a scheme of universal instruction. The young Van de Weyer attended his lectures, and laughed at them in a very witty pamphlet, and a vigorous satire in verse, in which he defended the use of the French language, which the eccentric Professor had condemned, against the Dutch, which the Government required to be taught. At this time the students of the Belgian Universities were much given to political discussion, and M. Van de Weyer presided over one of their debating clubs. Being summoned to Brussels by the Minister of Public Instruction to answer for a lampoon which had alarmed the academical authorities at Louvain, he impressed the Minister so favourably that he was offered a scientific mission to Germany, and a Professor's chair on his return. He declined both, and, in August 1823, received his degree as Doctor of Law, after a severe examination, and was called to the Bar. Contrary to usage, instead of taking the text of his diploma thesis from the Code, he wrote a Latin dissertation on "Duty," in refutation of the utilitarian theories of Jeremy Bentham, who at a later period became so attached to the Plenipotentiary as to remember him in his will. He published a strong article against the preliminary censorship of the Faculty, and so decided was the effect of this article that it overcame the objections of the Faculty, who admitted him to his degree cum laude.

Before and after his call to the Bar he continued to distinguish himself in polemical and philosophical literature, and while others were flowing in upon the eloquent advocate, he was appointed by the Regency of Brussels Librarian to the city, and charged by the Government with the care of the precious collection of MSS. of the Dukes of Burgundy. In these functions he won the esteem and regard of all the various visitors with whom he came in contact; with some of whom he certainly could have felt no other sympathy than that of a kindly nature with fallen fortunes—such as the regicide Barrère, and Thibaudau, the exiled revolutionist of the Convention. His intellectual activity was incessant; he was editing the treatises of the famous Dutch philosopher of the last century, Hemsterhuis, and founding an association for the dissemination of popular instruction and the cultivation of a sound morality among the poorer classes; pleading in the courts for prosecuted newspapers; addressing to young men, in the form of Horatian satires and epistles, charming admonitions against idleness and prodigality, and admirably humorous counsels of charitable economy; composing delightfully ingenious moral essays, always animated with a practical purpose, and never mistaking dulness for profundity; and manifesting a singularly early maturity of thought and experience in those Thoughts on Different Subjects which were republished in London in 1863. In 1827 M. Van de Weyer was lecturing on the history of Philosophy in the Museum of Arts and Sciences at Brussels, and resisted an injunction to lecture in the Dutch language. His inaugural address was widely and warmly praised, notably by Victor Cousin in his Journal des Savants. In 1828 he paid a second visit to Paris, and was heartily welcomed by the choicest political and intellectual society in the French capital. After having contributed for three years to the literary portion of the official journal of the Government of the Netherlands, he attached himself to the principal organ of the Belgian Opposition, in which he defended with his pen the cause of Liberal institutions, which, in the person of M. de Potter (afterwards his somewhat intractable colleague in the first days of the Revolution) he defended with moving eloquence in an Assize Court. In that speech, in reply to the Public Prosecutor's contemptuous observations on the political press, he avowed with honest pride that he had been a journalist for many years, and claimed respect for the public services of independent and conscientious writers. Grossly insulted by a political antagonist in the Journal de Gand, he demanded and obtained an instant retraction, and excused himself in a published letter for having peremptorily insisted on satisfaction for outraged personal honour. All this time the agitation of the Belgian Liberals against the Dutch Government continued and increased, and M. Van de Weyer was called upon again and again to appear against the law officers of the Government for his clients of the Liberal press and the Constitutional Associations, without relaxing for a day his favourite studies and pursuits as a scholar, an antiquary, and a bibliophile. We may note here, as a characteristic of the good feeling and good taste that never deserted him in the most ardent controversies and conflicts, his withdrawal from a journal in which a virulent article upon the private life of the Prince of Orange had appeared. When at length the Revolution arrived, it discovered in him a safe and steadfast guide, and not one of those vulgar adventurers whom public troubles sweep into ephemeral popularity and power.

In the evening of the 25th of August, 1830, the insurrectionary movement began at Brussels, and the first act of M. Van de Weyer, on his arrival from Louvain, was to place a guard of fifty men over the Library and its treasures entrusted to his care. Chosen secretary of a Committee of Notables of the Civic Guard, and one of five delegates charged to draw up a national remonstrance for presentation to the King, M. Van de Weyer resolutely opposed the violent party, saying, "'89, by all means; '93, certainly not." Attached to the staff of the Civic Guard in the capacity of counsel, he attended a deputation to the Prince of Orange at Laeken, and when at length the Prince had consented to enter the capital, convulsed with tumult and barricaded, with no other military escort than his personal staff, he made his way at the risk of his life to the palace, and after stating with manly frankness the grievances of his fellow-citizens, consented to form part of a Commission for restoring tranquillity. He begged the heir to the throne to put himself at the head of the Belgians, and undertook to maintain the public peace for a fortnight until the return of the Prince from the Hague. On the 7th of September, the answer from the King to the demand for the separation of the two kingdoms was so unsatisfactory that M. Van de Weyer proposed the selection of a Provisional Government from the members of the States-General. This proposal was subsequently modified, and a Commission of Safety was composed of eight out of sixteen candidates chosen by the Regency, of whom M. Van de Weyer was one, to conduct the national movement and maintain order. The King's Speech at the opening of a special Session of the States-General at the Hague on the 13th September was so far from reassuring to the Belgian patriots, that all M. Van de Weyer's courage and constancy were needed to restrain the popular commotion. The Commission of Safety was soon discredited by its moderation; but M. Van de Weyer's ready wit and presence of mind were sufficient to reduce to silence and contempt a silly agitator who called for blood instead of speeches. When at length the Royal troops had surrounded the city, and the fate of the Revolution was to be decided by force, and the people had taken the Hôtel de Ville by storm, M. Van de Weyer confronted without flinching all the perils of the crisis, though not without some secret momentary misgivings. Escaping to Valenciennes, where other leading patriots were assembled, he decided them to appeal to the people for an organized resistance in the provinces, and to march with all the civil forces upon the capital. To sound the tocsin of revolt, to inspire and animate the insurgents, was comparatively easy; to preserve the Revolution from anarchy and from a dictatorship, and to organize an administration without an army or a treasury, demanded a combination of energy and prudence not often associated in revolutionary leaders. Throughout those anxious days M. Van de Weyer was the very life and soul of the Central Committee. In five days, under his calm and vigorous direction, it had reconstructed the entire political, military, and judicial fabric of the State, convoked a Congress, and astonished Europe by the restoration of order and the preservation of liberty, by the collection of taxes and the regular administration of public justice, as if the Government had only changed its name. The truth was, that the members of the new Government had set the example of self-sacrifice; M. Van de Weyer's father publicly declared that he would accept no promotion in the magistracy so long as his son remained in power. Many capital anecdotes are related of M. Van de Weyer's happy tact and never-failing wit in these extremities of the national fortune; as when, for instance, the Prince of Orange invited him to Antwerp, and he asked the aide-de-camp whether the Prince commanded the citadel and the troops. The aide-de-camp replying with some hesitation in the negative, "Pray tell the Prince," rejoined the member of the Provisional Government, "that I was on the point of accepting his invitation, but that I have an instinctive horror of all citadels and troops which are not commanded by his Royal Highness."

Such, in brief, was the first and foremost episode of M. Van de Weyer's political career. We must now accompany him on his first mission to the country in which he was destined to find the lasting happiness of his life, and to fix his home in calmer times to come. But the great enterprise on which he was engaged was to be fulfilled only after many weary and anxious days and sleepless nights, many months and years of arduous labour, incessant vigilance, painful uncertainties and delays. It was a task that needed consummate dexterity and inexhaustible patience. It was nothing less than to persuade the cautious and conservative statesmanship of England to consent to the infraction of a treaty which had been signed but fifteen years before by all the great Powers at the close of the mighty struggle with Napoleon, as a security for the balance of power and the peace of Europe, and of those very articles in the treaty which had been designed as barriers against the restless ambition of France; to induce the Government of England to undo its own work, and allow an ally who had fought under Wellington at Waterloo to be despoiled of half his kingdom; to take advantage of the French revolutionary impulse, and yet to restrain and defeat intrigues and schemes of annexation or partition very thinly disguised by French diplomacy; to appease the displeasure of Russia, Austria, and Prussia; to profit by the Reform movement in England and the accession of the Liberal party to power, without alienating or alarming Conservative interests and prejudices; and all this in the face of popular excitement and revolutionary impatience in Belgium, of reactionary conspiracies, of a national Congress agitated by conflicting hopes and fears, and of the obstinate determination of the Royal House of Nassau to yield only at the last moment to overwhelming necessity. It is easy for the present generation, who are accustomed to see Belgium happy, free, prosperous, and secure, to forget the dangers and the difficulties from which the little State at length emerged. The story of its birth-throes and its early struggles is told in the two volumes of this biography of the statesman to whom of all others belongs the credit of having rescued his country from internal anarchy, from the penalties of a violent dynastic reconquest, and from foreign annexation. M. Van de Weyer would have been content perhaps, at the outset of the Revolution, with a full measure of local self-government and complete administrative independence under the House of Nassau. But the Dutch dynasty, like the King of Egypt, hardened its heart, and would not let the people go; and it became a question for the Belgian patriots of being proscribed as rebels or of abjuring their allegiance. They resolved, at the risk of life and fortune, on complete separation, and there was a moment of despair when they would even have proclaimed a Republic to save their honour and their liberties. The known determination of the national leaders made it the interest of the great monarchies to accept a compromise of their pretensions, and it was in the conduct of the negotiations by which this compromise was concluded that M. Van de Weyer's vigour and discretion overcame all obstacles, and achieved a final and complete success. The Reform Bill, which brought a Liberal Ministry into power in England, was a very happy stroke of fate for the Belgians. Lord Palmerston took up their cause, and made a naval demonstration in the Downs at the critical moment when a French army had crossed the frontier to compel the Dutch to retire. And then it appeared that Belgian independence had only escaped one peril to fall into another. It required all Lord Palmerston's courage and decision to put the veto of England on the acceptance of the Belgian Crown by the Duke of Nemours, and to insist on the withdrawal of the French army. Talleyrand had furtively hinted to Prussia a partition of Belgium, anticipating, it would seem by some forty years the famous secret treaty of M. Benedetti. Antwerp was to be made a free port by way of a sop to the jealousy of England. Thereupon Lord Palmerston demanded the instant evacuation of Belgian territory by the French troops. The liberating army was withdrawn, and Louis Philippe declined the Crown for his son. Its subsequent acceptance by Prince Leopold was only the beginning of difficulties of another kind. The frontier question, the fortresses, the Scheidt dues, and the distribution of the public debt were stoutly contested by the representatives of Holland and Belgium at the protracted Conference of London, and cost M. Van Weyer immense labour and fatigue. All night long he was drawing up his case for the Conference; all day long he was defending it in person; he was hurrying to and fro from London to Brussels and back again, ever in the breach and ever in the front, one day in Downing Street, another in the Congress, ubiquitous and indefatigable with voice and pen, employing all the resources of the advocate, the orator, the publicist, and occasionally even the pamphleteer. The result belongs to history; and if it was not entirely satisfactory to Belgium, or perhaps (in the matter of Luxemburg) to the future interests of Europe, it was satisfactory beyond hope or expectation at the time, and it enabled Leopold to accept the crown without loss of dignity, and to transmit it to his son in peace and security. The account in these volumes of the final ratification of the treaty is one of the most interesting and instructive pages in diplomatic history; we have not space to dwell upon it here. The peace of Europe was saved; the new kingdom was established on that basis of neutrality and independence which its own prudence and prosperity, and the good will it has fairly won all round, have ever since preserved.

The firmness and high spirit with which M. Van de Weyer asserted the rights of his country against all assaults and intrigues were heartily acknowledged by friends and adversaries alike. The Prince of Orange, Talleyrand, William IV., Lord Aberdeen, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Grey, Lord Palmerston, Louis Philippe, all bore willing testimony to the tact and skill of the diplomatist; and in English society it was not only the successful diplomatist that found admirers, but the wit, the philosopher, the scholar, and the high-bred, kindly gentleman that found himself at home among a host of friends. To King Leopold he was not only a trusted servant and valued Minister, but an intimate counsellor and familiar friend. In 1836 he was requested to represent the King at the marriage of his nephew, Prince Ferdinand, to Queen Donna Maria at Lisbon; and four years later he was chosen by the Portuguese Government as arbitrator, with the consent of King Leopold, in a matter of disputed claims between the Governments of Portugal and England, and received the cordial thanks of the British Government for the able and impartial manner in which he had fulfilled a delicate task. Again in 1840 he was requested to act as mediator between the Governments of France and England after the famous treaty of July and the subsequent war in Syria, and in 1847 he acted in a similar capacity and with the same success between the Governments of Spain and Great Britain after the dismissal of Sir Henry Bulwer from Madrid. In fact, whenever any difficulty occurred in European affairs M. Van de Weyer was sure to be called in; such was the reputation he had acquired for that perfect quality in a negotiator, the mingled suavity of manner and strength of purpose which disarms rather than defeats resistance, and conciliates rather than conquers. In the summer of 1845 he was summoned to Brussels to form a Cabinet; in the following spring he resigned office in consequence of a disagreement among his Catholic colleagues on a Middle Class Education Bill. Excepting the interval of these few months, M. Van de Weyer may be said to have resided in England as Minister Plenipotentiary from 1839 to 1867, when, by the urgent advice of his physicians, he asked and obtained his Sovereign's permission to retire from public life. Although a Belgian patriot to the core (as was shown by his stinging pamphlet on the defence of Antwerp, in reply to Mr. Cobden), and proud of the ancient municipal liberties and the civic virtues of his countrymen, we may presume to count him as something more than an adopted Englishman. In public and private life he was always distinguished by those qualities of mind and heart, and by those sympathies and predilections, which we are accustomed to associate with the English character. At the anniversary dinner of the Royal Geological Society in 1849, under the presidency of Sir Charles Lyell, M. Van de Weyer replied to the toast of "the Belgian geologists," and on that occasion the late Sir Robert Peel publicly congratulated the Belgian nation on being so admirably represented in England. In 1850, at the annual dinner of the Royal Literary Fund, Judge Talfourd proposed the health of the President designate for the following year, M. Van de Weyer, as one whose "better half is English, and who has for years been an ornament of our society." And when his own turn came to fill the chair, M. Van de Weyer seized the opportunity of paying homage in graceful and feeling terms to that profession of the pen to which he said he owed his own position in the world, and expressed his gratitude to English statesmen and writers for the support they had always given to Belgian nationality and independence. No Englishman could have delivered a more patriotic, or, let us say, a more truly English, speech than that which M. Van de Weyer delivered in 1857, in the character of a Berkshire landlord and Chairman of the annual dinner of the East Berks Agricultural Association. It was in the crisis of the Indian mutiny, and he depicted in glowing language the heroism of Havelock and his comrades, and appealed to his hearers to unite heart and hand in defending the cause of British civilization in India.

"Calm is life's crown," sings the poet; and the calm which has crowned the brilliant career of this founder of the Belgian kingdom, after the stormy conflicts of his early manhood and the incessant labours of his later years, is that of ample leisure for those intellectual recreations which were once a refuge from the tumult of affairs and a solace amidst public agitations, and are now the charm and the delight of a philosophic moralist, whom his biographer compares for a moment with St. Evremont, but only to point the happy contrast of two epochs and two destinies.

MORRIS'S HISTORICAL OUTLINES OF ENGLISH ACCIDENTS.*

WE have several philological books before us, some of which, if we strictly followed the order in which they have made their way to us, would be entitled to an earlier notice than this of Dr. Morris. But we cannot resist the temptation of bringing before our readers as soon as may be a book whose value we think we do not exaggerate when we say that it makes an era in the study of the English tongue. We have at last an historical grammar of the English language which really recognises what the English language is. It is the first book of the kind which fully grasps the fact that the English language from its earliest to its latest stages is one language, with an unbroken history, and an unbroken personal being. This is the sort of thing for which we have long been looking, and we have found it at last. Dr. Morris does us the honour to acknowledge us as fellow-labourers in his work, and to give us credit for having done something to guide the public mind on this matter, perhaps even to guide the mind of Dr. Morris himself:—

By not regarding the earlier stages of our language as English, all the necessary helps to a rational treatment of its grammatical forms and idioms have been cast aside. The Saturday Review has very rightly raised its voice rather loudly against the absurdity of such a view, and has properly insisted upon the right of all periods to be designated as English—the very oldest term for our language, and one that is identified with its earliest history and with the very best writers of all its periods, from Alfred the Great down to the present time. This outcry against an absurd nomenclature has been productive of good results, as it is seen in the growing tendency that manifests itself nowadays to study the older stages of English, for the sake of the light they throw upon its later and more modern periods.

We never saw a more striking proof than Dr. Morris's book that the fight which we have been fighting, as some may think for a mere name, has really been a fight, not for a name but for a thing. We here for the first time, in any work of a moderate compass, get the true history of the English language, its real relations to other languages, set forth in a clear and scientific manner. Here are none of the usual confusions and misconceptions; there is nothing of the lingering notion that the tongue of a people who have settled in Britain must have something to do with the Britons and their tongue—nothing of the difficulty of grasping the idea that a tongue may be Teutonic without having any special connexion with High German—nothing of the strange unwillingness to acknowledge that the English tongue could be English until its English purity had been modified, or even corrupted, by foreign elements. We are almost ashamed to say that no trace of any of these confusions is to be found in Dr. Morris's book, because we are sure that, if they ever affected his mind, all trace of them has long ago passed away from it. Still, as we cannot lay our hand on any other book of its class which is not more or less affected by these confusions, it is not needless to say that in Dr. Morris's grammar they find no place whatever. When we read his accurate and scientific account of the origin of the English tongue and of its relations to other tongues, the main thing that strikes us is, how clear, how simple, the whole thing is, how incomparably clearer and simpler than the mass of confusion and contradictions which commonly takes its place in books of the kind. The only fault that we have to find is one that Dr. Morris himself hopes to remedy. His present book is not quite a book for beginners. He says:—"I have endeavoured to write a work that can be profitably used by students or by the upper forms in our public schools; a very elementary book formed no part of my plan." Dr. Morris's book is admirably suited for its own object, and it fills a void which we have long wanted to see filled. But a purely elementary book, a book for those who know absolutely nothing of the matter till they begin it, is at least as much wanted. Dr. Morris's next sentence is therefore a great comfort to us, when he says, "I hope to have leisure to write a more elementary work than the present one." Dr. Morris, in his first chapter, gives us in proper form the relations of English to other Teutonic languages, of the Teutonic languages to other Aryan languages, and of the Aryan languages, as inflected tongues, to those which are monosyllabic and agglutinative. The only fault we should find with his arrangement is that he goes backward from Teutonic to Aryan, instead of going forward from Aryan to Teutonic. In these matters clearness is the first point, and the strictly genealogical method, to use Dr. Morris's own words, is surely the clearest of all. And perhaps we may be inclined to throw some doubt on one question of Dr. Morris's where he says:—

* The Teutones were a German tribe conquered by Marius; hence the terms Teutonici and Theotones were subsequently applied to all German-speaking people.

It would perhaps be safer not to rule, paradoxical as it sounds, that the Teutones were Teutonic. At all events, it seems likely that the word Teutonici came into use as a piece of classical ornament. The old Latin name for the German language is Lingua Theotisca, a name which was gradually supplanted by Teutonice, which was doubtless adopted under the belief that it was a more classical form of the same name. The odd thing is that, in at least one English document of the eighth century, the decrees of the Synod of Colchyth (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 460), Teutonice is used in the sense of English, at a time when the word was certainly not in prevalent use in Germany. The fact is perhaps accounted for by its being the Roman Legates who are writing. They might think that Teutonice sounded better than either Anglice or Saxonicæ, and we do not remember any instance of Theotiscus being used in England at any time.

* Historical Outline of English Accidents, comprising Chapters on the History and Development of the Language, and on Word-formation. By the Rev. Richard Morris, LL.D. London: Macmillan & Co. 1872.

But it is comforting to find the Teutonic dialects arranged under the three groups of Low German, Scandinavian, and High German, and in the Low German division to find Gothic at one end and English at the other. Then, after pointing out the chief phonetic differences between English and modern German, Dr. Morris adds, "Not only English, but all the remaining members of the Low German family, as well as the Scandinavian dialects, are thus distinguished from High German." If all makers of English grammars had known how to put forth plain truths in this plain way, we should not, whenever the Teutonic character of the English people and their language is insisted on, have been met by the usual confused babble about the wide differences between Englishmen and (High) Germans.

Dr. Morris then goes on to distinguish the changes of sounds arising from what Professor Müller calls "phonetic decay" from the permutation of sounds under Grimm's Law. In these last we can commonly see the reason of the change, which it is less easy to see in the case of the permutations under Grimm's Law. We can see why, both in our own and in other languages, men have loved to drop harsh sounds, and to make long words shorter. But we at least cannot see why, where a Greek says d, a Low German says t, and a High German z. We may think that we see indications that the two processes were in their origin the same, but we cannot get beyond guesses. We are quite satisfied in admitting with Dr. Morris that the one class of changes are, as far as we are concerned, fixed and arbitrary, while of the other class we can trace the history and see the reason. But the difference between the two kinds of change should always be borne in mind, as it is not borne in mind by those who use the words "derive" and "derivation" in a reckless way, sometimes deriving a man from his brother or cousin, and sometimes from himself at an earlier stage of life. Dr. Morris then goes on with a most clear and accurate sketch of the history of the English language, putting forth the plain truths which only need to be put forth more simply, tersely, and fully than we ever saw them put forth before. He here points out the difference between these two modes of changes which affect the substance of the language itself, and the various inclusions which have made their way into its vocabulary, from the few Latin and British words which were picked up by the first conquerors to the last importation from French, Chinese, Turkish, or American Indian. For the benefit of people who either derive English from German or think that other people so derive it, it may be as well to add that modern High-German is one of the sources from which we have in this way borrowed most sparingly. Dr. Morris might however have increased his German list somewhat. "Halt," in the military use, is really "derived from the German," halten, of which hold is the English cognate. And he might have added one word which we have borrowed from modern Germany, and have shown in the process of borrowing that we had not learned our Grimm's Law. We have adopted Wasserschade in the form of watershed, while, according to all analogy, it should have been watersheath. Such words again as fatherland and one-sided are distinctly of modern German origin; but they are perhaps rather to be called adaptations or translations than cases of actual borrowing. Nor do we quite accept Dr. Morris's statement that "what is usually designated the Latin of the First period consists of words that have had no influence on the language itself, but are only to be found in names of places, as castra." By "Latin of the First period" Dr. Morris means the few Latin words which were picked up by the English conquerors in the very process of conquest, as distinguished from the Second period—those, namely, which they learned from the Roman missionaries at their conversion to Christianity. But, though the word castra, ceaster, no longer exists in our language except as a proper name, there was a time when it was used as an appellative, when the City of the Legions was not yet Chester, but was only "a waste chester." But street still lives in daily use, and some of the names of objects, plants and the like, which our forefathers called by their native names, just as we do in the like case, but which some people are fond of piling together to show that English is not a Teutonic language, may have come in during the First period as well as during the Second. And if the Englishmen who were presented to Justinian in company with a Frankish embassy ever got back to their own island, it is not unlikely that they may have brought the word Casere with them.

Dr. Morris then goes on to refute the fallacies of those writers who go heaping together collections of words out of dictionaries—many of which are in no proper sense words at all, but mere technical forms—to show that our vocabulary is more Romanous than Teutonic. On this Dr. Morris remarks:—

Taking the actual number of words from a good English dictionary, the sum total will be over 100,000. Words of classical origin are calculated to be about twice as numerous as pure English words; hence some writers who have only considered the constituent parts of our vocabulary, have come to the conclusion that English is not only a mixed or composite, but also a Romance language. They have, however, overlooked the fact that the grammar is not mixed or borrowed, but is altogether English.

We must recollect that in ordinary conversation our vocabulary is limited, and that we do not employ more than from three to five thousand words, while our best writers make use of about twice that number.

Now it is possible to carry on conversation, and write numerous sentences, without employing any borrowed terms; but if we endeavour to speak or write without making use of the native element (grammar or vocabulary) we shall find that such a thing is impossible. In our talk, in the works of our greatest writers, the English element greatly preponderates.

Dr. Morris of course does not stop to confute that small sect—for we fancy it is a small one—which will not let even our grammar be our own, but mistakes the immemorial Teutonic plural in as for something borrowed from the cognate Latin and French ending. But, though it is perfectly true that our grammar is not borrowed, there can be no doubt that some of the forms which it took in later times were influenced by the Romance languages which was spoken alongside of it. This however has perhaps more to do with syntax than with accidence, and we may perhaps hear something about it in the work on the former subject which Dr. Morris seems to promise us. He then goes on to remark:—

The names of the elements and their changes, of the seasons, the heavenly bodies, the divisions of time, the features of natural scenery, the organs of the body, the modes of bodily action and posture, the commonest animals, the words used in earliest childhood, the ordinary terms of traffic, the constituent words in proverbs, the designation of kindred, the simpler emotions of the mind, terms of pleantry, satire, contempt, indignation, invective, and anger, are for the most part unborrowed.

He then goes on to show how completely the words which cannot be done without are wholly Teutonic, while those which can be done without are mainly Romance. We mark that Dr. Morris reckons church among the words of Teutonic origin. The following paragraph well points out the real effect of the Norman Conquest upon the English language:—

Before the Norman Conquest the English language showed a tendency to substitute an analytical for a synthetical structure, and probably, had there been no Norman invasion, English would have arrived at the same simplification of its grammar as nearly every other nation of the Low German stock has done. The Danish invasion had already in some parts of the country produced this result; but the Norman invasion caused these changes, more or less inherent in all languages, to take place more rapidly and more generally.

Dr. Morris then goes on with the periods of the English language, marking carefully the changes in grammar, the influence of the three chief local dialects, Northern, Midland, and Southern—the last of these being the Saxon strictly so called—the gradual infusion of Romance words, and the final development of the Midland dialect as the classical English, the Northern and Southern being for the future condemned to be looked on as specimens of the “naughty English” of Andrew Bore. In fact, Dr. Morris goes through the whole subject of English accidence just as to our mind it ought to be gone through. Every branch of the subject, the history of our verbs and nouns, and the specially curious history of our pronouns, is fully worked out. So is the whole doctrine of particles and suffixes, Teutonic and Romance. And, by way of Appendix, we get, among other things, vocabularies showing the real extent of the Celtic, Latin, and Scandinavian infusions into our language, and, more curious than all, that not very small class of words, originally Teutonic, but which have come into English in a Romance form. Such are herald, marshal, and a good many others; the most curious of all being where, as in wise and guise, ward and guard, we have the same word both in its original form and in its foreign dress. In Dr. Morris's grammar we not only may learn something from every page, but the whole is put together in regular and scientific order. When we read the full and clear accounts in his text and in his Appendix of the nature of strong and weak verbs, we do indeed seem to be removed by many generations from the days, which we daresay have in some places not yet passed away, when all that English children were taught was that certain English verbs were “irregular.”

RUSSIAN LIFE.*

THERE is very little pretension to book-making in Mr. Barry's Even at Home. It is made up in fact of a series of disorderly jottings, often without any special interest, and generally without any literary form. The author seems to have emptied some diary or notebook of its contents with no great perception of the difference of value between one fact and another. He has little sense of humour, and his funny stories are, as a rule, his worst. He has still less of the historic or social sympathy which would enable him to enter into the strange mediæval life into which he found himself plunged. Throughout he is simply a shrewd man of business, proud of his English good sense, and amusingly unconscious of his English prejudices, but judging everything steadily from an English point of view. On the old Russia which is passing away he looks with an utter absence of comprehension or sympathy, while language almost fails him to express his admiration of the new Russia which is springing up under the reforming hand of Czar Alexander. Of the Emperor's reforms, indeed, in themselves, it is difficult even for one who views them at a greater distance than Mr. Barry to speak without enthusiasm. No change so mighty has been wrought in Russia since the days of Peter the Great. It is not merely that greater liberty has been given to the press, that political discussion is allowed a far wider range than of old, that travelling within the Empire has been freed from the hindrance of passports, and internal communication facilitated by the improvement of roads; that the protective system, though still adhered to, has been lightened; that the finances have been brought to a sound balance, and the civil service partially reformed, or that the six hundred miles of railway which existed ten years ago have now grown to nearly ten thousand. It is that, with the emancipation of the serfs, and the growth of commerce consequent on these improvements, the whole conditions of social life have been revolutionized. “Until the year 1861,” says Mr. Barry very truly, “there were only two classes of people in the Czar's dominions, nobles and serfs. Now there are four—noblemen, merchants, shopkeepers, and peasants.” Of the two orders which specially represent old Russia, the noble has been quickened into a new energy by the new position in which he has been placed by self-emancipation, while the Church will soon feel the impulse given to it by the abolition of the hereditary character of the priesthood. But it is the rise of a middle class which has necessitated the great reforms undertaken by the Emperor in public administration and justice. A “new law with its simple code, oral instead of written practice, trial by jury, irremovable judges elected by the supreme power instead of by the local nobility,” is perhaps the greatest of Alexander's gifts to his people. But reforms are often so pretty on paper and so miserable in practice, that we are glad to have from Mr. Barry the evidence of a really shrewd looker-on to the substantial good wrought by the recent changes. He has, in fact, lived in the country, and this gives his book, tedious and uninteresting as it often is, a very different value from the fly-away sketches to which we have been treated in works like Mr. Dixon's. The “old judge,” Roman Romanovitch, with “his left hand feeling in his pocket for that which the right hoped to put into it,” seems to have been a personal acquaintance. His pay was some forty pounds a-year, “but then he had the power of deporting people to Siberia, and that was a valuable privilege in a money-making country.” It was a privilege which had at any rate its value for Roman Romanovitch:—

The fact was that Roman Romanovitch liked good living and playing at cards, so his income, which was not so very small, went in this way rather than in adorning his person; and besides, out of his forty pounds a year he was expected to keep a horse and droschky; for as chief judge of the town, his wife could not be supposed to go on foot when she went out for an airing.

His wife dressed well, and in the afternoon always appeared in silks and satins, and moreover, had some rather handsome jewels.

The judge's house was fairly furnished, as upon all his own and his wife's name-days any little articles that they might have dropped a hint they wanted to make their castle comfortable would be surely presented by one or other of the town tradesmen, particularly by any of them who were of a litigious disposition.

Roman Romanovitch was a jolly fellow in his house, and could eat, and drink, and have his joke with every one; and no wonder, for his wine-cellar was much better stocked than the neighbouring “Barrin's,” although the latter had a good estate of some twenty thousand acres, and the judge could always boast that he never owed anybody a copeck. Which was true in one way, because all his creditors lived in his own town, and in the case of a disputed account the judge could not be expected to commit such an absurdity as deciding against himself.

The thirty thousand statutes which lay before Roman Romanovitch in ponderous volumes formed, of course, an effectual barrier against any attempt at getting fair play or justice; yet the introduction of a simpler code would have been of little avail but for the two changes which supplemented it—the substitution of oral for written evidence, and, above all, an immense increase in the pay of the judge himself. Instead of forty pounds, Roman's successor received five hundred, and the whole system of speculation fell at once to the ground. At first the moujiks hardly understood how cases could be heard without a bribe, or decided in a few days instead of as many years, or why the applicants for justice were not sworn at and bullied as they used to be. But these are changes that people are only too glad to get accustomed to, and we will take Mr. Barry's word for it that in his judicial changes the Emperor has conferred an incalculable boon upon his people.

The main interest of Mr. Barry's book, however, lies in the insight which it gives into the industrial life of Russia. The mineral riches and undeveloped coal-fields of this vast country are in fact the greatest of her future resources. A drive through the low hills of the Ural range, from the gigantic mountain of magnetic iron to the very edge of the steppe, takes the traveller over a region unsurpassed in the amount and variety of its mineral wealth. “Here are gold, copper, lead, iron in masses; forests in abundance to supply the necessary fuel for the successful working of these minerals; labour sufficient for all purposes; all means and appliances ready at hand; the whole only waiting until a little more activity is instilled into the Russian character”; and, we may add, until the foolish administrative restrictions are removed which now hamper industrial enterprise. Mr. Barry hardly exaggerates in his statement that were the fetters of the bureaucracy once shaken off, the gold mines of Russia would equabin value those of Australia. As yet, however, mining is conducted in a somewhat primitive way. The iron ore is extracted from shallow pits of the same sort as those which are familiar to us in Sussex and the Forest of Dean. On the other hand, the works are of immense extent. Those with which Mr. Barry was connected seem to have been part of “a vast estate exceeding a million and a-half of acres, together with forty-five villages, and about sixty thousand inhabitants. On this estate were erected twenty-five large works for the production and manufacture of different metals. The revenue derived from this source yielded a princely income." Of the freaks of the great mine-owners, or Barrins, we get, of course, very amusing accounts. It is characteristic of Russia that a "Barrin" usually combined Eastern profligacy and feudal pride with modern extravagance, and that while he sent his shirts to be washed at Paris, he ordered a harem ready-made from Constantinople, and quietly put mutinous peasants into his blast-furnaces. To express his dissatisfaction at the dénouement of a play which had been acted in his private theatre, where the heroine in his opinion had been married to the wrong person, one of those mine-owners stopped the performance, sent for the village priest, and forced the hero and heroine to be actually joined together in matrimony. Extravagances of this sort have been recently checked by the emancipation of the serfs and the stricter justice of the present Emperor; but there is still something distinctively Russian in the character and position of the miners themselves. As a class they stand wholly apart from the agricultural peasantry, untouched by the common village system, and of course unaffected by the recent measure of emancipation:—

* Even at Home; or, Pictures of Russian Life. By Herbert Barry. Author of “Russia in 1870.” &c. &c. London: The Publishing Company, Limited, 1872.

On the emancipation of the serfs, in 1861, it was only the ordinary mujiks who received land from their late proprietors. The "mistaroviya," or workmen attached to all the great works, were not regarded in the same light, and the majority of those attached to the works in the centre of Russia are without land. I can mention one circumstance to prove the oddness of the ideas held by some of the serfs upon this question. A proprietor of one of the largest of these works at the time of the emancipation offered to let any of his workmen have land on the same terms as the other mujiks, but only the men from one of his twelve zavods accepted this liberal offer.

The workmen received their garden-ground to the extent of one declatine, but did not participate in the agricultural land.

They have no voice in the communal questions of division of the land, and do not take much interest in the affairs of the village generally. In consequence of having no "obrok" to pay for the land, they, too, are free to go "abroad" to search for work.

As a workman the Russian artisan is excellent. Inferior to the English workman in actual physical strength, and unable to equal him in the quantity of work done, he has much of the Oriental aptitude for mechanical imitation, and can reproduce exactly any model given him, "from a padlock to a watch." There, as here, drink is the workman's most terrible foe; while the strife between employer and employed seems even more constant and virulent in Russia than at home. The Russian Trade Unions have one distinct advantage over their English rivals; by an old statute every proprietor is obliged to maintain his workpeople, whether they are employed or not; and this law, were it strictly enforced, would leave the master absolutely at his men's mercy. But, as a rule, the contest is fought out in the common way, though the causes of a Russian strike are usually no difficult calculations as to rise and fall in price, nor any desire to reduce the hours of labour, but simply a longing for an occasional holiday and a greater proportion of drink.

It is curious to see how these problems of European society stand face to face in Russia with the picturesque social phenomena of the East. We pass from a miners' strike to an interview with the ambassador from Bokhara, hugging the golden ewer which he is carrying as a present to the Czar. The English engineer on board the steambot yells his "enée" and "stop her" over the heads of devout Tartars who have spread their prayer carpet on its deck, and are kneeling with their faces towards the setting sun. At the landing place at Kazan all the apple-dealers are followers of the Prophet, and swindle their Christian customers with true Moslem relish. The very cargoes of the barges on the Volga are as great a medley as the Empire itself:—

As every one knows, the Oka discharges itself into the Volga, so, bidding our friends good-bye, not forgetting the great man, we took the ship's boat, and were rowed into the latter river, noticing on the way the wonderful diversity of the various merchandise with which the countless number of barges we passed were loaded.

We saw iron from Siberia, tea from China, cotton from Bokhara, carpets from Persia, petroleum from the Caucasus, salt from the Eastern steppes, corn from Podolia, herrings from Astrakhan, samovars from Toula, grindstones from the Ural mountains; in fact, a collection of articles, Eastern and Western, much too numerous to mention, for Nijny Novgorod is the point where, for transport purposes, Europe meets Asia.

If ethnographical variety, indeed, could produce richness of national life, Russia would be the wealthiest nation in this way in the world. In the museum at Moscow examples of all the peoples who own the sway of the Czar have been industriously collected together; they begin with an Esquimaux, and end with a copper-coloured fire-worshipper. Hardly less striking than the contrast between the East and the West is the contrast between the present and the past, or again between the busy life of the great mining factories which Mr. Barry describes and the silence of the vast forests which surround them. The readers of the great Russian novelist will remember the weird power with which he has transferred to his pages the stillness and mystery of those endless woods of dreary pines, stretching for hundreds of miles without a break, save the little clearing in which rises the hut of the bee-keeper, and swept by fires which traverse provinces in their course. "The last one of great importance," says Mr. Barry, "was in 1869, which commencing in the government of Tver, spread until it reached nearly to Wilna, in the centre of Poland." With the same sharp sense of contrast we pass from the modern railway to the Russian Fair. In these great centres of retail trade all is still mediæval; the medley of goods and peoples is just such as one might have met with in the streets of Troyes six hundred years ago. English beer and French gloves jostle with the shawls and jewels of Khiva and Bokhara, the broken Tchinnovnik elbows the blackleg Jew from Poland, the Siberian gold-dealer, the Tartar merchant in his slippers and embroidered skull-cap. Of the many strangers only one seems to be regarded with jealousy and even aversion. "The Russian people," says Mr. Barry emphatically, "do not love the Germans," and yet the Germans are everywhere in Russia:—

In the capital the majority of the large shopkeepers are Germans, whilst in the few other large towns in the Empire many Germans are engaged in trade.

At St. Petersburg, by far the wealthiest bankers, merchants, and brokers are Germans, and many more are of German origin. Commencing from the time of Catherine, the English for many years kept the majority of the trade in their hands; they have been, however, quite distanced by the Germans, and the English are now comparatively nowhere.

But it is in the country that these industrious and frugal people have set an example to the Russian mujik, of which I am sorry to say he has not taken advantage.

Scattered here and there over the Empire are German colonies; some of them, established many years ago upon land given to them by the Crown, have gradually grown into great importance. In several of them manufactures have sprung up, and generally they are industrious and prosperous.

It is quite curious in passing through such a colony to notice the nice houses, clean streets, well-kept fields, everything after the German type, and quite different from the Russian-owned property which it may join. In fact, there is Germany in the middle of Russia.

The hatred is most intense among the peasant class. The memories of serfdom are still fresh and rankling, and to the serf the German means simply the foreign steward who ground his life's blood out of him to provide for the demands of the prodigal noblesse. In the country fair the discovery that a trader is a German is at once fatal to his prospects of finding a customer among the mujiks, but the intensity of the general feeling will only be fully revealed when political circumstances have arrayed, as it seems probable some day must happen, the Teuton against the Russ. Glimpses like these of the actual life and feeling of the common peasant and artisan give Mr. Barry's book, under its somewhat trivial guise, a real value. As yet Russia has been seen through a purely political atmosphere, and the tone of its aristocracy, which is either by birth or fashion German, has passed for the tone of the nation at large. But it is plain that military and bureaucratic Russia is yielding fast to the new people which the changes of the last twenty years have really created. We are grateful to a book like this which introduces us not to the salons of St. Petersburg, but to the hut of the mujik and the forge of the miner. Henceforth the life and feelings of the peasant and the artisan will have to be taken account of in giving any estimate of the probable future of Russia.

ESSAYS ON CATHEDRALS.*

PEOPLE who shake their heads about Cathedrals, and wonder how much longer the age will suffer them to go on, must be a little taken aback by a volume like this of vigorous and practical papers on the future which lies open before them. The names of the writers, not all of them members of Chapters, the interest which they show in the subject, the spirit, conviction, and hope which mark the Essays, and the breadth and sound sense with which they are for the most part written, are not the signs of a failing cause. So far from being in danger, the Cathedrals have the game in their own hands if they choose, and it only depends on their members whether, from being the most suspected, they should not become the strongest, in their hold of popular sympathy, of all the portions of the Church system. No doubt they must work for this; but the means are within their reach.

Dean Howson's share in the work is almost too modest. He confines himself strictly to the task of editor, merely contributing a short introduction, of which the only special feature is the suggestion (a very questionable one) of the expediency of an Executive Commission to co-operate with Chapters in the work of reform. Church Commissions have hitherto proved very disappointing machines, and the wish for one seems to us to betray an unwise, though not unnatural, impatience on the part of energetic and hopeful reformers to stir up the more backward of the Chapters by some external agency. Our own belief is that the most trustworthy of such agencies is the increasing pressure of public opinion and conscience, and that an "Executive Commission," which in the long run practically means some one active member, or it may be a clever and well-informed, but not always friendly, secretary, is likely to denude the sense of responsibility in bodies which, if they exist at all, ought, with such assistance as they may very reasonably count upon from their Visitors, and if necessary from Parliament, to be their own reformers. If we cannot trust the Chapters to improve without a Commission, a Commission in which they are sure, rightly or wrongly, to see a natural enemy will, we are afraid, be made the excuse for a suspicious and barren conservatism. We cannot help wishing that the Dean of Chester, instead of countenancing the demand for a Commission, had told us more at length how he has introduced new life and usefulness in one of the least favourably circumstanced of caputular organizations.

The Essays cover a good deal of ground. The history of the Cathedral idea is the subject of a paper by a writer who has more than any one else seen the deep and pregnant connexion of English national history with English national religion, and who has studied it with the insight and with the industry of genius, Mr. E. A. Freeman. That this idea is not to be regarded as a thing of the past, a device of former ages to meet their own wants, but antiquated now, and incapable of adequately fulfilling any useful purpose in our own, is brought out from various points of view in the other papers which form the bulk of the volume. In two very interesting essays the Bishop of Carlisle and Canon Norris relate their experience and the lessons which it has respectively taught them about actual cathedral work—the one in the post which he so ably filled as Dean of Ely, and the other as Canon of Bristol. Mr. Beresford Hope writes on the great call and peculiar opportunities of Cathedrals in their missionary aspect; in their exceptional relations to the masses, the crowds both in city and country who are so imperfectly within ordinary Church influences, and of whom so little is known, except that they are sure to flock to Cathedrals where Cathedrals do their duty, that they show deep interest in what goes on, that they are more attentive and behave better than the average of regular congregations, and that they can hear things said to them there which they are not likely to hear elsewhere. Professor Westcott takes another great side of this work, complementary to that which has to do with popular instruction and the awakening of conscience and religious ideas in the multitude—namely, the place of Cathedrals in the system of the Church, as homes and centres of religious study and thought. Sir F. Gore Ouseley, than whom no better authority could be found, discusses their functions as schools of religious music, and their duties in the education of choristers; Mr. Denham, the Master of the Carlisle High School, writes about what are at present the subordinate, but far from unimportant, questions connected with Cathedral grammar schools. Two canons of Lincoln, Chancellor Massingbeard and Mr. Venables, contribute to the collection; the first a paper on Cathedral Reform generally, its history and prospects; the second, an interesting sketch of the architectural peculiarities and changes of our English Cathedrals. The Dean of Cashel writes about Irish Cathedrals, and Mr. Stewart Perowne of Llandaff about Welsh ones. Lastly, Dr. Benson of Wellington College takes the exceedingly important, and practically very difficult subject of the relation of the Chapter to the Bishop; a point on which nothing can be more clear and attractive than the theory, and nothing more likely, under our present circumstances, to prove full of embarrassment than the working.

* Essays on Cathedrals. By various Writers. Edited by the Dean of Chester. London: John Murray. 1872.

Dr. Benson's learned Essay, illustrated by Mr. Freeman's general historical review, supplies the true account of the original ideal of a Cathedral Chapter, its intended purpose, and its natural and primary functions. It was essentially connected with the Bishop, and in its relation to him as his council lay its original meaning. Neither the maintenance of divine service in the chief church of the diocese, nor the guardianship of its fabric, nor the possession of property as a great Church corporation, nor the conduct of theological education, were the first and essential functions of Chapters. The Chapters were primarily and in their specific character the Bishop's council, "diocesis Senatus"; and as Dr. Benson observes, "the most splendid relic of the institution—it is nothing more"—is still to be seen in the Roman College of Cardinals. They have preserved, as he says, like their "Papa," "an ancient name and ancient activity," which were once to be found in every diocese. And with this view of the institution a whole body of ecclesiastical law arose, by which it was governed. The statutes of each Chapter, varying, as they did, indefinitely in details, were yet not, as is often supposed, the one rule by which each Cathedral was governed. They were, Dr. Benson reminds us, in no respect privilegia; "they were but a fragment of a powerful and well understood system of law—jus commune—which existed throughout Europe; which statutes framed for particular Cathedrals could not contravene, and could modify only in some particulars." Out of this conciliar idea of the Chapters, the same in substance throughout Western Europe, grew the various constitutional axioms, rules, understandings, by which their action was determined and their relations defined; and Dr. Benson illustrates in detail, from the history and records of Lincoln, how this conciliar idea was in fact realized; how it was assumed, appealed to, and turned to account by bishops who understood its true bearings and value in the government of their diocese; how long the idea lingered; from what causes it dropped into the background and was forgotten; and how it has been attempted to be revived. And it is in the direction of a further and more general return to this original understanding of the meaning of episcopal institutions and of their relation to the Bishop that his Essay points. There is no doubt much to be said for this view, that as the Chapters were first created to be the Bishop's council, and to serve in close connexion with the Bishop, and in subordination to him, so the first thing to be sought by reformers is to bring them back to this original function, and to make it the leading and primary feature of the restored action. But it must be remembered that history has its consequences, which are not always to be altered as men wish. It is said that Chapters have departed from their first ideal and purpose; that from being bodies associated to assist the Bishop, and to be his council and assistant, they have grown into self-asserting corporations, independent of him, jealous of his interference, and dissociating themselves from his work. And it is urged that they ought to be brought back by vigorous and stringent legislation to their original use, from which, under bad influences and to their discredit, they have slipped away. But it is to be remembered that if Chapters have ceased to be the Bishop's council, it is because the Bishop also has changed his position. He ceased to live with them, and in many cases even to reside in the same place; he did not care to have them as his counsellors, and left them to themselves, while he chose his own advisers. The divorce between Bishop and Chapter has been quite as much the Bishop's doing as the Chapter's. And the result has been that the Chapter naturally became more and more an independent body, learning to prize its independence, finding new objects and functions, and claiming to do in its own way what it had come to consider its proper work. Dr. Benson's Essay, and his historical sketch of the fortunes of the Lincoln Chapter, show that if the original conciliar idea of the Chapter has been widely departed from, this result has been owing to general causes, in which the instinct and policy of the Chapter to detach itself from connexion with the Bishop, and to release itself from his control, were but very partial factors. These general causes, many and various in character, have in the course of ages remoulded the institution, and it is with the institution as it now exists, with its functions, its capacities, and its interests, that we must deal at present. To attempt to subordinate Chapters to episcopal necessities and uses, and to destroy the independent position which the course of events has given them, in order to make them closer imitations of their original form, and to render them more serviceable instruments in the hands of the Bishops, would be as unreasonable and mischievous as we are sure it would be vain. That they may be of great assistance to the Bishops, and that really it rests very much with the Bishops to seek and to gain their co-operation, we have no doubt. But if their reason for existing now is only that which no doubt originally called them into existence, that they should be the Bishop's council, the reason seems an insufficient one.

The truth is, that they have grown into a place of their own, with special work, opportunities, and objects; and it is by this standard, whether they fill this place adequately and discharge its obligations, and not by reference to the functions which the earliest Chapters had to perform, that the case of Cathedral institutions must be judged. Their real, at least their paramount, use seems to lie in the two directions indicated in the papers of Mr. Beresford Hope and Dr. Westcott; in their "missionary aspect," as great centres and schools of preaching, and in their office, as places absolutely unique in our day in their advantages for theological study, religious education, and devotional life. This last view of the subject is perhaps the one which appeals least to popular sympathies. The temper of the day, calling for immediate and visible activity, appreciates services and preaching, but sets less store on the more concentrated and more retired work of thought, reading, and research, and the methodical and deliberate ordering of life. Yet if anything is certain, it is that our society, even our religious society, stands in need in the highest degree of more theological and historical knowledge, of calmer reflection, of less hurried and feverish decisions, of simpler and more frugal ways of living. Dr. Westcott has expressed this with earnestness and force. With one portion of this view we are familiar. The true functions of Cathedrals as places of study and intellectual work have often been insisted on. Dr. Westcott adds to this the important services which they might render both to society and to the Church, by presenting examples of "plain living" united with ready and free hospitality. "It may appear visionary," he says, "to set forward Cathedral bodies as the natural pioneers in an effort towards gaining a simpler and more frugal mode of living than commonly prevails." But he has the boldness, and we think also the wisdom, to remind the members of the Cathedrals that they have the opportunity of bearing a witness which no class needs so much as that which is becoming so powerful, against the worship of riches and the debasing materialism which go along with the "extravagant luxury which is wasting society." "No class," as he reminds us, "is so self-indulgent and luxurious as that of the skilled artisan":—

No class is so likely to grow in importance, and it is idle to hope for any general response from them to exhortations to self-denial till they grow familiar with a higher type of life within their reach, visibly realized by those who deliberately set aside the kind of "pleasures" which as yet they find so attractive.

Such a way of viewing Cathedral institutions seems more sound than one which simply goes back to their ancient and original functions in relation to the Bishop, or than one which looks only to making them of use in the organization and government of a diocese. The common mistake is that of monopolizing for some pressing and popular object powers which were intended for purposes of their own. Cathedral institutions, rightly used, can secure certain ends which nothing else can. It is sheer waste to claim them for other work which could be done, though not perhaps so readily, by other means. And even if their work now does not correspond exactly to the original intention of their creation, it is no objection to a policy which adapts the institutions of one age, modified but not revolutionized, to the real needs of another. In all discussions about Cathedral reform, Dr. Westcott's weighty words should be in the minds of those who, in their impatience at the failures which undoubtedly may be pointed out in the working of Cathedral institutions, are disposed to be jealous of that freedom and leisure without which we cannot hope that from them we may receive those real and valuable contributions to our higher theology which, as much as anything, this age, so busy, so quick, but so hasty and vehement in its conclusions, urgently needs:—

There is a natural tendency in all crises to regard these objects as pre-

ment which are of obvious utility; to turn into popular channels alien forces which are capable of diversion; to accumulate upon the points to which common attention is directed all the resources which can be made to minister to ends which are undeniably legitimate. It is easier for the moment to defend an institution by showing that it can serve some good purpose, than by considering what special purpose it may be best made to serve. It is more encouraging to work for a result which is immediate and certain than to prepare the way for one which is remote and unfamiliar. It is more grateful to supply an acknowledged want than to point out the existence of a new one. But endowments are essentially designed to provide for objects which do not appeal equally and at all times to general sympathy. They contemplate services which are wide in their scope, and yet perhaps only partially recognized. They enable patient labourers to command the means of dealing independently with great problems.

It is necessary to reject any theory of their function as inadequate, however much it may fall in with the satisfaction of urgent needs, which is not essentially apocryphal. And conversely we shall be justified in setting up an ideal standard of their office which may not be capable of speedy realization, if it at once corresponds with the evident design of their foundation, and also answers to actual, if not obtrusive, requirements of the Christian society.

The services of the cathedral are an element—a most important element—of cathedral work, but they do not constitute cathedral work. The cathedral is a part, but it is not the dominating part of the cathedral foundation. Preaching is in no sense more a duty of the members of the Chapter than it is now of parish priests. In the cathedrals of the new foundation the Dean and Chapter, with whom rests the entire and joint responsibility for the due fulfilment of the objects of the foundation, are required to provide for the "worshipping of God in their church with hymns and psalms, and continual prayers"; but no part in this service is assigned to them except that of ordinary attendance. A body modelled after the pattern sketched by the late Dean of Canterbury would provide for the performance of such work as well as it can be performed, and yet such a body would be bereft of almost every distinctive feature which marks the constitution of our present foundations.

We must, then, look elsewhere for the "idea" of cathedral foundations, for that vital power by which they have lived through times of apathy and indolence, and by which they may yet minister to the awakened energies of the Church. This is defined very clearly by the statutes of the New Foundation in the outlines there drawn of cathedral work and cathedral life. The work is concentrated in theological study and religious education; the life is shaped by systematic devotion and corporate action. No one will deny that this combination gives a specific character to a cathedral body; no one will deny that there is scope for the beneficent action of a society regulated by these principles in the English Church.

If it be said that this interpretation of one of the chief functions of cathedral bodies is at variance with their history, the answer is plain. It may be at variance with their history hitherto; but is it at variance with their idea, or with the principles on which they are founded? Is the work which has been roughly sketched superfluous or obsolete or impracticable? Is not the interpretation simply a rendering of old forms into the new forms which correspond to them? Is not the work one which is urgently pressing, and capable of being compassed, at least at its outset, by the resources of cathedrals? The peculiar characteristics of the age of transition in which we live bring out the need; and at the same time they are suited to guard public patronage from the action of caprice or favoritism. We can see in some respects more clearly than our predecessors what cathedrals ought to do, and we are better protected than they were against some of the evils which hindered the efficiency of what were supposed to be offices of dignity and repose.

There are, as is only too obvious, many defects and imperfections in the present constitution of Cathedral Chapters. Some of their powers are dormant; others have been enfeebled; there is a vague sense that they have no distinct function, and a consequent haste on the part of their more zealous members to occupy themselves with work which is already assigned to other officers in the Church. But if there be any truth in what has been already said, it can scarcely be questioned that they are able to fulfil a part in connexion with religious thought which no other body can fulfil, and which is essential to the complete well-being of the Christian society.

THE STORY OF SIR EDWARD'S WIFE.

IT fell to our lot not long ago to review a novel by Mr. Hamilton Marshall, called Men Were Deceivers Ever. Mr. Marshall himself expresses an opinion through the mouth of one of his characters that the hero of his present story is "much too clever to write novels. It is women and children," he adds, "that read novels." If this is Mr. Marshall's own opinion, and not a mere dramatic utterance, we can only wonder that he returns so soon to a form of literary art which he so emphatically condemns. Whether that condemnation be just or not is a question on which we do not feel bound to express our opinion; but this at least may be said, that if it is not beneath the dignity of a clever man to write novels, it should certainly not be beneath his dignity to write them well. We therefore fancy that Mr. Marshall might have done well to bestow a little more pains upon his present production. We may indeed say that in some respects he has made a decided improvement. His last story was written in a singularly spasmodic style; it was full of short jerky sentences, and bristled with full stops which occasionally interfered with the grammatical construction of the sentences. The fault has, to a certain extent, disappeared. He is not so sententious in his utterances, and his sentences do not quite so much resemble the cracking of a whip. There are, indeed, plenty of epigrammatic remarks for which Mr. Marshall appears to feel a rather weak paternal affection. To take an example or two, his model hero is reported by his wife to have uttered the following pithy observations, which are intended to illustrate the brilliancy of his wit. "Graham," he says to the stupid young man, "I call spring the profile of the year, summer the full face." In the same page he remarks of an old college friend, "Roe is of a flash-in-the-pan disposition—a hair-trigger and damp powder." We must leave to our readers to judge of the merit of this style of conversation;

whatever may be thought of it, it is obviously Mr. Marshall's own ideal of good writing. He is always trying to dazzle us in his own characters by such little sparks of wit. Speaking of a letter, he says, with no special provocation, and not because the remark leads up to anything, "I forget now whether it sailed under a sixpenny or under a shilling stamp. For a stamp and address is the rigging of a letter." At first sight one supposes that such a metaphor as this must be very clever; and yet we confess that the more we think of it, the less we see in it. The resemblance between a stamp and rigging vanishes as soon as it is examined; and we come to resent this irrelevant conceit, which only distracts our attention from the letter itself. Occasionally these flowers of speech are even more conspicuously out of place. The virtuous giant has at the catastrophe of the story got the villain by the throat, and his victim naturally gasps out, "You choke me." Whereupon the giant replies, "Do I? Those plants would die that live on foul air." To say nothing of the improbability of a stupid, though good and muscular, young man indulging in this witticism—as we suppose it to be—at the moment, we must confess that it is so sharp as to us to be quite unintelligible. We have turned it over and over, backwards and forwards, and can make no sense of it whatever. Apparently it is intended to intimate that plants which live on foul air would die in pure air; but then we do not see how the allegory applies to the case of a villain who is in danger of dying from absence of air of any kind. Or possibly it is meant that since some plants can live on foul air, a villain can live when he is being choked. The logic is perhaps good enough for the occasion; but we must say that the expression is in this case very inadequate to convey the meaning. On the whole we are inclined to give up the problem, which is not worth very much labour.

We will quote no more of these little artifices of language, which are, we think, not quite so plentiful as in Mr. Marshall's former novel, and which, to our thinking, should be dealt with according to the well-known rule of the critic who advised a young writer to read over his manuscript and rub out whatever he thought to be particularly fine. If Mr. Marshall would excise all his epigrams, his story would be distinctly improved. We have, however, noticed the fault at greater length because it illustrates Mr. Marshall's besetting sin. He has talent, and can be amusing when he is not over-anxious to show how clever he is. But he suffers from a weakness of many youthful novelists; that is, an exaggerated fear of being dull. Now, we admit, or we should rather say, we assert with all possible emphasis, that dullness is the one unpardonable sin that a writer of novels can commit. No care can be too great to avoid it. But unluckily in this, as in so many other instances, inexperienced people are apt to blunder into the very error which they are most anxious to avoid. To mention nothing else, it is a primary condition of making any story amusing that the situations should be set before us as plainly and intelligibly as possible. If two of the characters are talking, we should know precisely, and, what is more, we should know without trouble, what is the object of each of the interlocutors, what view each takes of the position of the other, and, generally, we should be thoroughly posted up in all that is necessary to a complete understanding of all the bearings of the dialogue. If it is necessary to bear a complicated set of circumstances in our head, and to turn over the pages to refresh our memory as to the precise stage of development of the plot, the writer may be certain that not one in a hundred of his readers will take the necessary trouble to appreciate his points. We should recommend Mr. Marshall to study the writings of Mr. Trollope from this point of view. Mr. Trollope occasionally appears to be, and indeed occasionally is, unduly tiresome in setting before us all the facts on which we are to form a judgment; but the charm of his stories is due in great measure to the thoroughly systematic and business-like way in which he discharges his duty. We are never for a moment puzzled as to the relative position of his characters, and we feel the most absolute confidence that he will never commit an anachronism or leave a thread in his narrative not taken up. It is owing to this pleasant mutual confidence between the author and his readers that Mr. Trollope is able to interest us in a long series of apparently trifling details and a quantity of "says he's" and "says I's," which would be intolerable under any other circumstances. Now Mr. Marshall is a curious example of an utter want of confidence in this respect. He seems to be perpetually afraid that if he attempts to hold our button for a single instant we shall make our escape. He fears to detain us in order to give the most necessary explanations. He supposes us to be so impatient that we will not look on whilst the necessary operations are being carried out to get the machinery into proper working order, and therefore he very mistakenly slurs over all the dry, though necessary, bits of narrative, and tries, according to the customary phrase, to make his pudding entirely of plums. The consequences are most uncomfortable. The story becomes tedious, though short. We never clearly know what his performers are to be at. They are not allowed a breathing space in which to develop their plans or their characters; and the narrative, in the hope of making it more lively, is put into the mouths of several different people, who are themselves perplexed by the intricacies of a plot in which it is no wonder if they succeed in perplexing the reader.

The story involves a mystery, or, indeed, two or three mysteries, which are not fully unravelled till the end. The chief narrator is a virtuous butler, who puzzles himself as to the relations existing between his master and his mistress. From a pure desire to restore the harmony which ought to prevail, he takes to listening behind doors, acting as a spy upon his fellow-servants, picking up letters that have been dropped, and consulting the pages of blotting-books. This excellent person complains of the deterioration of the modern breed of servants, and thinks that affection is no longer to be bought for money. We must confess that we should regard affection of his type as being dear at any price. Indeed he comes to the conclusion, entirely without foundation as it turns out, that his mistress has committed bigamy, and is undergoing a persecution from her first husband—the supposed first husband turning out, first to be her brother, and ultimately, as we believe, though we are not quite clear, to be only the son of the woman whom she erroneously supposed to be her mother. The virtuous butler is taken into the confidence of another even more virtuous literary person who is staying with the family, and who, from motives of the purest benevolence, encourages him to act as a spy, and occasionally gives him sovereigns to reward his activity. The two, together with a virtuous medical attendant who confides to them various family stories which have come to his knowledge on deathbeds, succeed in making a very pretty mess of a story already sufficiently complicated. A whole series of misunderstandings are crammed together into a short volume. Sir Edward Fask, the hero, is discovered to have been changed at nurse and therefore, not to be the rightful heir to his property; after which it is again discovered that, though he has been changed at nurse, he is the rightful heir all the same. Lady Fask is first supposed to be the daughter of a Mr. Tredway; then it seems that Mr. Tredway only made her pass for his daughter; and finally it seems that she was his daughter after all. A quantity of plate is stolen, and a vast deal of detective ingenuity is displayed about a glove which the thief appears to have left behind; though the glove is carefully concealed from everybody except the virtuous butler and his more virtuous friend aforesaid. First we are led to suppose that the lady's brother, who, however, is not her brother, has stolen it; then that a wicked clergyman has stolen it; then that a maid-servant, who goes mad—and no wonder under such bewildering circumstances—knows all about it; and finally it turns up, we cannot understand why or how, in a portmanteau with which the lady is preparing to elope in company with the wicked clergyman. For some reason, as mysterious as everything else in the story, this discovery leads to a reconciliation of the lady with her husband, and everything leaves off in the customary blaze of glory. In all probability we have made some gross blunders in this account of the most bewildering plot that we ever tried to understand. Our apology must be that there is not the slightest appearance that the story would be worth the pains of unravelling. The most intelligible episode—which is utterly irrelevant to everything else—concerns a selfish elderly gentleman who wishes to marry a lovely and rich young lady. To effect his purpose, he gets up a picnic, and gets his servant to saw through a bridge over a flooded river where he and the lady are on one side, and the rest of the party on the other. We really cannot see why she should marry him even then, though it is eighteen miles round by the nearest bridge. However, the rest of the party assume that this result would be inevitable, and three of them risk their lives in attempting to cross the stream. We presume that they were the best judges; but, to say the truth, this, like most other points of the plot, is to our intelligence hopelessly bewildering. We are content to give it up as a bad joke.

If it be asked why we should have spent so much pains in criticizing what must appear to be a mass of undeniable nonsense, we can only say that, in spite of its palpable absurdities, there is a certain freshness and indication of talent in the novel, which makes us fancy that the writer could do better things if he would condescend to be commonplace for a time.

LITTRE'S MEDICAL ESSAYS.*

M LITTRE has bestowed a boon upon literature by gathering together for republication the fruits of his early studies and researches. Even in the occasional and fugitive writings of a scholar so painstaking and exact, and a critic so thoroughly conscientious, there is sufficient value to forbid their passing away with the ephemera of a generation ago. His later labours upon the growth and structure of the French language, and, above all, his colossal Dictionary, now happily approaching completion, have given him so distinctive and advanced a place in the ranks of his native literature as to make the public, it may be, unconscious or forgetful of the toil that he had spent and the results which he had achieved in an earlier and widely separate field of learning. It was in the department of medicine that M. Littré entered upon his career of study, and counted on finding his professional pursuit through life. To this day he has maintained, he tells us, his ardour for medical studies. He has written much upon the subject—periodical papers, articles in dictionaries, monographs on themes like that of the cholera and other epidemics, critical and biographical notices of physicians, with an edition of Hippocrates. For ten years he walked the hospitals of Paris as externe and interne, in sedulous attendance upon the lectures of M. Rayer, to whose memory he dedicates this second harvest of what he reaped from his early course. Yet to this day he has passed not a single examination, he has no medical title or degree whatever, and he is not a physician. For so strange a state of things he gives the reason in the short preface to this volume of essays, which he seeks to excuse as the chat of an old man, aware that he has not many hours left him, and turning a lingering eye upon the past. His father's death, just at the time when he had kept his terms and was preparing himself for examination, threw him upon his own resources, burdened with the charge of his mother, which a brother shared with him. Unable to meet the expense of taking the doctor's degree, and too independent to avail himself of the proffered assistance of friends—his old teacher, Dr. Rayer, and his schoolmate, Hachette the publisher, among the number—he could not, even while making a living by his pen, wholly tear himself away from studies he loved so well. He still followed as a volunteer Dr. Rayer's clinical course at La Charité, working in the laboratory, and, though not practising medicine as a profession, cultivating it as a science. In later years he has, he tells us, found a useful field for his medical knowledge among the villagers in his neighbourhood. It was during these studies that the project of the great Dictionary was formed between him and Hachette, who was not destined to see it finished. Widely distinct as at first sight this, the great work of his life, might be thought, there was, he himself urges while dwelling upon the course of his intellectual growth, no mean value in the exercise which the exact study of medicine gave to his mental powers. Not for worlds would he have foregone that potent and salutary discipline. Morally and intellectually it formed an indispensable element in his general education. Rude and severe as it was, he felt it to be a good and bracing school. In a moral sense its gain lay in the largeness of sympathy which the sight and the treatment of suffering must engender in the soul of the true physician. Intellectually it is well to have witnessed in the anatomical theatre or in the hospital the highest organic laws or forces, both in their direct and reflex operation; to trace the conditions and results of healthy or morbid action, and to define the limits of man's power and skill in his mediation between life and death. In his brief autobiographical notice M. Littré lays down what might be expanded into a whole system of medical philosophy, whilst giving practical proof in his own person of its power to enlarge, to purify, and to strengthen both the intellect and the heart.

The study of medicine at the critical period of M. Littré's career was undergoing a kind of revolution. It had been the fashion to regard the pathology of disease as a series of phenomena having a real existence or raison d'être. Fever, cancer, inflammation, or what not, was an entity or substantial something in itself. Between the pathological and the physiological stage of being there was absolutely no connexion, nor was it held possible to bridge over the gulf. Such was the inevitable state of things until physiology began to enter upon its positive phase. With the present century the true method of physiological study made itself felt, and gave a new life to the philosophy of medicine. It became clear that no new or special law was involved in the phenomena of this or that disease. Morbid pathology was seen to be nothing else but physiology under a phase of derangement.

Like most followers of Comte, M. Littré has erred in setting down as an idiosyncrasy of his master an influence which was in reality due to the general tendency of philosophical thought at that period. It was not only in the triple formula which embodied his law of historical development, but in the more general sequence of his speculative ideas, that the founder of Positivism drew from the fountain of Hume. That the metaphysical or a priori method of contemplating nature has given way to a philosophy resting upon facts, and that no science is any longer studied as an isolated branch of knowledge apart from its relations to science in general, is far from forming the distinctive or novel glory with which those who call themselves Positivists claim to invest their master and themselves. Long before Comte had proclaimed his new classification of the sciences, the metamorphosis from which was evolved the medical philosophy of our day had been silently passing over the spirit of the earlier or scholastic system of inquiry. To free himself from the spectres of medieval or even more archaic nosology, there was no need for M. Littré to snatch at Comtism as the sole lamp of truth. To go no further, he might have bethought him of somewhat having been due to Haller and Bichat. That which from the first enlisted him under the banner of Positivism, and still keeps him in its ranks, was, he assures us, the light thrown upon his special range of study by its simply falling into its true place in the cycle of general movement and illumination. In the hierarchy of the Comtist heavens, physiology, with medicine as its attendant satellite, precedes sociology, and follows after chemistry. From simply seeing its place in the zodiac of the sciences, the student of medicine has henceforth at command all the light he needs. The lower and less complicated sciences, such as chemistry and physiology, will, in accordance with the Comtist formula, supply the needful illumination, which medicine will in turn reflect upon social philosophy. Unmindful of what has been done by Mr. Herbert Spencer and other critics to shake the basis of Comte's classification, as well as to dispute the logical evolution so much insisted on in the so-called Positivist genesis of the sciences, M. Littré seems to regard the authority of his master as the spell which has wrought all the wonders of modern thought. In his treatment of the special subjects comprised in this volume of essays he has nevertheless practically shown how little the most advanced criticism need be coloured by the peculiar tone or diction of what claims to be alone pos-live truth. So far from being distinctively Comtist, his method is simply that of every genuinely inductive reasoner, from Bacon downwards. In the permanence and consistency of natural laws as underlying all sequences and co-existences, there is but the difference of expression to convey the idea of any advance since the days of Aristotle. There are indeed schools of thought or systems of teaching still in existence, of which the central ideas remain at the stage which Positivists stigmatize as the metaphysical, over which the universality of natural law has not yet extended its sway. And here M. Littré does good service by his vigorous and effective vindication of nature. We are, as it happens, enabled just now to see these two schools in marked contrast with each other. The theme of one of our author's most telling essays, the "Demon of Socrates," has been lately made the subject of discussion in a high quarter amongst ourselves. Where Archbishop Manning is disposed to see from the first an opening for an order of forces transcending in kind no less than in degree the agencies now at work in the moral or social world, M. Littré takes his stand throughout upon the absolute identity and permanence of all the conditions of the problem. There can have been nothing, he argues, in the personal constitution or in the surroundings of Socrates which had not its counterpart in the case of men in general and in every age. Whether better or worse, wiser or less wise, than his contemporaries or successors, Socrates was neither more nor less than any other man of his or our day the subject of extra-human or extra-mundane agencies or forces. What was peculiar or abnormal, either in the subjective belief or impressions or in the conduct and life of the Athenian sage, was in no sort due, as the Archbishop thinks likely, to any special Providence surrounding so good and holy a man, or to any voice reaching his ears or conscience from a sphere outside of and above that of common life. It needs to be judged or estimated by no standard higher than that of mental action in general. Under the light of pathology the phenomena, according to M. Littré, admit of but one solution, the same which would be given by every medical expert in our day. The case was simply one of mental derangement. The voice heard by Socrates had no other reality than the objectiveness given by morbid imagination to the subjective workings of the organs of the mind. Antiquity was not sufficiently conversant with the phenomena of morbid psychology to refer these to their rightful cause. Nor is it till within quite recent years that the diagnosis of hallucinations of this kind has been approached with anything like scientific accuracy. Experience has for ages shown the compatibility of these special characteristics with faculties or moral gifts of the highest order, a circumstance which has naturally led to their being confused with the idea of supernatural possession or inspiration. M. Littré cites the case of Tasso, talking in magniloquent language with the genius whom his hallucinations had called up, and of Van Helmont, to whom his own soul appeared one day under the form of a faint flame, and revealed to him the system of medicine which long made a noise in the schools of Europe.

* Mémoires et Œuvres. Par E. Littré, de l'Institut et de l'Académie de Médecine. Paris: Didier et Co. 1872.

The same subject is continued in a review of M. Lélut's essay upon the Amulet of Pascal. Sowed up in his dress, where it was found after his death, Pascal, it is well known, wore a slip of paper containing, besides a general engagement to a change of life and a more complete devotion to God, the words, "Depuis environ dix heures et demie du soir jusques environ minuit et demi, feu," with the date November 23, 1654. This flame it was that he took for a supernatural apparition, urging him to more strenuous progress in the path of Jansenist rigour. A further form of hallucination was the precipice which, from the hour of his narrow escape from drowning in the Seine, he always saw before him, knowing it, however, all the while to be an illusion. The particular form which mental derangement assumes in this or that case is due in the main to the ideas generally prevalent at the time, especially as regards supernatural agencies or powers. These ideas have changed from age to age. They have passed from fetishism through polytheism to monotheism, and in their latest form vary between pantheism and secularism, or nihilism. In the nature of things alone there has been no change, vastly as men have changed in their opinions on the nature of things:—

Ils ne virent ni n'entendirent alors rien autre que ce qui se voit et s'entend aujourd'hui; mais ils l'expliquèrent autrement. Cette lente explication des choses est l'histoire même: entre l'idée d'un dard de feu qu'un dieu lance du haut des cieux et la connaissance des phénomènes électriques, entre les visions qui montraient les êtres surnaturels et la détermination médicale qui les rapporte à l'état pathologique du cerveau, il y a toutes les phases sociales dont les annales humaines nous offrent le déroulement. C'est une chaîne non interrompue où l'esprit humain arrive de plus en plus près de la connaissance réelle des choses, et le dernier terme a sa raison d'être dans le premier; c'est une élimination où des conceptions de plus en plus nettes remplacent les conceptions anciennes jusqu'à ce que le monothéisme lui-même, qui arrive aujourd'hui à la fin de sa phase sociale, et auquel on fait voir, ou, philosophiquement, que la notion de cause première et absolue est inaccessible à l'esprit humain, ou, historiquement, qu'il est la fille des formes religieuses antérieures.

Upon the cognate phenomena of demonology and sorcery, the religious possessions or epidemics of the middle ages, and the table-turnings and spirit-rappings of our own day, M. Littré turns the light of the same scientific pathology, aided by the erudition which his wide and scholarly reading has supplied. To trace the common ancestry and expose the kindred fallacies of this long series of popular deceptions is with him a task as easy as it is edifying. The morbid analysis which scientific medicine has especially developed of late years blends here with the philosophic study of life and history. What is at first puzzling, if not alarming, in the reports widely spread abroad of talking and writing spirits, of floating forms, gyrating tables, or luminous apparitions, is stripped of its wonder or its terror when it is shown with how slight variation impostures or delusions of the same kind crop out in the history of mental progress, and with what logical consistency they are to be connected with the same or similar conditions of mental disease. Nor is M. Littré less clear or forcible when he writes upon some more special branch of physiological, or even anatomical, inquiry; as in his review of M. Leuret's admirable Comparative Anatomy of the Nervous System in its Relation to the Intellect, continued by M. Gratiolet, or that of Professor Rostan's medical theory known as Organicism, with reflections upon scepticism in matters of medicine. In reducing all vital action to properties inherent in organisation, what, he asks, has M. Rostan gained beyond a new turn of expression? He has himself indicated its transitory character by pointing to a day of hope when all vital acts will be explained by physico-chemical agency. When indeed is that day of triumph for the pure materialist to come? The hypothesis is itself, as our author shows, illusory, not alone by reason of its violation of the Comtist canon in subjecting a more complex science like biology or physiology to one less complex, such as chemistry or physics, or of its substituting the pursuit of the "why" for the "how," but on what we hold to be the broader and more philosophical ground that it confounds two spheres of phenomena which the mind is wholly unable to grasp in common. It commits philosophy to a sort of squaring the circle by realizing a common measure or conjunct expression in the case of incommensurables. The practical turn which M. Littré is no less successful in giving to his talents is shown in some valuable remarks upon hygiene, as well in its private aspects as in relation to epidemics such as the cholera; upon gunshot and other wounds in war; upon the medical use of electricity, and the medico-legal theory of poisoning, illustrated by historical disquisitions upon the deaths of Alexander the Great, Henry I. of France, and Henrietta of England, sister-in-law of Louis XIV. In a charming criticism upon a well-known episode of Gil Blas, the reader may enjoy seeing for once the application of medico-philosophical tests to the creations of fiction. There is something novel and piquant in beholding one of the liveliest and keenest of French wits under the hands of the first and most austere living master of Positivism.

FATHER GERARD.*

(Second Notice.)

IN our previous notice of this volume we confined our attention to the autobiography of Father John Gerard; but the Narrative of the Plot is in some respects even more full of interest than the Life. The Life is only a translation; and partly on that account, though even more because it was originally written in Latin, it is less vividly depicted than the History of the Plot, which is given in the author's exact words. There is of course in both narratives the colouring of one who was deeply interested in all that he tells; but, after deducting as much as can be allowed on the score of the difficulties in which the English Government was placed by the conduct of the Jesuits, and after admitting that the prime cause of all the sufferings of Roman Catholics, at least in Elizabeth's reign, was the foolish and impotent Bull Regnans in Excelsis, published in 1570 by Pius V., it is impossible not to award the Jesuits their due meed of praise for heroic submission to suffering for what they considered a good cause, nor again to refuse our tribute of sympathy to men who were condemned frequently without any sufficient evidence to prove the charges upon which they were arraigned. There can be little doubt that Father Gerard would have been executed, if he had been caught, for participation in the plot, or else on some other charge; neither do we see any reason to doubt his often repeated asseverations that he was in entire ignorance of the whole conspiracy.

The main object of the work is to endeavour to exculpate the general body of Roman Catholics from having any share in the plot, and especially to represent the priests as being, with two exceptions, entirely ignorant of the design; these two being bound by the seal of confession not to reveal what they had heard—the one knowing the matter directly, the other in consultation, and both of them having, according to Father Gerard, done what lay in their power to frustrate the whole affair. Father Gerard's own expressions of horror at the wickedness of the means taken to compass what nevertheless he considers a good end are probably genuine representations of his own individual feeling; but they fail to do away with the impression which will remain on the minds of most readers after weighing the whole history, that there were many both amongst the Jesuits and of the laity who would not have stirred a finger to prevent the catastrophe, and who would also have hailed the success of the plot with extravagant delight. Father Gerard does not attempt to conceal the bitterness of the disappointment felt when James, the son of a Catholic mother, succeeded quietly to the throne, and the toleration they had hoped for turned out to be an idle expectation. Indeed, he hopes that the Roman faction entertained of the King's conversion contributed not a little to his quiet succession to the Crown, though perhaps the writer somewhat overstates the case when he alleges that James had promised the toleration of their religion to "divers Catholics of note and fame, and priests also who rode forth into Scotland as well to carry the assurance of dutiful affection from all Catholics unto his Majesty, as also to obtain his gracious favour for them and his royal word for confirmation of the same" (p. 24). The bitterness of the persecution which they endured the author ascribes principally to the Puritans, whom he always carefully distinguishes from the Church of England party, whom he calls by the name of Protestants. He speaks also of the severity of the punishments inflicted on Catholics as being intended to be a set-off to gratify the Puritans for the snubbing they received at the King's hands at the Hampton Court Conference. But, though we may perhaps be allowed to demur to the writer's assertion that the plot was "a thing that hath brought more grief to the hearts of Catholics generally in England than ever anything did in all the time of their sufferings" (p. 47), we see no reason to distrust any of the facts of the narrative. And, for ourselves, considering the mode in which they were exasperated by persecutions on the part of the Government, we think it wonderful that a larger number of them were not implicated in the Gunpowder Plot.

* The Condition of Catholics under James I.; Father Gerard's Narrative of the Gunpowder Plot. Edited, with his Life, by John Morris, Friar of the Society of Jesus. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1871.

The originator of the scheme was Catesby, a recent convert who had been in Essex's rebellion, having obtained a promise of toleration if it should succeed. Percy and Wright had become converts about the same time; and the other two—Winter and Fawke—had been bred in the Roman faith. Soon afterwards their number was increased to seven by the addition, first, of a younger brother of Wright's, and then by an elder brother of Winter's. The original conspirators had justified themselves by suggesting some doubts in general terms to Father Garnett as to how far, in the case of attacking an enemy, it was right to sacrifice the innocent with the guilty. Garnett satisfied them on this point without understanding the case to which it was intended to apply, but he afterwards became uneasy, and appears to have done his best to suppress any rising amongst his co-religionists. Subsequently five more country gentlemen were admitted into the secret—Rookwood, Grant, Keyes, Tresham, and Sir Everard Digby. Tresham was the brother-in-law of Lord Mountague, and appears to us to have been the most likely person to have written the well-known letter which led to the discovery of the plot. The truth on this subject will never now be known for certain; but the author's arguments to prove that Tresham was not the writer appear to us quite inconclusive. The mode in which four of the conspirators were killed and seven sent to the Tower, two more being afterwards added to their number, is matter of history; and Father Gerard's object is to show that these were really the only persons implicated in the plot. A proclamation was, however, issued against three Jesuits—Garnett, Tesimond, and Gerard himself. Garnett was first caught and sent to the Tower, where, by a stratagem of the Lieutenant of the Tower, he was overheard conversing with another Jesuit, and in the course of conversation was heard to say that there was only one man living who could touch him as regards the plot. This person was Tesimond, who, as Garnett alleged on his examination, had given him leave to divulge the case upon which he had consulted him, if he were in danger of torture, but in no other case. With Garnett, his servant, Nicholas Owen was taken. This man was tortured till he was ruptured so severely that he died; when it was given out that he had made an end of his own life—pictures being hawked about London representing him in the act of ripping himself open with a knife as he lay in bed, whilst his keeper was in the room "busy about some other thing." No additional light is thrown upon the motives or the acts of the eight lay conspirators who were brought to trial on the 17th, and executed on the 30th and 31st, of January, 1606. Winter at his death exonerated Tesimond from any participation in the plot. This was the person who in confession had mentioned the plot to Tesimond, who had consulted Garnett about it, Tesimond having leave (so Gerard asserts) from Winter to do so. Soon afterwards (March 28) Garnett was arraigned and condemned for concealing the treason, there being no proof that he was further concerned in it than that he knew of it in confession, which he admitted; the circumstances of the trial are well known, and are certainly not creditable to an English court of justice. Such proceedings would never be tolerated in the present day; but Garnett in his defence of equivocation goes to lengths which probably few Jesuits would have wholly approved. He was executed on the 3rd of May, protesting that he utterly disapproved and earnestly dissuaded the plot, which he had only known of in confession.

Upon the whole, the impression left upon the mind by the perusal of the whole narrative is that Father Gerard is far too anxious to proclaim his disapproval of all such attempts as the Gunpowder Plot. It is not possible to resist the belief that, if it had been successful, there would have been a general rally of the Roman Catholic party anxious to make the most of the occasion, and to place upon the throne one of the King's children, whom they would have taken care to educate in the Roman faith. Nor would their conduct in so doing have been at all unnatural. They had been subjected, and still were subject, to persecutions of the bitterest kind. The vivid picture of the dangers undergone both by patients who performed the offices of their Church and laymen who harboured them for that purpose enlists our sympathies in their favour; and it seems to us matter for surprise that the plot was not more widely known and more heartily entered into. There can be little doubt that the Jesuits, probably as a matter of policy, disapproved such proceedings in general; and certainly no evidence was produced upon any of the trials which implicated them in any direct sanction of the proceedings of the conspirators. But one cannot help calling to mind, as one reads Father Gerard's often-repeated disclaimer, the French proverb "Qui s'accuse s'accuse." And it does not appear to us that Garnett exerted himself either as much as he might have done, still preserving the seal of confession, or as much as he implies he had done, in attempting to prevent the conspiracy.

There is a gap at the end of the fifteenth chapter of the Narrative which is much to be regretted, because in the remainder of the chapter the author promises some particulars of Garnett's earlier life, of which but little is known. In all probability Gerard waited for authentic intelligence on the subject, which either never reached him, or which came too late for him to make proper use of it. The last two chapters are taken up with a description of "the state of Catholics" after Garnett's execution, and an enumeration of penal laws enacted by Elizabeth and James against them. These laws may be seen in the Statute-book. It may be worth while to call attention to a very obvious division of them into two classes—namely, those passed at the commencement of the reign of Elizabeth, and those made subsequently to the foolish and wicked Bull of Pius V. of 1570. The work is in several places incomplete, and there is a note at the end, after the writer has given an account of the confirmation of the statutes of the previous reign, which was enacted in the first year of the reign of James I., to the effect that he intended to add the chief laws made in the third year of the King's reign. These, indeed, have nothing to do with the plot, which was discovered some months before; but the idea was to show how much Catholics must needs suffer under so heavy a yoke more than they do under the Turk or any other Government, and how hard it is for Catholics to live in such trials, being so barred the Sacraments and helps according to that of St. Bernard, "Vae illis qui asumuntur in fortium et non aluntur fortium." And, in conclusion, we must admit that the author, when he does not pretend to justify the plot, but only to palliate the wickedness of those engaged in it, will carry with him to a certain extent the feelings of all who are advocates of religious liberty and toleration. The last passage of his work is in this point of view worthy of being transcribed, giving as it does the explanation of one principal motive which must have actuated him in its composition:—

But especially when he called the Second Parliament, and in that suffered to be packed together all the principal Puritans of the realm, whose insatiable hatred against Catholics we knew very well would never take up until they had made laws answerable to their mind and malice against us. Then they all before the Parliament consulted and concluded of the bills and laws they would urge to be passed against Catholics, as afterwards indeed it was performed. And many of those intended laws were known to divers Catholics long before the Parliament time, which, as it is thought, was a great motive unto the gentlemen to undertake their rash and dangerous conspiracy, as deeming no desperate a course to be a needful remedy in so desperate a case.

THE ROSE-GARDEN.*

THE author of the Rose-Garden has attempted a difficult task. To make her heroine cowardly, untruthful, without anything like a working conscience, profoundly selfish, inconsequent, and uncertain, yet to render her at the same time lovely and lovable—to infuse into these evil characteristics a certain charm rather than any one great antiseptic quality, and to throw a stronger interest round her than round the upright and loyal Gabrielle; her "sacrifice"—was not easy; but it has been accomplished without affectation and successfully. We have seldom met in fiction with a more fascinating little witch than Renée Dalbarade. No one can respect her, and no one can help loving her. She is one of those women who seem sent into the world to upset the theories of philosophers and the whole moral law, and to show how well they can get on with only a pleasure-loving temperament, a fine pair of eyes, and no goodness to speak of. But we have a word or two to say on this very character of Renée, which, fascinating as it is, seems scarcely quite right, artistically considered. It is prettily conceived and prettily painted, but it seems to drift somehow, and the last part to be scarcely in harmony with the first. Either the subject-matter was too difficult to render with logical fidelity, or the author let the original idea slip out of its place, and after having begun from one model unconsciously finished off from another. The Renée of the earlier pages, if with many of the faults that become more prominent as the story advances, has certain qualities which seem to get lost or at least indistinct. Pleasure-loving and pain-dreading as she is, she yet has more courage and directness in the beginning than the author allows her towards the end. She could brave her mother, and that terrible uncle of hers, for the sake of letting the truth be known; and she could stand loyally by the man who loved her, and whom she did not love, and could act towards him nobly and without selfishness; but she suffers herself to be drawn into a shameful plot against truth, uprightness, and the man she does love, Jean de Savigny; though whether her weakness is due to her love for him, or her mere ambitious desire to be the wife of a rich man—desire of losing him being predominant in either case—remains a little obscure. Apparently she loves him before marriage; afterwards she becomes cold and indifferent; and we do not think the explanation given by the author, that his devotion to her rendered her careless—careless even of common courtesies—exactly true to nature; more especially as, breaking in on the selfish nonchalance of her ordinary life, come passionate scenes like that in the rose-garden, where, as more than once before, she is half inclined to confess the fraud to which she has been a party; but does not. The following extract may serve as a summary of affairs between the husband and wife before the dreadful secret is published:—

* The Rose-Garden. By the Author of "Uranian." London: Smith, Elder, & Co.

René cared little for her husband's displeasure, so long as he did not know her secret. She could read her power over him and was shrewd enough to understand that there was a point at which that might fail, but that as long as he trusted and believed in her his deepest anger would be abortive. She had but to put out a little fascination and he yielded with scarcely a struggle. Indeed, her real grief, still at times violent enough to alarm him, was sufficient alone to make him repent the very shadow of harshness, and to lavish a depth of tenderness upon her, to which Gabrielle could hardly believe she was indifferent. And yet it forced itself more and more upon her as the winter went by—the kindly southern winter to which there was scarcely a sharp edge—that he was vainly striving to win his wife's love, and that he would have had a better chance of doing so if he had cared less about her. He loved her so deeply that she had a hundred ways of wounding him in her power, and some malicious spirit induced her to delight in exercising them. She would affect to misunderstand his words; if he tried to draw her to his side to look at a letter or a plan, she would yawn, play with Coquin, or slip away like an idle child. He was very patient; it was sometimes touching to see how small a concession on her part would cheer him, but the lines in his face deepened, the harassed expression became more fixed.

At one time she forgets to order the carriage to meet him at the station; at another she leaves the house to pay a morning call without having seen him on his return from a journey; yet all the while we are to suppose she really loves him, as indeed is proved at the end. We are to remember that she is hiding a horrible secret, which she believes would ruin her for ever if made known, and that she is in her heart afraid of her husband, and more than a little overborne by her sense of his goodness and superiority. All this makes her conduct too much like that of a child playing with fire, too absurdly rash and inconsiderate, for the action of a shrewd, sharp, clever little woman as Renée is in other matters. But, as the author confessedly designed to draw a character full of subtle contradictions, we must accept the portrait as it is presented, and make the best of it.

The author of the Rose-Garden has two excellent qualities for her business. She can paint pictures, and she can draw character. She has fine artistic perceptions of form and colour, and she does not overload her descriptions. The picture of Bayonne, in the opening pages, is full of charm; and the slight sketch of the garden at Maison Chalosse, where Renée the arch witch, Madame Dalbarade her mother, and pretty, salaty, tender Gabrielle, her cousin, live under the tyranny of la vieille gynoëuse Jacqueline, is both vivid and suggestive. One sees the places described, and a few incisive touches laid on with breadth and decision do more than all that elaborate stippling, that minute "word-painting," which fatigues far more than it informs. Of her power of character-drawing, the interest and life-likeness of the personages in the Rose-Garden is a sufficient proof. Perhaps the best is that of Grégoire de Méhun, the good, heavy, old young man, who has no more notion of making love than if he were carved out of wood like the figure-head of a ship, but whose love, given, not made, is as loyal and as pure as any Bayard or Sir Galahad could have felt. The scene where Renée, to protect Grégoire from his insolence, divulges her uncle's shameful secret, then refuses to marry her clumsy, good, devoted lover, because she had no longer a virgin heart to offer, is really pathetic in its heroism and self-renunciation. It is beyond the range of the ordinary novel, and all the more so as it is told simply and without straining after fine language. Perhaps a little less running commentary would have been better art; but we can scarcely object to what was evidently written out of the author's own heart, and not thrown in as mere make-up and to gain time. There is all the difference between sincerity and affectation in this close identification of the author with his characters. The art is bad in both cases, but in the former it is a venial error, in the latter an unpardonable fault.

Though only a sketch, the character of Madame de Méhun, Grégoire's mother, is also very beautiful and natural. The "kind old eyes" that filled so easily with tears, the simplicity of nature that could not keep even the secret of the chocolate creams as the surprise of the picnic, the tender heart that suffered and then forgave, and the unbounded love for her son, whose very gaucheries she looked on as graces, are all very prettily portrayed. But we are sorry to say that Madame de Méhun is, of all the characters in the book, the least characteristically French. Even the mode of negotiating the marriage of her son is not French; and we are surprised that an author evidently so much at home in the life of France could have depicted such a courtship as that of Grégoire de Méhun and Renée Dalbarade. Doubtless license must be taken by the writers of fiction if they would give novelty and interest to their tales; and just as all our pretty women are not murderers or bigamists—which, if we were to believe certain writers, they are—so the rule in French life is not for the young man and woman to be allowed to fall in love first, through a freedom of intercourse quite as great as any extent here in England, and then, when the affections of one or the other are engaged, for the mothers to come to an understanding together. On the contrary, whether in Paris or Bayonne, the terms of the marriage are arranged first; the income of the son and the dowry of the daughter being the foundation of the whole affair; and, even when engaged, only such well-watched intercourse is allowed as would be thought by an English girl restricted towards a ball-room partner. Here Grégoire pays his addresses in quite an English manner, and only when he is hopelessly in love, and Renée apparently quite content, does his mother open fire on Madame Dalbarade, who meanwhile has formed other views, and flung her daughter into the way of another and a better party. This would be quite intelligible conduct in a Belgravian mother; in a French one it is simply impossible. But if the author of the Rose-Garden had shifted her scene, and located her dramatis personæ at Falmouth or Dover, she would have lost all that rich Southern colouring and quaint translated French talk which now give her book its special character. Still it is a pity to get interest out of any violation of local truth; and this is a very great violation of local truth. It is part of the author's deficiency in weaving a plot on which we commented in our review of a former work of hers; for if she could handle her material with thorough mastery, she would find means to make her story true both to human nature and national life, wherever the scene might be laid.

Gabrielle is the saint and the sacrifice of the book. She is perhaps a more conventional figure than Renée—one of the timid, blushing, blue-eyed, tender virgins who want "salt," as the Arabs say. She is lonely and misunderstood at Maison Chalosse. Her aunt, who has nerves and is irritable, is impatient with her quietness, and disdains her because she is not amusing; Jacqueline frankly dislikes her, partly for the same reason, partly because she has money and Renée her beloved has none; Renée loves her in her own spoilt selfish way, but though she will not let any one else behave ill to her, she has no scruple about teasing her for her own part; only M. de Savigny is kind to her, without special intention, and Gabrielle falls in love with him in consequence. But it is the story of the ewe lamb over again. Renée, who has everything and values nothing—love and adoration from all—takes this as well as the rest; and poor Gabrielle has to wake from her dreams and relinquish her shadows; which also is not French. One more objection and we have done. If M. de Savigny was so good and true a man as he is painted, how was it that he did not see through M. Jérôme Lefevre? He was no fool, but he acted uncommonly like one. We should have thought that none but the veriest novice would have taken up with a stranger as he took up with M. Lefevre; and that, however much a man may be in love, he would have sufficient common sense to require more than the mere prayer of his betrothed before making even her uncle his bailiff or intendant. We hope that the author of the Rose-Garden is not always going to miss, by only so little, real excellence. She wants merely a little more to make her work absolutely good; for she has some rare and charming qualities which ought to place her among our favourite writers. We hope to see her do still better than she has hitherto done; for there is no reason why, with careful self-culture and diligence, she should not be one of the popular novelists of her time.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 663, MAY 11, 1872:

England and America.
The Ballot Bill. Spain and the Carlists. Army Contracts in France.
The Correspondence with Canada. Mr. Gordon's Victory.
M. Thiers and the Council of State. The Shunting of the Prussian Bill.
Our Foreign Visitors.

The Peculiar People. Trials.
The Meanings of Respectability. Peeps at Spirits.
Metropolitan Schools. A Postivist Oracle. Justice's Clerks' Fees.
The Royal Academy. The Theatres.

The Founders of the Belgian Monarchy.
Morris's Historical Outlines of English Accidence. Russian Life.
Essays on Catfishes. The Story of Sir Edward's Wife. Little's Medical Essays.
Father Gerard. The Rose Garden.

CONTENTS OF No. 662, MAY 4, 1872:

The American Compromise—Women's Suffrage—The Carlisle Insurrection—The Ballot Bill—The Orléanist Party—The Debate on Lord Hatherley's Bill—A New Reform Bill Threatened—The Licensing Bill—The Opposition and Mr. Fawcett's Bill.

May Meetings—Post-Cards—Parliamentary Eloquence—The Endowed Schools Commission—Fools of Comedy and Farce—Venus—Cole C.B. "At Home"—The Battle of Wakefield—Lord Clarence Paget and the Admiralty—The Two Thousand.

Clark's Early Roman Law—Levi's History of British Commerce—The London Parks—Fremont's Growth of the English Constitution—Essays by the Author of "Vera"—A Colonel on Colonial Policy—Carey's Commonplace Book of English—Familiarity—French Literature.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—The LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872 is OPEN DAILY, from 10 A.M. to 6 P.M. The S.E. Entrance in Exhibition Road is open from 8 A.M. to Season Ticket Holders only.

LONDON INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION of 1872.—

There are FOUR ENTRANCES, open from 10 A.M. to 6 P.M.:

1. South-east Entrance in Exhibition Road.
2. North-east Entrance in Exhibition Road.
3. North-west Entrance in Prince Albert's Road.
4. East Entrance on east side of Royal Albert Hall.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—SEASON TICKETS for the LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872 NOW on SALE at the Albert Hall Ticket Office, and at the usual Agents. Gentlemen, 45s.; Ladies, 25s.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—The Owners of SEASON TICKETS are entitled to ADMISSION to the Exhibition on ALL OCCASIONS when open, including the reserved days.

To ADMISSION to CEREMONIES and PRIVATE VIEWS.
To ADMISSION to the GALLERIES of the EXHIBITION TWO HOURS BEFORE the PUBLIC.

To ADMISSION to the MUSICAL PROMENADES in the ROYAL HORTICULTURAL GARDENS and MUSICAL RECITALS in the ROYAL ALBERT HALL in connection with the Exhibition.

THE LONDON EXHIBITION of 1872.—ADMISSION: On Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, 1s.; on Wednesdays, 2s. 6d.; except on certain reserved days, which will be duly advertised.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—SPECIAL ATTRACTIONS.—THIS

DAY and NEXT WEEK.

SATURDAY (May 11).—THE GREAT FLOWER SHOW OF THE SEASON

PROMENADE CONCERT, &c.

WEDNESDAY.—THIRD NATIONAL CAT SHOW (First day).

THURSDAY.—OFFICIAL 3. FIREWORKS at 9 P.M. CAT SHOW (Last day).

SATURDAY.—GRAND SUMMER CONCERT at 3.

Admission, Flower Show, 1s. 6d.; other days, 1s., except Saturday, 5s. (or by Ticket purchased before the day, 1s. 6d.). Guinea Season Tickets free.

MUSICAL UNION.—Duvernoy, Pianist, Tuesday, May 14, Quarter past Three. With Maurlin, Wiener, Wachslehner, and Lacombe. Quartet, No. 7, in F, Heethoven. Trio, C minor, Mendelssohn. Quartet in D, No. 79, Haydn. Piano Solo by Duvernoy. Tickets, 10s. 6d. each; and Family Tickets (for three) One Guinea; to be had of Lamborn Cocks, and of Austin, St. James's Hall. Members can pay for Visitors, Regent Street entrance. J. ELLA, Director, Victoria Square.

THE SOCIETY of PAINTERS in WATER-COLOURS.—THE SIXTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION is now OPEN, at 5 Pall Mall East, from Nine till Seven. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d. ALFRED D. FRIPP, Secretary.

ELIJAH WALTON'S COLLECTION of OIL and WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS, now ON VIEW, at his GALLERY, 4 Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, Westminster.—Admission, 1s., including Catalogue. Open Daily from Ten till Dark.

DORÉ GALLERY.—GUSTAVE DORÉ, 35 New Bond Street. EXHIBITION of PICTURES (including "CHRISTIAN MARTYRS," "MONASTERY," "TRIUMPH OF CHRISTIANITY," "FRANCESCA DA RIMINI"). Ten to Six.—Admission, 1s.

UNDERGROUND JERUSALEM.—An EXHIBITION of WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS by WILLIAM SIMPSON, illustrating the Recent Explorations, Pall Mall Gallery, 48 Pall Mall (Mr. Thompson's). Ten to Six. Admission, including Descriptive Catalogue, 1s.

MISS GLYN (Mrs. E. S. DALLAS) will READ several of her favourite scenes from Shakespeare at the CONVERSATION of the LONDON INSTITUTION, on Wednesday, May 15. The Library will be opened at 8.30; the Theatre at 9.30. Evening Dress.

London Institution, Finsbury Circus.

By Order,

THOMAS PIPER, Hon. Sec.

ARTISTS' GENERAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION, for the Relief of Distressed Artists, their Widows and Orphans. President—Sir FRANCIS GRANT, P.R.A.

The Most Noble the MARQUIS of LORNE will Preside at a Dinner, to be held at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, on Saturday, the 18th of May, in aid of the Funds of this Institution. The Cost of the Dinner, including Wines, &c. Tickets can be obtained from the Stewards or Officers of the Society, who also will receive notice of Donations, to be announced at the Dinner.

JOHN EVERETT MILLAIS, R.A., Hon. Secretary.

FREDERICK W. MAYNARD, Assistant Secretary.

84 Old Bond Street, W.

THE CHURCH DEFENCE INSTITUTION,

25 PARLIAMENT STREET, S.W.

President.—The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY.

The CHURCH DEFENCE INSTITUTION is a Union of Churchmen for Church Defence, without reference to religious or political party. Units for forming Auxiliaries will be forwarded on application to the Secretary, to whom also Subscriptions and Donations can be paid.

ALFRED T. LEE, LL.D., Secretary.

INDIAN CIVIL ENGINEERING COLLEGE.—It has been determined by the Secretary of State for India in Council that, in the EXAMINATION for ADMISSION into this College intended to be held in July 1872, and in all future Examinations, no Candidate will be allowed to compete who shall, on the 1st of the month, have attained the age of Twenty. For the Examinations in 1872 and 1873, the maximum limit of age will remain, as at present, at Twenty-one.

India Office, April 23, 1872.

INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.—The following are declared to be the SUCCESSFUL CANDIDATES at the recent Open Competition for the Civil Service of India:—

In order of Merit.	NAME.	Total No. of Marks.	In order of Merit.	NAME.	Total No. of Marks.
1.	Drummond, J. R.	2,041	18.	Fawcett, G. W.	1,573
2.	Harrison, J. H.	1,981	19.	Curatone, H.	1,514
3.	Woolley, E. E.	1,948	20.	Sibcock, H. F.	1,507
4.	Edwin, F. L.	1,753	21.	Cumbe, A.	1,500
5.	Chapman, F. L.	1,714	22.	Taylor, F. B.	1,500
6.	Fraser, R.	1,667	23.	Latham, R. S. de C.	1,515
7.	Thompson, R. O.	1,618	24.	Fate, W. J.	1,511
8.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	25.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598
9.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	26.	Cuthbertson, J. L.	1,575
10.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	27.	Lee, H.	1,550
11.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	28.	Glynn, W. D.	1,513
12.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	29.	Hendling, F. H.	1,508
13.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	30.	Phillips, J. A. D.	1,510
14.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	31.	Phillips, W. R.	1,507
15.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	32.	Savage, H.	1,504
16.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	33.	Norton, D.	1,500
17.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	34.	Kennedy, J.	1,519
18.	Langdon, F. M.	1,598	35.	Smith, G. M. W.	1,508

of Mr. W. B. J. Bond, Square, Westminster, who, through Resident and Secretary, will be in the India Office, till May 31, when, House, King's

INDIA CIVIL SERVICE.—SELECTED CANDIDATES for the Indian Civil Service, who have been selected for the Indian Civil Service, will be in the India Office, till May 31, when, House, King's

HANOVER.—PRIVATE TUITION.—The ENGLISH CHAPLAIN (a Cambridge M.A., with Mathematical Honours) undertakes the care and Education of FOUR PUPILS. One or two Vacancies this month.—Address, Rev. R. G. WILKINS, 5 Emmanuel Way, Hanover.

A CLERGYMAN, late Fellow of his College, taking a few YOUNG BOYS to PREPARE for the PUBLIC SCHOOLS, has a Vacancy at present.—For terms, &c., address B. D., Hornfield, Micham Common, Surrey.

MR. A. DAWSON CLARKE (B.A. Cambridge) and Mr. A. M. LIPSCOMB (B.A. Oxon) receive RESIDENT and NON-RESIDENT PUPILS for the various Competitive Examinations, and for the Universities. During the last three years Pupils have been prepared for the following Examinations:—Oxford (Final Schools and Matriculation); Cambridge (B.A. Exam. and Matriculation); Indian Telegraph Service, Engineering College, and Woods and Forests; Woolwich, Direct Commission, Diplomatic Service, British Museum, Institute of Actuaries, Preliminary Law and Medicine.—For Terms, References, &c., apply to Mr. A. D. CLARKE, 39 Tooting Square, W.C., or to Mr. A. M. LIPSCOMB, 38 Bernard Street, Russell Square, W.C.

AT ILKLEY.—Mr. ALGERNON FOGGO, M.A., of Christ's College, Cambridge, late Head-Master of the Bradford High School, takes TWELVE PRIVATE PUPILS, Boarders.—Address, Moorlands, Ilkley, Yorkshire. Near in London to GROOMING FOGGO, Esq., Oriental Club, Hanover Square.

ITALIAN LANGUAGE, LITERATURE, and HISTORY.—Almon N. PERINI, whose Pupils obtained all the highest marks in Italian at the last Six Indian Civil Service Examinations, has a few Hours Weekly. Disengaged.—Address, St. John P., 361 Hampstead Road, N.W.

TO THE NOBILITY and GENTRY.—A CLERGYMAN, very successful as an Educator, desires to TRAVEL with a FEW YOUTHS on the Continent or elsewhere, from August 1 to September 15. The French Master of his School for eight years will accompany the party.—For full particulars, apply to the Rev. D. C. L., Stamford, 5 and 7 Claring Cross, London.

ONE who has mixed in distinguished Society, and Travelled extensively in the Far East and West, would accept an Engagement as COMPANION and MENTOR to a Young Gentleman on Foreign Travel.—Apply to G. D., care of Mr. D. Nutt, Foreign Bookeller, 270 Strand, W.C.

TEMPORARY WRITERS in GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.—The Regulations for May may now be obtained on application to the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Cannon Row, S.W. An Examination will be held on Thursday, May 16. Good handwriting is essential.

NOTTINGHAM HIGH SCHOOL.—A MASTERSHIP in the UPPER SCHOOL will be VACANT at Midsummer. Stipend £200 per annum, with permission to take Boarders. Candidates are to apply, in the first instance, to the Head-Master, Rev. ROBERT DIXON, M.A., who will send them a printed Form to be filled up, with full particulars of the Appointment. The Trustees will not receive Applications later than May 11.

EDWIN PATCHITT, Clerk to the Trustees.

BEAUMARIS GRAMMAR SCHOOL.—The HEAD-MASTERSHIP of this school will become VACANT the 5th day of July next. CANDIDATES for the appointment must be graduates of one of the English Universities, or of the University of Dublin. Satisfactory testimonials as to character and attainments will be required.

The present Head-Master receives a fixed salary of £170 a year, is allowed £18 a year towards the Annual Examination of and Prizes for the Scholars, £11 10s. for Quail and Gun. He occupies the School House and Premises free of Rent. Rates and Rectors, he takes upon himself the payment, appointment, and dismissal of all Assistant-Masters and Teachers, and makes his own terms with Boarders.

His successor will hold the office upon the same terms and conditions until any scheme of the Endowed School Commissioners for the administration of the School and Charity shall become law, and after that subject thereto.

Further particulars may be obtained from Mr. J. R. ROBERTS, Solicitor, Beaumaris, to whom Testimonials, with Ten printed Copies, must be sent between this date and the 20th instant.

Beaumaris, May 1, 1872.

SECRETARY.—A GENTLEMAN who has recently held a Public Appointment abroad, desires Employment as SECRETARY to a Nobleman or Gentleman engaged in Public Life. He is conversant with European languages, master of much useful original information, has travelled extensively, and is accomplished in literary pursuits.—Address, CHALAP, at Nutt's Foreign and Classical Library, 270 Strand, W.C.

THE ILFRACOMBE HOTEL stands in its own Grounds of Five Acres, extending to the Beach, and the Private Terraces afford the finest Marine Promenades attached to any Hotel in the Kingdom. The Building contains 160 Apartments. Cuisine excellent. Wines choice.—Address, J. BOHN, Ilfracombe.

BRIGHTON.—BEDFORD HOTEL.—Every endeavour is made to render this Hotel equal to its long-existing repute. Spacious Coffee Room for Ladies and Gentlemen. Sea Water Service in the Hotel.—Communications to The MANARK, Bedford Hotel Company, Limited.

THE BATHS.—THE GRANVILLE HOTEL, St. Lawrence-on-Sea, Isle of Thanet.

HYDROPATHY.—SUDBROOK PARK, Richmond Hill. Physician—Dr. EDWARD LANE, M.A., M.D. Edin. Turkish Baths on the Premises. Private entrance into Richmond Park. Prospectus on application.

THE UNITED LAND COMPANY, Limited.—DWELLINGS for the WORKING and MIDDLE CLASSES.

The Company have now on SALE highly eligible BUILDING SITES in healthy Suburban Localities, with all the advantages of thorough drainage, good roads and footpaths, and rapid communication with Town by rail, river, or omnibus, suitable especially for the Working and Middle Classes, who, in addition to buying the Land at a cheap rate, with payment of the cost by easy instalments, can have advances for building on the plots on liberal terms, from the Conservative Benefit Building Society, co-operating with the United Land Company, Limited. The system has been at work twenty years, and has afforded all classes of the community the opportunity of becoming their own landlords, living on their own freehold. Facilities are also given to those who may wish to buy houses ready for occupation on various parts of the environs of the metropolis, the purchase-money being liquidated by monthly or other payments.

For Prospectuses and Particulars of Land and Houses for Sale, apply by letter or personally, at the Offices of the Land Company and Building Society.

CHARLES LEWIS GRUNEISEN, Secretary.

23 Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN that the Ladysday Half-yearly INTEREST WARRANTS for SHARES and DEPOSITS were duly issued to all Members and Depositors entitled to the same at the usual period, the 1st instant, and that such Warrants are payable at the Office daily between the hours of Ten and Four o'clock, except on Saturdays, and then from Ten to Two.

London, May 8, 1872.

By Order of the Board,

CHARLES LEWIS GRUNEISEN, Secretary.

Prospectuses of the 50th year are now ready and will be sent free of charge and postage upon any part of the world on application to the Secretary. The Interest on Shares remains at the rate of Five per Cent. per annum, payable half-yearly, and on Deposits at Four per Cent., with privilege of prompt withdrawal of either investment.

PALL MALL CLUB (Non-Political).—MEMBERS are hereby informed that the New and much enlarged CLUB-HOUSE in Waterloo Place, Pall Mall, will be OPEN for their reception on Thursday, May 16. A limited number of Candidates will be admitted at the following Fees: Entrance, Five Guineas; Annual Subscription, Three Guineas; Officers on Foreign Service, One Guinea.

The Very Rev. the Dean of Armagh.

Major Brabazon.

Frederick Bury, Esq.

W. Lloyd Birkbeck, Esq.

W. Lloyd Birkbeck, Esq.

The Hon. R. Henley Eden.

The Hon. and Rev. A. B. Hamilton.

Henry Hoare, Esq.

Charles Hunter, Esq.

Henry Allen Mackay, Esq.

Committee.

Arthur Wood, Esq.

Edward Johnston, Esq.

Henry Kimber, Esq.

Rev. Lord F. Grosvenor.

Rev. A. Dargatzis.

Alfred Jones, Esq.

George Jones, Esq.

The Hon. and Rev. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

Rev. J. W. R. Spencer.

TO PROPRIETORS of PUBLICATIONS. A BOND is required of Proprietors of Publications, who are required to send a copy of their Publications to the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Cannon Row, S.W. For full particulars, apply to the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Cannon Row, S.W.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 864, Vol. 33.

May 18, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

GERMANY AND ROME.

IN order to carry out his policy of perfect fairness towards Catholicism while retaining his mastery over the dangerous elements which it contains, Prince BISMARCK thought proper a short time ago to nominate a German Minister at the Papal Court. His choice fell on Cardinal HOHENLOHE, whose chief claim to eminence is that, although a Cardinal, he is not an Ultramontane, and that he opposed, so long as opposition was possible, the new dogma of Papal infallibility. Prince BISMARCK could not but be aware that the appointment would be exceedingly distasteful to the POPE, and to the clique by which the POPE is beset. A Cardinal opposed to the spiritual and temporal policy of the Papal Court, and representing the conquerors of Metz and Sedan, was in the eyes of the POPE's circle the most objectionable sort of person that could have been named. It is usual, in selecting a Minister, to consider the wishes of the Court to which he is to be accredited, and under ordinary circumstances it would be a matter of some reproach to Prince BISMARCK that he had gone out of his way to nominate a man whom the Court with which friendly relations were to be maintained would be sure to regard with jealousy and dislike. It seemed as if, under colour of paying a compliment to the Papal Court, Prince BISMARCK was really getting up a new grievance against it. But he had an object in running this risk, which made him think it worth while to run it. He wanted to show the German Catholics that the Papal Court is not the centre of Catholicism at large, but only of one section of Catholicism. It is one thing to say that the POPE is in the hands of an extreme clique and another thing to prove it. Those Catholics who do not wish to be under the tyranny of the most violent and unscrupulous party in their communion have it now proclaimed to them that the POPE has not ears and a heart open to all Catholics, but that to gain access to him, and to find favour in his eyes, even a Cardinal must be among the blackest of the blacks. Prince BISMARCK, with characteristic sagacity, has refrained from pushing his advantage too far. A motion was made in the Chamber to reduce the salary of the Minister at Rome to that of a Consul-General, as, after the refusal of the POPE to receive Cardinal HOHENLOHE, it would be useless to think of having a German Minister at Rome, and a Consul-General would be all that could be required. But Prince BISMARCK took advantage of this opening to show his good sense and moderation. The refusal to receive a Minister was, he said, a most unusual act; it would be very difficult to find any Minister so suitable as Cardinal HOHENLOHE, and the recent course of events at Rome had gone far to show that it was next to impossible to have any firm and friendly relations with the Roman Curia as at present constituted. But then it was not for a great Power like Germany to show irritation at the unreasonable behaviour of a little Power like Rome. He wished to be forbearing and moderate, to think of what honest, sensible German Catholics wished and needed, and to obtain for them any benefits that may be supposed to flow from Germany having a Minister at the Papal Court. The salary of the Envoy must therefore be kept on foot, and the Government would see if it could not find a person as Minister who, if not so suitable as Cardinal HOHENLOHE, would be more acceptable to the POPE. Prince BISMARCK has thus managed to put himself in the right, to show an amount of patience and good temper which his ecclesiastical enemies may justly envy, and to exhibit the adversaries of Germany at Rome in the light of a set of narrow, incorrigible, perverse fanatics.

But although Prince BISMARCK announced that he was ready to send another Minister to Rome, he made some observations on the position of Catholicism, or rather Ultramontanism, in Germany, which showed how deeply he is possessed by a sense of the danger of a coming conflict between the temporal and spiritual powers. He is preparing his countrymen for the adoption of strong measures if necessary. Nothing, he said, would induce him to accept any arrangement with Rome by which an exceptional position in the eye of the law would be created in favour of the flocks of Roman Catholic priests. He even went further, and threw out a dark suggestion that, to restore peace among the religious denominations, it appeared necessary to seek a solution of existing difficulties by enacting a law for the Empire securing complete liberty of conscience. It is not easy to interpret this enigmatic utterance. If there is any possible law which, if passed, would secure peace among religious denominations, the sooner Germany enacts it and the rest of the world borrows the enactment from Germany the better it will be for mankind. Prince BISMARCK may have explained his meaning more fully than as yet appears, but all that it is safe at present to conclude is that, if he thinks further Imperial legislation will be useful in thwarting the machinations of his clerical enemies, he will not hesitate to have recourse to it. Apparently it will not cause him much trouble to carry in the German Parliament any legislation that he may think necessary. His difficulty will perhaps be the other way, and he may have to exercise his influence to restrain the impetuosity of the German Parliament in its hostility towards Rome. Numerous petitions having been lately presented against the Jesuits, the German Parliament has been this week engaged in considering the dangerous and exciting subject which has recently thrown Switzerland into commotion. It has, after a long debate, decided on urging the Imperial Government to bring in a Bill for the control of religious orders and societies, under the provisions of which, apparently, the Government would be entitled to decide what religious societies shall be tolerated and on what terms, while special power would be given to punish any action, especially on the part of the Jesuits, which might be dangerous to the State. So long as Prince BISMARCK remains at the head of affairs in Germany, and retains the commanding influence he now enjoys, this fervour of German animosity to Rome will probably be kept within the bounds which prudence would suggest. But it is impossible not to see that a day may come when men less sagacious, in a time of greater peril and greater excitement, may use the power of the State against its clerical enemies in a manner which may ultimately give those enemies a not inconsiderable advantage. Germany lies under the painful necessity which has long been pressing on us in England of having to fight illiberal fanatics with the weapons of liberalism. The adversaries of toleration gain strength by the principles of toleration being acted on, and thus the temptation is felt to meet intolerance by intolerance. There is scarcely any measure of repression, or even of mild persecution, from which Germans in their present mood would recoil if they really believed that Rome was seriously endangering the power and unity of Germany. It is very fortunate, therefore, that they are now guided by a statesman who has elevated himself and them above manifesting a petty irritation on account of the rejection of Cardinal HOHENLOHE, and who, if he complies with the request of the Parliament to bring in a Bill for the control of religious societies, will be perfectly alive to the necessity of avoiding even the semblance of persecution.

The friends of the POPE in Italy have lately been making spiritual capital out of the eruption of Vesuvius. The miseries of the sufferers are, they assert, an evident judgment on the sins of a people which endures a Government audacious enough to act as the gilders of the head of the Church. This line of argument is happily foreign to the ideas of Englishmen, who do not believe that Galileans are exceptionally wicked because a tower falls on them. But if reasoning of this kind were to be adopted at all, it would press just now with exceptional severity on the very persons who employ it. The history of Rome since the promulgation of the dogma of infallibility has been one long chronicle of disasters. The edict of the Council was immediately followed by the temporary annihilation of the power of France, and the collapse of the supporters of the Temporal Power was immediately followed by the extinction of the Temporal Power itself. It might have been thought that, as soon as peace came, the tide would turn. But exactly the contrary has happened, and the defeat of Rome is much more conspicuous to-day than at the moment of the capitulation of Paris. France, after long delays, has been forced to send a Minister to the Court of VICTOR EMMANUEL, and even the Conservative and clerical Government of Belgium has felt itself constrained to move in the same path. The absorption by Italy of the Pope's possessions has been condoned even by the Catholic Powers which are the most decidedly Catholic, while such States as Austria and Spain regard it with complete indifference. The Papal Court has managed to set the whole current of German political thought in bitter hostility to it; and it has tried in vain to use the arm of the flesh in Spain, and to awaken the enthusiasm of its supporters by a Carlist insurrection. The priests in Biscay and Aragon who hold the insurgent peasants, who proclaim that Heaven is on their side, and denounce the son of the sacrilegious VICTOR EMMANUEL, are perfectly logical and consistent. They are only doing what all Ultramontanes would be bound to do if they saw an opening. The only thing is that they do not succeed, and their adherents suffer as much as the dwellers round the foot of Vesuvius. Whether the religious movement headed by those who call themselves the Old Catholics will have any serious consequences is at present doubtful. A religious schism or reformation can only succeed where religion has real vitality, or where temporal rulers use the force of the movement for their own profit. But it is exceedingly doubtful whether any large section of the population of Europe cares enough about the matters in dispute to feel any anxiety because it holds a dogma too much or too little; and temporal rulers are not at present in the humour to think that profit can be made out of religious controversies. Still it must be noted as one of the obvious effects of the decision of the Council, that there is now a new set of people on whom the anathemas are to be showered which formerly were exclusively reserved for the enemies of the Temporal Power. But although the Ultramontane party is snarling under the sense of continuous defeats, and cannot dare to give battle to its adversaries on a great scale, it is still strong enough to do much mischief and to give much trouble. If it cannot crush its foes, it can annoy them and bewilder them, and try to provoke them into acts which they will some day regret. This is the treatment which it is now endeavouring to apply to Germany, and it is a policy which, as it forces Prince BISMARCK to apply himself to business at a time when his health imperiously demands repose, may commend itself to the Vatican as not wholly unsuccessful.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY TREATY.

THERE is little use in forming conjectures as to the decision of the Senate of the United States. With their customary candour American journalists, instead of discussing the merits of the question, engage in the more practical inquiry whether the Administration commands the votes of two-thirds of the Senate. Out of seventy-four members the Democrats and the Liberal Republicans number twenty-four; and consequently on a strict party vote two or three Ministerial absentees or dissentients might ensure the rejection of the proposed Supplementary Article. It is impossible for foreigners to judge whether justice, prudence, or love of peace will influence the deliberations of the Senate; nor is it even asserted that the PRESIDENT himself has recommended the adoption of the English proposal. Lord GRANVILLE and Mr. GLADSTONE properly confined themselves to the assumption that, in submitting the Article to the Senate, General GRANT pledged himself to offer no obstacle to the arrangement if it were approved by the Senate; and a telegram from Philadelphia represents the PRESIDENT as simply "desiring the counsel of the Senate." The British Ministry seem in the first instance to have naturally believed that the PRESIDENT had the power of settling the dispute by an exchange of diplomatic notes; and it would appear from Lord GRANVILLE's language that General Grant only declined to act on his own responsibility because he wished to secure the concurrence of the Senate. In ordinary cases the President communicates to the Senate only those international conventions or treaties which he has himself already approved; but the interpretation of the American Constitution rests exclusively with the Government of the United States; and the English SECRETARY OF STATE, when he was informed of the difficulty, must either have abandoned the negotiation or complied with General SCHENCK's latest suggestion. It appears that the Article which had been originally framed as a Note, and which has perhaps not been transmitted by telegraph with literal accuracy, restricts the liability of neutrals to the damages which may be directly caused by their negligence. The formal negation on the part of England of a chimerical doctrine invented by a spiteful American lawyer can scarcely fail to present a ludicrous and humiliating aspect; but as the price of a covert retraction, long refused by the Government of the United States, a slightly absurd supplement to the unfortunate Treaty of Washington may probably be excusable or justifiable. It may be assumed that the suggested truism is intended, like the now-fangled rules of law embodied in the Treaty, to have a retrospective operation; but, unfortunately, the clearest language has not been used, and the sharp practitioners who drew the American Case may possibly contend that the undertaking of the PRESIDENT that "he will make no claim in respect of indirect losses" does not absolutely withdraw these claims from the notice of the Tribunal. One of the most indirect of all possible claims has been admitted by the English Government to fall within the scope of the reference, because it had been adroitly foisted into the Protocol which is believed to explain the purpose of the Treaty. If the Article is added to the Treaty, it will become a curious question whether future neutrals are to be held liable for the expenses of the navy of a belligerent.

Lord GRANVILLE's detailed history of the negotiations acquits the Government of the charge of vacillation on the main point of recognizing the indirect claims. In the course of the narrative Sir ROUNDELL PALMER was introduced in his accustomed character of advisor and sponsor of the Ministry. It was on the recommendation of Sir ROUNDELL PALMER that the law officers were formally consulted, though it appears that the decision of the Government had been formed before their opinions were received. Some days after the necessity of refusing to submit the indirect claims had been pointed out in the press, Sir ROUNDELL PALMER and his colleagues who had prepared the English Case arrived at the same conclusion. On the 8th or 10th of January, Lord GRANVILLE, having read the Case, ascertained that Sir ROUNDELL PALMER's opinion confirmed his own; and before the end of the month the Cabinet had determined on the substance of the Note which was ultimately forwarded at the beginning of February. Lord GRANVILLE, whose share in the delay was fully explained by serious illness, reiterates the declaration that he would have deliberately postponed any remonstrance against the American Case; yet it can scarcely be doubted that the reaction of opinion in the United States would have commenced at an earlier period if the English Government had, immediately on the receipt of the Case, made a preliminary protest against the objectionable claim. For more than a month after the transmission of the Case the American journals were apparently almost unconscious of the monstrous demands which had been in fact inserted in it at the last moment, either by Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS or by his superiors. The rudeness and discourtesy of the entire Case was too thoroughly conformable to American precedents to have occasioned at home the surprise and disapproval which were universally felt in England. As Lord GRANVILLE with vernacular simplicity of phrase observes, the Case was not a specific for the gout of an English Secretary of State; but it probably caused an agreeable excitement to American readers. It is fair to admit that in arduous negotiations occasional error or disputable exercise of judgment is unavoidable. It is open to discussion whether an immediate answer ought to have been returned to the rude and extortionate pretensions of the American Government. It is far more material to receive a positive assurance that the Ministers have from the first never wavered in their determination not to submit the indirect claims to the Arbitrators. It might perhaps have been more judicious to give Parliament the same satisfaction at an earlier period; but even an excessive regard to American susceptibilities was both justifiable and laudable, and Lord GRANVILLE told this House of Lords that General SCHENCK's inadmissible suggestions were generally founded on some intimation which had been given out in the course of debate. Mr. GOSWOLD once orally declared that the whole dispute might have been settled by a payment of five or six millions. Mr. GOSWOLD's statement with just indignation that such a payment would have been disgraceful to a country which had never yet admitted its liability to the smallest amount of compensation; but the next day General SCHENCK came to Lord GRANVILLE with an inquiry whether a smaller amount would not be forthcoming in consideration of a receipt in full. It was undoubtedly prudent not to provide Mr. OSBORNE with additional opportunities of supplying hints to the American Minister.

Lord DERBY and Mr. DISRAELI at once acceded to the legitimate claim of the Government for still further forbearance; and Lord DERBY truly added that Lord GRANVILLE's statement was both explicit and satisfactory. Lord RUSSELL may be pardoned for an irritation which might nevertheless have been more prudently suppressed. It was natural, though perhaps not fully consistent with his dignity, that he should resent the imputations which were long ago thrown upon himself and his colleagues by the American Government of the day. English statesmen have to choose between the avoidance of all diplomatic communication with the United States, and patient endurance of a style and manner which are intended not to conciliate or persuade the Government which is addressed, but to please the American people. Lord RUSSELL is once more made the object of vulgar sneers and coarse vituperation in the discreditable American Case; but he would have done well to console himself with the recollection of his despatches, which contain an unanswered and unanswerable vindication of his conduct. It has seemed good to later Governments to concede many of the points which had been triumphantly maintained in argument by Lord RUSSELL; but, notwithstanding the ex post facto innovations on public law, the Arbitrators at Geneva will, if the reference proceeds, not improbably adopt the conclusions which Lord RUSSELL formerly defended against Mr. ADAMS. It is reported that Mr. CUSHING sneers at the framers of the English Counter Case for supposed admissions of facts of which he might have been unable to adduce formal proof. It is natural that he should fail to understand the desire of Englishmen for an impartial decision on the merits. His contempt for English stolidity will probably be increased by the willingness of the English counsel to waive technical objections; but, after all, it is possible that his clients may be disappointed by the result of a dispassionate application of legal principles. One of the arguments which have been used in America for the adoption of the proposed Article is founded on the hardship of delaying the payments alleged to be due to the Alabama claimants. It is universally believed throughout the United States that the rejection of consequential damages involves an admission of the validity of the direct claims; and great disappointment will ensue if the Arbitrators decide that no liability of any kind has been incurred by the English Government. The amount is of comparatively little importance; but it is not desirable to extend the responsibility of neutrals. The chances are not in favour of an amicable settlement; but the Government has greatly improved its position by the explanations which were given before the recess. It will be unjust to blame the Ministers either for steady adherence to the unanimous determination of the country, or for laborious efforts to prevent the lapse of the Treaty. The miscarriage of last year's negotiations at Washington no longer excites lively interest. If the Senate refuses to repair the mischief which has been caused by negligence or by encroachment, there will be reason to believe that a friendly termination of the dispute was from the first impossible.

THE SESSION UP TO WHITSUNTIDE.

PARTLY by its own fault, in some measure through the tactics of the Opposition, and principally in consequence of the natural tendency of ill-fortune to reproduce itself, the Government has relapsed into the position of weakness which it occupied at the beginning of the Session. Between February and April there had been an apparent recovery of strength, inasmuch as some troublesome questions were disposed of, and as the threatened secession of the Nonconformists had been averted or deferred. The interval between Easter and Whitsuntide has been chiefly occupied with the progress of the Ballot Bill, and, both in divisions on its most important measure and on some other occasions, the Government has for the first time, since its accession to office been compelled to accustom itself to defeat. In no instance has the hostile majority affirmed any important principle, and the professed adversaries of the Government have been compelled to ally themselves with malcontent Liberals; but the Ministers have received ample warning that the hopes of the Opposition are surviving, and that the allegiance of their own followers is shaken. In the House of Lords they have not been more fortunate. Lord KIMBERLEY has succeeded in carrying the main provisions of a Licensing Bill prepared in the Home Office; but the LORD CHANCELLOR's Bill for the constitution of a Supreme Court of Appeal has been rejected under the decorous form of reference to a Select Committee. Lord CAIRNS and Lord WESTBURY made an indiscriminate attack on the theory and details of the Bill, and the CHANCELLOR himself scarcely attempted to answer criticisms which, whether well or ill founded, were, as he must have been aware, certain to prevail. Lord HATHERLEY has not been happy in legislation, and he will probably bequeath to some more energetic successor both the reconstruction of the judicial system and the organization of the Courts of Appeal. No intimation has been given of the intentions of the House of Lords with respect to the Ballot. It is possible that an injudicious pertinacity in rejecting a measure which directly concerns the House of Commons might once more unite the Ministerial party in an agitation against an obstructive Assembly; yet the advocates of a pugnacious policy may not improbably urge on the majority the expediency of resisting a change which seems not to be heartily desired either by the country or by the House of Commons.

Mr. FORSTER has scarcely sustained in the conduct of the Ballot Bill the reputation for successful tact and adroitness which he had acquired in the Education controversy two years ago; but it must be admitted that his task has been complicated, and that he has been exposed to exceptional embarrassment through the unconcealed indifference of his own friends to the measure which they once affected to regard as urgent. In one instance the Government committed an unquestionable error, for it ought either to have anticipated or to have resisted Mr. LEATHAM's motion for enforcing secrecy by a penalty. The provision had been originally included in the Bill of last year; but when the measure was curtailed to avoid further delay in transmission to the House of Lords, the penal clause was abandoned as comparatively unimportant; and in the present year it was either deliberately omitted or forgotten. There is a presumption against penal sanctions to legislation, and it was naturally thought anomalous that a private member should be allowed to create a misdemeanour which had not been contemplated by the Government. Mr. HARCOURT, Mr. BOUVIER, and Sir GEORGE GREY protested against Mr. FORSTER's adoption of Mr. LEATHAM's clause; and the Ministers were beaten in a full House by nearly thirty votes. The opponents of the Ballot naturally swelled the majority; and it was triumphantly announced, with some show of plausibility, that secret voting was after all rendered optional. The genuine supporters of the Ballot, on the other hand, were justified in regarding the vote as inconsistent with the whole principle and policy of the Bill. A secret vote which may be made public at the pleasure of the voter is liable to all the objections which have been urged against the existing system. All the earlier part of the Bill had been framed on the assumption that secrecy was to be enforced; and, if it was really impossible to effect the object by some mechanical contrivance, it was indispensable to consistent legislation that a penalty should be attached to voluntary disclosure at the poll. It is not too much to say that the Government would not have been defeated if the Liberal party had really cared for the Ballot. Since the commencement of the agitation the majority of the House of Commons has deferred to a supposed desire which is either faint or imaginary. A Bill which had met a popular want would have been pressed through its successive stages with far greater ease and rapidity. Of late many days have been devoted to trifling details which suddenly become important in the eyes of antagonists and lukewarm friends. That valuable section of the constituency which is unable to express its preference for a candidate by writing his name has been regarded with exceptional interest and solicitude. If Mr. FORSTER has not earned the gratitude of his friends by his tedious and thankless task, there can be little doubt that none of his colleagues would have been more fortunate.

The most remarkable division of the Session was taken on Sir MASSEY LOPES's motion for the transference of certain charges from the rates to the Consolidated Fund. As a representative of the landowners, Sir MASSEY LOPES will hereafter find that he has achieved a victory more ruinous than defeat. Mr. STANSFELD and Mr. GOSCHEN took occasion to repeat the menaces which Mr. GLADSTONE and some of his colleagues have on former occasions directed against the owners of land; and a powerful section of Sir MASSEY LOPES's clients will be ready to join in an agitation for the relief of occupiers at the expense of landlords. In opposing the immediate proposal the Ministers were hampered by Mr. GOSCHEN's injudicious offer in his Bill of last year to make the ratepayers a present of the House Tax. Sir MASSEY LOPES and his friends ought to have remembered that the same measure included the imposition of a heavy and novel burden on owners; but the temptation of defeating the Government was great; and Conservative members have often shown their inability to look to the future. The pressure of constituents on members produced a formidable secession from the Ministerial ranks; and the motion was carried against the Government by the unprecedented majority of a hundred. A more skilful Parliamentary manager than Mr. GLADSTONE would have found means to evade a damaging division; but probably in another Session he will make the hostile vote a pretext for bringing forward some measure which will be in the highest degree unpalatable to country gentlemen. The immediate effect of the division was more damaging because it occurred only two or three days before the defeat on Mr. LEATHAM's clause. On both occasions the Government may perhaps have been in the right; but a Government with a large majority ought not to be beaten. The general desire of relief from the pressure of local taxation has been caused by the comparative laxity of the House of Commons in sanctioning additional charges on rateable property. It is not the special duty of any State Department to exercise over local taxation the salutary vigilance with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being watches over the public receipts and outgoings. Even after the vote on Sir MASSEY LOPES's motion, the Government has proposed to provide out of local rates the cost of inspecting public-houses. If the Lords had allowed this clause to remain in the Bill, the House of Commons would almost certainly have rejected a proposal which so decidedly infringed the principle of its recent decision.

It had not been expected that Mr. GORDON's vague motion for an instruction to the Committee on the Scotch Education Bill would expose the Ministers to the risk of an additional defeat; but the Opposition had derived courage from the success of previous experiments, and the discipline of the majority is for the time utterly relaxed. Recurring to the injudicious practice of last year, the Government induced their supporters to maintain an obstinate silence, and the Conservatives, on the other hand, naturally exerted themselves to continue a one-sided discussion until the favourable moment for a division arrived. As soon as Mr. FORSTER had at last spoken against the motion, the Opposition found itself strong enough to defeat the Government by a small majority. It is scarcely probable that the House of Commons will allow the Bill to be virtually rejected, and the compromise of 1870 to be set aside; but the House of Lords, which has on a former occasion crippled the Ministerial scheme of education in Scotland, will find an excuse for further interference in the adverse vote of the House of Commons. The chances preponderate against a change of Government during the present year, especially as the more prudent Conservative leaders are anxious to postpone their own accession to office; but the dangers of the Session are not yet over; and Mr. GLADSTONE himself has announced his intention of treating as a test of the confidence of the House of Commons in the Government the vote on Mr. FAWCETT's Irish University Bill. If Mr. FAWCETT succeeds in securing a day for the discussion of his measure, the fate of the Government will depend on the prudent forbearance of the Opposition. A large section of Liberal members will almost certainly support the Bill; and it is promoted by Mr. PLUNKETT and Dr. BALL, in alliance with Mr. FAWCETT. It would be impossible to choose a more dangerous issue for a trial of party strength; but victory and the prospect of office furnish strong temptations to rashness. If Mr. GLADSTONE contemplated resignation he would welcome the occasion of a defeat which would expose his adversaries to an immediate collision with the most powerful party in Ireland, and compel many of them to a compromise of their most cherished opinions. A change of Government, involving a general election in the autumn, would probably cause the rejection or fatal mutilation of the Ballot Bill by the House of Lords, in the hope that publicity of voting would improve the chances of Conservative candidates.

GENERAL CHANZY AND M. GAMBETTA.

THERE is at last a prospect of the rise of a strong Parliamentary party avowedly favourable to M. THIERS's Government. The speech of General CHANZY on taking command of the Left Centre in the Assembly is the best expression of sensible Conservatism that France has seen. It is all the more suited to the existing condition of the country because the views it embodies are not those of a man of strong political convictions. Hitherto the difficulty has been to induce Frenchmen to take any interest in public affairs unless they have been either fanatics or adventurers; either men who cared for nothing but the triumph of a name or a dynasty, or men who thought only of making a large purse for themselves. The Monarchical and the Republican parties are examples of the first kind; the Imperialists are examples of the second. General CHANZY has served no political apprenticeship. He frankly confesses that when he took his seat in the Assembly he thought himself bound to remain aloof from all parties until he had arrived at a conviction. He avows that any body of politicians who had undertaken the work of reorganizing France might have counted on his support. But, except the Republicans, every party wished some one else to play first. Monarchists and Imperialists were alike anxious to let the Republic have the responsibility of making the attempt, and, as they hoped, the discredit of failing in it. As General CHANZY truly says, not one of those who dream of a restoration of the past had the courage to attempt it at the only propitious moment—the moment when the Deputies assembled at Bordeaux were summoned to face the tremendous difficulties which war and revolution had brought upon France. The mere fact that the Republicans were willing to undertake responsibilities from which the partisans of other opinions shrank back gave them a claim on General CHANZY's good will. Even this claim, however, presented itself in a non-political shape. It was not fair, he thought, to put so great a task upon the Republic without letting the Republic reap the reward when the task had been performed. The next step in the progress towards a conviction was easily made. General CHANZY's sense of justice had led him to accept the Republic as the actual Government of France; his sense of public duty taught him the importance of giving the actual Government a decided support. To fail in this would have been to commit the very crime which had disgusted him in the Monarchists and the Imperialists. If the test of patriotism in a party had been readiness to undertake the government under unparalleled difficulties, the test of patriotism in individuals was readiness to co-operate heartily with whatever party came up to this standard. Patriotism is shown by sacrifices, and the sacrifice to which non-Republicans must submit in France is that of their personal preference for another form of government. It is a mark of General CHANZY's practical wisdom that he does not stop to consider whether the Republicans themselves would have made such a sacrifice. Events have not demanded it of them, and events have demanded it of others. Those who can honestly accept an existing Government as the best in the abstract necessarily enjoy this advantage over those who only accept it as the best that can be had. The duty which General CHANZY preaches to the Left Centre is the duty of thinking only of France, of admitting no consideration but the interests of France, of dismissing as unpatriotic those ideas about forms of government which are only a cause of division and weakness.

This is precisely the doctrine which M. THIERS has maintained from the moment when he took office. It is the essence of the Bordeaux Compact. The first want of France after the conclusion of peace was a Government; her second want is a strong Government. Chance gave her the former in the shape of the Republic, but only the disinterested devotion of Frenchmen of all parties can give her the latter. It is true that those who have hitherto opposed the Republic are not committed by their present acceptance of it to any opinion as to its ultimate fitness for France. But they are pledged to make it capable of fulfilling all the objects for which Government exists, and in so far as they are pledged to do this they are pledged to strengthen it by all the means in their power. A weak Government is as bad as no Government. When the non-Republicans acquiesced in a Republic as under present circumstances the only possible Government for France, they acquiesced in its gaining whatever advantages are to be derived from this character. Until now, however, this policy has had no distinct representation in the Assembly. The Left Centre has acted with more or less of consistency in this spirit, but it has not put out any definite programme, or claimed to support

M. THIERS in any sense beyond that in which the whole Chamber, with the exception of the extreme Left, may be said to support him. General CHANZY's speech will be an intimation to the country that Conservative Republicanism has now a Parliamentary, as well as an administrative, organisation. Hitherto no portion of the Conservative strength of the Assembly has been formally arrayed on the side of the Government. M. THIERS has been fighting the battle of the Conservative majority with no real help from the Deputies who compose it. The country has learnt in consequence to look to the Executive rather than to the Legislature for the help and guidance of which it stands so much in want. The Assembly is distrusted because it is believed to be more occupied with the future interests of this or that party than with the present interests of France. It is exceedingly unfortunate that this should be the case, because it seems to bear out the description of free representative bodies which has so often been given by the Bonapartists. The impotence and selfishness of Assemblies has again and again been compared with the disinterested strength of the Executive. If France is ever to escape from the slough of alternate anarchy and despotism, the first lesson she must learn is to look to Parliamentary government as the rope by means of which she is to draw herself up to firm ground. Anything that indisposes Frenchmen to regard Parliamentary government in this aspect delays indefinitely the political consolidation of the country. The line which the Left Centre is likely to take under General CHANZY's influence promises to present to Frenchmen the novel spectacle of an independent Parliamentary party giving an honest support to the Government, not merely because it happens to fall in with some political theory of their own, but because it furnishes the best attainable security for the maintenance of order and liberty. As yet Conservative Republicanism has been a growing creed in the country, but not in the Assembly. General CHANZY's speech gives it a standpoint in the Assembly itself.

M. GAMBETTA has been making a speech as well as General CHANZY, and it is worthy of notice that the two public men who were identified with the most energetic and sustained effort that France made in the late war should both be counselling moderation and resignation to the course of events. The moral of General CHANZY's sermon is acquiescence in the Republic. The moral of M. GAMBETTA's speech is acquiescence in the dismemberment of France. The difference between the two is that General CHANZY's acquiescence is unqualified, while M. GAMBETTA's is qualified. If the Republic can give France what she really wants, why should she look forward to any further changes in the future? When she has secured the substance, there will be no need to trouble herself about the form. This is how General CHANZY looks at the future. M. GAMBETTA is equally decided in his counsel of present resignation, but it is resignation "with a view to action." Excitement and enthusiasm are out of place, he says, in a country where so much hard work has to be done. The reconstruction of France is too great an undertaking to be set about except with calmness and deliberation. The people of Alsace and Lorraine must not expect France to make any immediate effort on their behalf. They must be content with knowing that every fresh step that France takes towards the recovery of her former greatness is a step towards the attainment of a "material and moral position in which there is no need even to draw the sword, in which the claims of right are duly satisfied because it is known that behind that right there is strength." This is precisely the lecture that a Piedmontese statesman might have read to the people of Venetia in former years. We can only help you, he might have said, by helping ourselves. The stronger Piedmont becomes, the harder it will be for Austria to resist the attraction which draws you to us. M. GAMBETTA's language has no more promise for the ultimate peace of Europe than the language of wilder preachers; for where a Power like Germany is concerned it is not easy to get a claim satisfied without drawing the sword. But it has at least the advantage that it reminds Frenchmen that the road to regaining the lost provinces lies through something else than military training. National greatness, if it is to impress beholders in the way of which M. GAMBETTA speaks, is a composite idea. It includes moral, scientific, and financial eminence, and the pursuit of it may fairly be expected to have some further and better result than the construction of an enormous army.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY AT CANTERBURY.

THERE has been what the Standard terms "a splendid political demonstration" at Canterbury this week, and Mr. GATHORNE HARDY has made a great speech. He and his audience were in high spirits, and the dinner no doubt deserved to be pronounced a great success. It is an excellent time for Conservatives just now to meet together and cheer each other in this way. They can abuse the Ministry to their hearts' content, can swear that Mr. GLADSTONE is a bewildered Republican, and point to the triumph of the Conservative reaction. Recent elections have gone largely in their favour, and they have good reason for believing that they would win a considerable number of seats if there were a dissolution this year. They have all the pleasure of present success and of confidence in the future, without any of the trouble of government, or of having to encounter serious annoyances or defeats. They have the delightful task of resolutely maintaining on the highest principles, and in the noblest way, what no politician of the slightest importance seriously thinks of attacking. They uphold the Established Church, the Monarchy, and the House of Lords, and may congratulate themselves on discovering that not one of the three has any conspicuous or dangerous assailant. They gain immensely by being out of office, and they justly claim all the privileges of irresponsibility. The Ministry have blundered, and they have not blundered. This is their great stronghold of influence on the country. Those who think with pain of the COLLIER scandal, of the aggravated Income-tax, and of the miscarriages of the Admiralty, can console themselves with the fond hope that, if another set of men were in office, things might possibly be better managed, and the Conservatives are the only other set of men who could come in. Public opinion is therefore for the moment on their side, and they are quite right to make hay while the sun shines. They have not the odious task of bringing in Bills, and those who dislike the Bills of the Government are therefore inclined to range themselves on their side. Beer, almighty beer, has pronounced in their favour, because it was not their miserable lot to have to introduce a Licensing Bill. The Conservative peers have done enough, without exactly throwing over Lord KIMBERLEY's Bill, to show the publicans that their surest allies sit on the Opposition benches. Special agencies, therefore, operate in favour of the Conservatives, and the sphere of English politics is now in such a state of serenity that the country at large would view with indifference, and possibly with approval, the advent of a Conservative Ministry to office. All that England asks just now is a little repose, and a fair amount of good government. But there is no particular reason to suppose that the Conservatives would govern well, except that the Liberals have lately governed badly. If we did not know what has happened, we might have imagined the present Ministry to be capable of supplying an abler set of administrators than the Conservative party could do. There is a most serious deficiency of conspicuous unquestionable ability on the Conservative front benches of the House of Commons. The Opposition is strong enough in the Lords, but it is very weak in the Commons. After full account has been taken of the eccentric genius and perverse ingenuity of Mr. DISRAELI, and after it has been said that Mr. GATHORNE HARDY would make a better Home Secretary than Mr. BRUCE, and that Sir JOHN KANSLAKE makes an efficient Attorney-General, there is little more to be said about the Conservative candidates for office in the House of Commons. Evidently it is the true policy of the Conservatives to magnify the blunders of the Government, and to assume generally an air of conscious superiority to such blunders, without any dangerous descent into particulars. The true basis of the appeal of the Conservatives to the country is to maintain that the present administration of affairs is execrable, and that if the Opposition came into office, there is no saying what great and good results might not be attained.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, however, thought it incumbent on him to move out of this safe region of cheerful obscurity, and to draw one more sketch of the Conservative programme. As might be expected, he imitated his leader at Manchester, and took care in saying much to say nothing. He did indeed seem occasionally to be meaning to say great things, but it is difficult to believe that he can have meant what he said. He deplored the policy of the Government with regard to the Irish Church and the Irish land, and he boldly announced that the time was coming when this policy would be reversed. On even Canterbury Conservatives, assisting at a splendid political demonstration, believe that this was the serious statement of a responsible practical politician? In quiet moments every one of every party is aware that it would be as easy to restore Protection in England as to re-establish the Irish Church, or to alter for the worse the position of Irish tenants. Even with regard to Irish Education, the Opposition would not be in the least in a better position than the present Government, and when Mr. HARDY denounces all concession to the Ultramontanes it is difficult, even in an age when political events are so quickly forgotten, not to remember that four years ago he belonged to a Cabinet which proclaimed itself the advocate of the great policy of levelling up. As to English education, Mr. HARDY cheerfully acknowledged the great services rendered to the cause of Conservatism by Mr. FORSTER, but hinted that the Church ought to get better terms than she had got under the present Act. It is easy to hold this as a speculative opinion, but it is equally easy to imagine the storm that would be raised if Mr. HARDY were in office, and really endeavoured to upset the compromise which Mr. FORSTER accepted. The Conservatives can only be definite when they can refer to particular measures not yet carried to which they can offer a successful opposition. Mr. DISRAELI gave the watchword at Manchester, and Mr. HARDY, obeying it, implored his supporters to come out in all their strength as the firm, unhesitating adversaries of the Burials Bill. As Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN, with great difficulty, and with the very lukewarm support of the Government, just manages to carry a single clause of his Bill through Committee in a Session, it certainly seems an uncommonly small point for a great party to rally round when they are asked to appear in all their glory as the opponents of a Bill which has not got into the stage of practical legislation. But there is a Bill, it may be remembered, which has engaged the attention of the House of Commons during almost the entire Session, and which the Conservative leaders pronounce to be a dangerous and detestable Bill. When something really was to be said, Mr. HARDY was totally silent, and not a word escaped him to animate his hearers in their opposition to the Ballot Bill. There is no secret about the reason of this silence. Many Conservatives think that the Ballot will help them at the next election. But this is a very poor reason to sway the counsels of those who, like Mr. HARDY, profess to live and die in defence of the Constitution. It would have been open to the Conservative leaders to treat the Ballot as a matter of indifference; but no one could use stronger language than Mr. DISRAELI in denouncing it as involving a constitutional change of the most lamentable description. It is only because it may possibly give a temporary party triumph that its pernicious consequences are buried in oblivion. The Conservatives vow that open voting is their birthright, and then they are ready to hold their tongues and sell it for the chance of a mess of pottage. It would appear that it is no use asking their leaders for a programme. They have none, or if they have one, they keep it to themselves. They seem to think that it is their true mission to use vague phrases, to keep on the watch, to make the most of little things, and to use beer and the Ballot and the hopes of a sanguine public as the means of attaining some day a working majority.

If such a majority could be attained, the Conservatives would now take office without any prejudice against them. The country would be anxious to give them a fair chance. No one out of small cliques of extreme men thinks that the present is a time for great organic changes, and as all enthusiasm for the present Government has died away, the mere fact that another Government came in would make that Government for a time popular. But of all people that would gain by a change of Government the present Ministry would gain most. Mr. GLADSTONE is now discomfited, and has got into many foolish scrapes, and he has little control over his own party or over the House of Commons; but it would be entirely his own fault if, as leader of the Opposition, he did not regain spirits and prestige and the confidence of his party. His errors as a Minister are exactly the errors that would be forgotten if he were out of office, while his successes are of the sort that are easily remembered. It is not in the ordinary course of business that he has made his worst mistakes. It is when he has gone out of his way to blunder that he has blundered worst. As a leader of Opposition he would be most formidable; for if he chooses he can grapple with the details of a measure, he can criticize and can expose the shortcomings of opponents, in a manner that is unequalled in the House of Commons. The Conservatives are naturally and justly fond of recalling the triumph of Sir Robert Peel in 1841, and of arguing that a strong Conservative Ministry must, by the operation of a subtle historical law, be formed within a certain time after the passing of a Reform

Bill. It is quite true that after a time of political excitement comes a time of political repose; and at such a crisis the turn of a Conservative Ministry comes almost as a matter of course. But how can there be a Peel Ministry without a Sir Robert Peel? In 1841 Sir Robert Peel was generally recognized as the ablest, soundest, strongest man in the country; and he had Lord John Russell as his principal opponent. There is no kind of real resemblance between such a state of things and that which would be occupied by any Conservative Government that could be formed now with Mr. Gladstone as the leader of the Opposition. Mr. HARDY seems in a measure conscious of this, and he hinted that he should be very glad to see a Coalition Ministry formed out of the Conservative leaders and the more moderate Liberals. That such a coalition may at some unknown and distant day be possible, can neither be asserted with confidence nor denied. Anything may happen some day, but such a coalition is quite out of the range of present politics. There is not a colleague of Mr. Gladstone who would not follow him faithfully in Opposition, and no sensible Conservative can fail to be alive to the extreme difficulty which a Conservative Government would have in carrying on business in the House of Commons with most of the present Ministry on the Opposition benches there, while almost the whole strength of the Conservatives was in the Lords. Splendid political demonstrations cannot mend matters in this respect. Divided as the Liberal party may be, and bad as the mistakes of the Government may have been, there does not seem at present much prospect of a stable Conservative Government being formed. It is sometimes useful to consider in detail what is meant when it is said at Conservative banquets that the hour of triumph is at hand. In order to get a working majority in the House of Commons, the Conservatives must win seventy seats, and they must win them for the most part in England, for there is no great chance of any considerable change in Scotland or Ireland. It is very doubtful whether beer and the Ballot, and the undeniable wish for political quiet, and the unpopularity of the present Government, will do anything like enough to win sixty or seventy English seats for the Conservatives. Even if they did, there would still be in the House of Commons a weak Ministry and a strong Opposition. The moral is that the present is a happy time for Conservatives. They can now be really at their ease, and can enjoy themselves with credit and confidence. They have the Government very much in their power, and are able to exercise an important influence on the course of legislation. If they go on nearer to the goal which they profess to be aiming at, they may only realize how vain are human wishes, and may look back with fond regret to the time when they met at Canterbury and everything seemed so bright before them.

RAILWAY AMALGAMATION.

THE great schemes of railway amalgamation are shelved for the present year by the length of the inquiry before the Joint Committee. Time and trouble would have been saved by referring all the projects to the ordinary tribunals, which would have heard the facts and arguments as they were presented by interested parties on both sides. In almost all practical controversies litigation is the most effective mode of ascertaining the truth. The members of the Joint Committee have probably collected and tested evidence with ability and vigour; but their cross-examination must, in default of special information, have been in a great degree conducted at random. Advocates who know their business never ask a question unless they are able approximately to anticipate the answer; while curious and disinterested inquirers are liable to be baffled by unexpected statements and theories. If the expediency of amalgamation were capable of being definitely affirmed or decided, the Joint Committee might perhaps be able to guide the judgment of Parliament; but some amalgamations are beneficial, while some are pernicious, and the conditions which may be advantageously and equitably imposed on Companies seeking amalgamation vary with every separate case. Some of the Companies which are now seeking for amalgamation, and consequently depending before the Joint Committee the utility of amalgamation, are simultaneously promoting aggressive projects for the purchase of their neighbours for the purpose of obtaining a monopoly of existing traffic, and on the pretext that rivalry is burdensome to passengers and freighters. It is possible that on such cases their contention may be justified by circumstances, but it would be difficult to deduce all their conclusions from a con-

mon principle. The various combinations of alliance and hostility in which the principal Companies are from time to time engaged are not a little perplexing to all but the most experienced students. If France were to form alliances at the same time with Germany for the liberation of Poland, and with Russia for the recovery of Alsace, while Italy invoked the protection of Germany against a French invasion of Rome, and joined with France in a campaign for the protection of Turkey, European diplomacy would on a great scale reproduce the complications of railway policy. The Great Northern, the Sheffield, and the Midland have advanced together into the heart of the North-Western territory at Liverpool, while the North-Western is allied with the Great Northern in a bold incursion into the Midland province of Derbyshire. The North British will probably ally itself with the hostile Caledonian against the amalgamation of the Midland with the Glasgow and South-Western, while both North British and Glasgow and South-Western are engaged in a separate contest with the allied forces of the North-Western and the Caledonian. For all these relations of friendship and enmity there are sufficient reasons; but it would be difficult to refer them to general maxims or comprehensive propositions. In almost all cases it will be found that one or both parties represent important public interests.

The Manchester Chamber of Commerce lately renewed the discussion on railway amalgamation, and on the question whether railways ought to be appropriated by the State. The President of the Chamber, Mr. HUGH MASON, who warmly supported the amalgamation of the North Western with the Lancashire and Yorkshire, was assured by Sir EDWARD WATKIN that the facts and statistics on which he had relied were entirely erroneous. A motion in favour of amalgamation tempered by competition was considered to be unduly definite; and at last the Chamber pledged itself almost unanimously to a resolution which may be commended as a precedent to the attention of the Joint Committee of Lords and Commons:—"This Chamber, while expressing no opinion on the subject of amalgamation of railways, is of opinion that it is essentially necessary to preserve the principle of competition, which has done so much for the general interests of the country." If general propositions are, like first causes, for the most part barren, Chambers of Commerce and other bodies prove their good sense by using indefinite language to express unsettled opinions. Of all the speakers at Manchester Sir E. WATKIN was most intimately acquainted with the subject; but it must have been difficult to ascertain the exact limits of the competition which he ably recommended. When ladies propound comprehensive aphorisms on the ethics of social and domestic life, their friends generally find it easy to translate their abstract doctrines into comments on the character of members of the same circle or household. In the same manner the sentiments of a railway Chairman may for the most part be interpreted with reference to the condition and connexions of his own system. The amalgamation of the three Companies in the South-east of England was a few years since almost completed under the auspices of Sir EDWARD WATKIN. The amalgamation of the North-Western with the Lancashire and Yorkshire could scarcely recommend itself to the approval of the Chairman of the Sheffield Company, who may nevertheless be perfectly sincere in holding that his conclusions coincide with a sound judgment of the public interest. When the women in the tent of ACHILLES were lamenting in concert with BRISEIS, they all bewailed the fate of PATROCLUS; but the poet records the fact that each was weeping for her own private sorrows. Sir E. WATKIN with judicious caution confines his objection to special projects of amalgamation. The relations of the Sheffield line, which owes to his exertions its present comparative prosperity, with some of the neighbouring systems, is analogous to the position of the Lancashire and Yorkshire with reference to the North-Western. Sheffield amalgamations have often been projected and reported; and it is not improbable that, sooner or later, some alliance of the kind may be formed or proposed. Whether a reduced number of great Companies would carry on the most effective competition is a question difficult to solve.

The economists of Manchester, in common with the most authoritative witnesses who have appeared before the Joint Committee, unanimously disapprove of the proposal for the acquisition of railways by the State. Mr. GLANVILLE caused some surprise by the expression of a similar opinion at the late dinner of the Institute of Civil Engineers. It is highly probable that at some future time the railways will become the property of the Government; but it is desirable to postpone this transfer, at least during the present generation. It is certain that the State would have been unwilling and unable to create the railways which have, under the impulse of private enterprise, covered the surface of the country, and that it would never even have attempted to provide the liberal accommodation which offers so marked a contrast with the scanty provisions of Continental railways. If it were certain that the limits of improvement had been reached, it is possible that a State Department might succeed in maintaining the actual character of efficiency; but from the date of the transfer there would be no increase in the number or speed of trains, and mechanical innovations would be thenceforth practically discouraged. The Railway Companies have their faults, and they display occasional perversity in refusing to connect their reciprocal arrangements where they border on neighbouring systems; but on the whole their management is incomparably better than the administration of the army or the navy, and almost any Board-room would contrast advantageously with the Board of Trade. Railway managers earn and deserve the salaries of Cabinet Ministers, and there is no reason why they should become more efficient if they were entitled to go to Court in official uniforms. The proposal that the Government, after annexing the railways, should let them out to Companies undertaking to work them, involves a confession that State management would be either mischievous or impracticable. To the vast mass of moderate and small capitalists the loss of a convenient opportunity of investment would be a serious evil. To purchasers of preference and debenture stock a State guarantee would be unacceptable if it involved a diminution of actual income; and yet it could scarcely be for the benefit of the State to increase by the use of its credit the saleable value of stock, unless it secured a reduction of the rate of interest. The large class of capitalists which prefers an elastic investment would object to commutation into a stock with a fixed dividend; and one result of the transfer would be to drive a large amount of capital into foreign loans and miscellaneous enterprises. It may be admitted that the interests of shareholders ought, on payment of just compensation, to yield to a great public advantage; but for the present official administration would probably have a retrograde tendency. The whole aspect of the question will be changed when the great Companies have attained the maximum dividend which was fixed by Act of Parliament a quarter of a century ago. When they are once assured of a permanent income of ten per cent. on the nominal value of their stock, railway shareholders, like gas proprietors, will sink into the position of mortgagees or annuitants, with no further motive for improving their property. It is probable that in anticipation of such a result many Companies will, in spite of the hackneyed counsels of theoretical advisers, take measures for increasing their capital accounts; but in some cases, sooner or later, the limit will be attained. From Companies which have become incumbrancers on their undertakings the State will have a strong motive for reclaiming the railways with their future increase of profits. It is to be hoped that before that time a standard of speed and comfort will have been established which will impose itself on Government functionaries as indispensable.

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD.

THE First Report of the Local Government Board contains some useful information with regard to the measures taken by the Home Office under the 49th section of the Sanitary Act of 1866. By this section the Secretary of State is empowered, whenever complaint has been made that the local authorities have made default in providing their districts with sufficient sewers or with a proper supply of water, to inquire into the alleged default, and, if satisfied that it has been made, to make an order limiting a time within which the work must be done by the local authorities, and in the event of this order being disobeyed to appoint some person to do the work in the place, and at the expense, of the defaulting authorities. The 74th section of the Public Health Bill gives a similar power to the Local Government Board, and the experience of the Home Office, as recorded in this Report, will give some indication as to the degree in which it is safe to rely on such a provision as a means of making the local sanitary authorities do their duty. The first case in which the 49th section of the Sanitary Act was called into play was that of Wetheringsett, in Suffolk. In the autumn of 1866 fever was very prevalent in the parish, but at two successive meetings the Vestry—that is, the ratepayers assembled in Vestry, who are the sewer subscribers under the present law—refused to appoint a Committee to remedy the nuisance to which the fever was traceable. A memorial praying for an inquiry was then presented to the Home Office, the signatures to which represented nearly two-thirds of the rateable value of the parish. The Inspector reported that the fever was mainly due to impure water and defective drainage, and on his recommendation the Vestry was ordered to execute the works required to abate these nuisances. This Report is dated the 14th of January, 1867. On the 21st of February, 1868, the Inspector again visited Wetheringsett. He found that the Vestry had done nothing to remedy the evils complained of, and that if left to themselves they were not likely to do anything. In April 1868 a peremptory order was issued, ordering the works to be executed according to the recommendation of a local engineer within four months from that time. In September 1868 it appeared that the Vestry was still obstinate, and the SECRETARY OF STATE appointed the engineer in question to be the Sewer authority, for the purpose of carrying out the works. Money was borrowed for the purpose under the sanction of the Home Office, and as the Vestry in November 1869 resolved unanimously that a rate should be levied to repay the loan, it may be supposed that they were by that time convinced that health is better than disease. In the case of Brentwood complaint was first made in January 1867, but, owing to legal difficulties as to raising money, the peremptory order was not issued till October 1870. The Vestry took no notice of it, and in December 1870 an engineer was appointed to carry out the necessary improvements. The difficulty in this case is that the works have to be maintained now that they are made, and if the Vestry refuses to undertake this duty, the Local Government Board, which has succeeded to the functions of the Home Office in sanitary matters, will have not only to assess and levy the rate for the maintenance of the works, but to appoint and pay the persons required to look after them. These are instances of sanitary ignorance in rural parishes. The case of Sudbury shows that a borough can be just as stolidly obstructive as any country village. At the end of 1867 a number of ratepayers prayed for an inquiry into the alleged scantiness and impurity of the water supply. The Town Council "strenuously resisted" inquiry as "unnecessary," but when the drinking water of the town came to be analysed it was found to be polluted by "contact with large quantities of decaying animal matter." For more than a year the Home Office went on urging the Town Council to act upon this information, and at length, on the last day of 1869, Mr. BRUCE made a peremptory order that the work should be begun within six weeks. The Town Council met this by a resolution refusing to act, and an engineer was accordingly appointed to do the work in their stead. While the works were in progress an offer was made to the Town Council to take them over and complete them, a proceeding which would have enabled the necessary money to be borrowed at the market rate, and for thirty years, instead of at five per cent. and for twenty years, which are the only terms on which the Local Government Board can ordinarily borrow. The Town Council refused this offer, and thus saddled the ratepayers with an additional burden. The case of Barnard Castle shows a Local Board of Health playing a similar part. The water supply of the town is deficient, and the Board of Health wanted to improve it by substituting the old system of house cisterns and intermittent supply for the system of constant supply, which they maintained only encouraged waste. The Home Office insisted on the construction of a storage reservoir, and, "after much correspondence, and against the vehement and repeated protests of the Local Board," an engineer was appointed to carry out the latter scheme. In the case of Epping the action of the Home Office was additionally impeded "by every hindrance that legal ingenuity could raise," ending in a trial in the Queen's Bench.

These cases seem to show that the existing law is competent to deal with local obstinacy, but that it necessarily does so in a way which intensifies that obstinacy even while overcoming it. It becomes a point of honour with the local authority not to be beaten until it can resist no longer. The correspondence with the Local Government Board assumes incessantly the character of a lawsuit, and at length the local authority would rather spend money in resisting the orders of the Board than save money by obeying them. It is essential that the power of doing the work where the local authority makes default should be possessed by the central office; but it is also desirable that the latter should have the power of using milder means in all cases where it seems likely that they would be more efficacious. The Public Health Bill proposes three alternative methods of dealing with defaulting local authorities. The Local Government Board may proceed in the way in which the Home Secretary has been accustomed to proceed. Or, after having issued their peremptory order, they may have it removed into the Court of Queen's Bench, with a view to its being enforced in the same manner as if it were a rule of Court. Before the introduction of the Public Health Bill, Mr. TOM TAYLOR had pointed out that this expedient would have the advantage of compelling the local authority "to discharge its duty instead of transferring that duty to others who cannot discharge it as economically or effectually, and who ought not, in the interest of good government, to be charged with it at all if it can possibly be enforced on the authority properly and primarily chargeable with it." The Local Government Board are further empowered, instead of themselves undertaking the necessary works, to delegate to any body of persons locally interested in remedying the default all or any of the powers of the defaulting authority. Probably this will be found the most efficacious way of bringing the defaulting authority to its senses, as well as the most efficacious way of doing its work if it remain obstinately impenitent. The local authority will know that the only result of its refusal to obey the order of the Board will be its own deposition in favour of some of that obnoxious minority of ratepayers against which, even more than against the central authority, it has all along been contending. The alternatives between which it has to choose will no longer be doing the work itself, and taking the chance of the Secretary of State thinking it important enough to do it; there will be a third, the sitting by without power to act, while its neighbours—the very neighbours to whose unreasonable complaints all the excitement is owing—levy and expend the rates. This last possibility will have a new and sharper sting in it. When the central authority takes the duties of the local authority upon itself, the latter can at all events play the part of a martyr in the cause of local self-government. But when the duties of the local authority are simply transferred to a new local authority, the fact that the new officials are the nominees of the Local Government Board will soon be forgotten. The effect on the minds of the ratepayers will be very much the same as if there had been a fresh election and the sanitary reform party had been victorious. There is another expedient simpler than either of these, yet perhaps not less efficacious, which is not included in the Public Health Bill. It is probable that it was only omitted by an oversight, and if so it is an oversight that ought certainly to be amended in Committee. All the expedients which have been enumerated go upon the assumption that the ratepayers will be sure to support the action of their defaulting representatives. In some cases, no doubt, this theory will be borne out by facts. But in others, where, for example, the actual authorities have been chosen by a small majority, or where the more cautious members of the dominant party are afraid of seeing the district saddled with additional burdens by undue persistence, the sanitary authorities might not be able to secure their re-election, supposing they had at once to present themselves before their constituents. To reap the benefit of this change of temper on the part of the ratepayers, it is necessary that the latter should have the opportunity of giving their votes with a clear consciousness of the issue that depends on them. A clause empowering the Local Government Board, at its discretion, to dissolve any Board of Guardians that may be in default, and to order a new election, would give the central authority the power of taking advantage of such a lucid interval on the part of the ratepayers, while it would leave them the power of resorting to stronger remedies whenever this mild one had been tried and found wanting.

THE CLAIMANT ON THE STUMP.

THERE is perhaps no reason to be surprised that the TITCHBORNE Claimant has resolved to appeal from the Courts to the country, though it may be doubted whether the country, under the circumstances, can do much to help him. If the tribunals had been dissolved, as Parliament sometimes is, an appeal of this kind might have been natural and necessary; but the principle of universal suffrage has not yet been introduced into the administration of justice, nor has the jurisdiction of the courts of law been temporarily suspended. It is probable that persons in the Claimant's position would prefer, if they could, to throw themselves on the great heart of the People, and to get rid of the tedious formalities of a legal judicial inquiry. If cross-examination had been unknown to English law, the evidence which was produced in support of the Claimant would no doubt have been highly effective; but its value was destroyed when it was shown in what manner it had been got up. The TICHBORNE case appears to have become a minor political question, and there can be no doubt as to the nature of the feelings or passions to which an appeal is now being made. The Claimant, led, or attended, by his friend and backer, Mr. GUILDFORD ONSLOW, has already begun to stump the country as an innocent victim of aristocratic oppression; and even if he should not escape a conviction for perjury, he may possibly win the affections of some popular constituency. On Tuesday he made a public entry into Alresford after the fashion of a candidate at election time, in a carriage and four, with a band of music, a shouting mob, and a great display of silken favours. It had been arranged that a number of men with ropes should meet him outside the town, where they unharnessed the horses and dragged the coach in triumph to the "Swan Inn"; and there he and Mr. ONSLOW delivered speeches. It is stated that at the "villas" and houses of well-to-do people in the neighbourhood "ladies appeared in the windows or at the gates and waved handkerchiefs" in honour of the man who had traduced in the most cruel and infamous manner the lady whom he claimed as his cousin. He was also loudly cheered by the crowd at the "Swan," and there was an eager competition to have the honour of shaking hands with him. Whether the Claimant is or is not Sir ROGER, he is, on his own showing, not exactly the sort of person to inspire personal admiration and regard. It is suggested by the Correspondent of one of the papers that a liberal distribution of beer and tips was used in order to stimulate the demonstration; but it is certain that there are not a few people—and no doubt there are some in Alresford as well as elsewhere—who cherish a sneaking sympathy for the Claimant, for reasons which they would probably have some difficulty, and might not take much pleasure, in closely analysing. The question of his identity is one, of course, which has nothing whatever to do with his moral character; but it might be supposed that what is known of him would lead people who respect themselves to desire that they should be associated with him as little as possible. It is not convenient that a question which is before the Courts should be made a matter of public controversy; but as the Claimant has challenged public opinion in this instance, he will have no reason to complain if the response should prove to be less favourable than he anticipated. He will probably have no difficulty in attracting audiences at Bristol, Birmingham, and the other places which he intends to visit—Wapping, by the way, does not appear in the list—and he may also succeed in collecting a considerable amount of subscriptions. There is no reason to suppose that the Infant will start on an opposition tour; but the gross misrepresentations and reckless calumnies of the Claimant and his backers can hardly fail to provoke an angry controversy; and it may be remarked that the first contradiction has come from his own solicitors in the recent suit.

When Mr. GUILDFORD ONSLOW, in his address to the crowd in the inn-yard at Alresford, endeavoured to excite compassion for the Claimant by stating that he had been shut up in Newgate without having been convicted, he must have been aware that this is what happens to every accused person. Moreover, the Claimant is practically very much in the position of a man who has been tried and convicted, but who is to have a chance of proving his innocence at a second trial. It is ridiculous to suppose that such an inquiry as that which occupied the Court of Common Pleas for the best part of a year can be quietly ignored as if it had never taken place. The jury in this suit were not required to deliver a verdict, but they took care to intimate in the most unmistakable manner what would have been their verdict if it had been called for; and had the trial been a criminal instead of a civil one, the Claimant's fate would no doubt have been settled at once. Mr. ONSLOW thinks it very hard that the jury should have been led away by the long speech of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, and asserts that he has every reason to believe that they would have been led the other way if they had only had the opportunity of hearing the reply which Mr. SERJEANT BALLANTINE would have made. It is clear that Mr. SERJEANT BALLANTINE did not think so, for there was nothing to prevent his making a speech in reply except his own conviction that it would be a mere waste of time. There is no getting over the fact that at the time when the trial was brought to a close the Claimant's counsel found themselves unable to produce any new evidence or arguments to shake the opinion which the jury had formed on the case already submitted to them. It is possible that when the Claimant next appears in Court his counsel may be in a better position to defend him; but for the present the public have nothing to go by except the past trial, and they are entitled to regard him as an impostor until he proves that he is not one. He had five years to get up his case, with plenty of money at command, and with the aid of acuts, swallows, and some of them not very scrupulous, agents. He had the advantage of whatever information he was able to extract from the Dowager, from BOGLE, CARTER, and others, and from such letters and papers of ROGER's as came into his possession. He had a patient hearing when at last the matter came on for trial; and the jury expressed the opinion that, apart altogether from the tattooing, his case had utterly broken down. Mr. ONSLOW observed, and the Claimant repeated the observation as if he thought it was a good one, that an impostor would hardly have ventured on his arrival in this country to go down to Alresford, where so many people were well acquainted with the real ROGER. But, in point of fact, the Claimant's first visit to Alresford was just such as an impostor would be most likely to make—in disguise, under an assumed name, prowling furtively round Tichborne Park, picking up information about it and its owners, and studying a catalogue of the pictures in the family mansion. It must also be remembered that Tichborne Park was then inhabited by a gentleman who had never seen ROGER; that the Claimant locked himself in his room when BOWKER tried to see him; and that it was not until he had felt his way, and had satisfied himself of the willingness of some of the people to identify him as the real man, that he showed himself boldly. He knew from the Dowager's letters that she was willing to receive him, and they were indeed such as to encourage him in the idea that, for purposes of her own, she would swear to him, whoever he was; but it is significant that he assumed from the first, without inquiry or experiment, that the rest of the family must be leagued against him, and would be sure to denounce him as an impostor. The first idea in the mind of the real ROGER would naturally have been to go to his oldest and dearest friends, and he would have thought it incredible that they would repudiate him in a body. One of the strongest points against the Claimant has been the uniform bent of his mind on this point; he seemed to be always sure that the chances were that all who knew ROGER well would be against him. If it comes to be a question of what an impostor would be likely to do, it must be said that at least the Claimant acted the part to perfection.

It appears that the Claimant is a sufficiently fluent speaker, and that his imprisonment has diminished neither his corpulence nor his audacity. There was a notion that he might perhaps train down under prison diet, and baffle his enemies by coming out of gaol as slim as ROGER when he was last seen. Having secured one set of witnesses by being so extremely unlike ROGER that they felt sure he must be the real man, or he would never have thought of personating him, he might, when divested of the mass of flesh which disguised him, have secured additional testimony on the strength of some resemblance to the missing heir. In point of fact, however, he has come out of Newgate just as he went in; and he appeals now, not to the recollection of those who knew ROGER, but to the moral consciousness of the mob. There is no mistake as to the note he means to strike. Mr. ONSLOW, on his behalf, thanked "the working classes" for releasing him from prison; and the Claimant himself asked whether he was to be branded as a scoundrel just "because a Lord came forward to swear" something against him. When the Claimant goes to Birmingham he will perhaps have Mr. DIXON in the chair, and the meeting will pass resolutions declaring that after this last outrage the House of Lords must immediately be abolished. It is obvious that, if the Claimant were really Sir ROGER, he would be little better than a Lord himself; but a Lord, or at least a baronet, would perhaps be more tolerable to some people if he had not the manners of a gentleman. The crowd which used to cheer the Claimant at Westminster no doubt had a lurking idea that it might be a triumph for their order if somebody not very unlike themselves were established in the ranks of the aristocracy. They resented as personally offensive the idea that a man who at least looked like one of themselves should not be thought good enough to be a baronet. It must be admitted that the Claimant has a very simple and comprehensive explanation of the misfortunes which have overtaken him. He is the victim of a vast conspiracy. Everybody but Mr. ONSLOW and the working classes are against him. He charges the TICHBORNE family with having concocted the tattooing business at a moment's notice when they found they could not beat him in any other way. He complains "most bitterly" of the do it ourselves whenever we are not restrained by the never-ending exigencies of formal good manners. It shows, in fact, that on the domestic hearth where we may take liberties we are still children. The post probably brings newspapers enough each morning to supply, by subdivision, every one of the party present. Each one seizes his portion, and throws his attention into the comprehensive glance which is the cream of newspaper reading. It is a rule which admits of no exception, that a man with the day's paper just put into his hand does not want to be interrupted; yet somebody present will read bits out of his own, to the disturbance of the rest. They need not be important bits. The reader knows that everybody will come upon them in time, and through a means which he himself infinitely prefers to this method of dribbling them out upon unwilling ears; but he cannot help indulging himself with something to tell—of all habits, the most characteristic of the child. Every child desires, above all things, to be the first to tell. To possess a piece of news, and to be before others in the telling of it, is the especial craving of infancy; and in this matter how many are infants still! We do not mean that the inclination to impart news is childish. Nobody who is worth anything as a companion is without it; but this remorseless interruption, this readiness to our rights over time and place, is essentially childishness—innocent in the child who does not know that he infringes on our privileges by anything he does in this sort, but culpable in the man who knows perfectly well, if he would reflect, how sensitive he is under a similar annoyance, and who ought to be alive to the unwilling, grudging attention with which his self-indulgence is repaid.

The habit of collecting is generally begun in childhood. It may be applied to most useful and important purposes in after life, but generally some of the old turn fingers in it and about the collector himself. It is unnecessary, however, to follow the subject into further detail. Where it at all takes possession of the thoughts, every reader will easily find examples of his own—high and low, public and private—illustrating the childish things which the grown man in so many instances has not put away.

MUMMIES.

A HORRIBLY grotesque proposal appears to have been made about the remains of Mazzini. Some of his admirers, it seems, consider that it would be a fitting tribute to his memory to convert his body into a mummy, preserved by some new scientific process. The corpse of the great patriot would be handed down to posterity in ghastly resemblance to his former self as a monument of the devotion with which he was regarded, or rather, it may be, of the physiological skill of some of his disciples. There is something, it need hardly be said, which grates upon one's feelings in this unique suggestion; and yet we can imagine without much trouble that something might be said in favour of it by ingenuous advocates. We cherish the lock of hair of a departed friend; we value every insignificant object which has been sanctified to our minds by association with him; why not preserve the body which, to say the least, has been much more closely connected with him than any external piece of property? Would there not be something incomparably interesting, when once we had surmounted our present prejudices, in a national Valhalla, where, instead of mere statues, the actual bodies of our heroes should receive our tribute of gratitude? Suppose that in Westminster Abbey, Chatham himself, instead of his graven image, still gazed down upon us in the attitude in which he thundered his great orations; or suppose that the approach to the House of Parliament was guarded by the actual bodily cases of Fox and Burke and Falkland and Hampden; would not the impression upon an unsophisticated intellect be far keener than at present? What is the philosophy of the disgust which relics excite in us, at least in this wholesale form, whilst the fragmentary relics of ancient saints have long excited the affectionate reverence of vast multitudes of believers?

We have no objection to admit that to us personally the proposal appears to be disgusting. Whenever Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Disraeli may pass from amongst us, there is nothing which we should less desire than to have their bodies petrified or embalmed, or subjected to any other scientific process and put up in glass cases like the stuffed animals in the British Museum. Beautiful as they may be in life, we suspect, without meaning any personal imputation, that even Mr. Disraeli would be rather a cynic than a tragic spectacle as a mummy. But then it must be admitted that in all such matters custom goes for much, if not for everything, and that we may be really under the influence of some degrading prejudice. Perhaps the true theory of the matter is given in the immortal gravedigger's song which in some respects is the most powerful in Shakespeare, who, by the way, is always great amongst the tombs. It exhibits the contrast between the imaginative and the thoroughly vulgar nature under the most impressive situation. Hamlet was, unfortunately for himself, a person of ill-regulated mind, and given to gaudy and foolish feelings when his feelings were deeply moved. Heotis was an Englishman, and fortified in telling him that he considered two countries, and that he had no business to cut off into wild speculations about Alexander because he was looking at so commonplace an object as a human skull. The gravedigger looked at this subject in a much more sensible and cool-headed manner than the unlearned to form scientific theories as to the time during which a body would last in the earth; he had become thoroughly steeled by custom to the disagreeable experiments connected with his trade. There are few, if any, representatives of Hamlet at present; whereas the gravedigger has to all appearances left a numerous body of descendants inheriting the ancestral peculiarities. That Hamlet possessed the finer intellect is undeniable; but which of the two looked at the matter from the more reasonable point of view? Ought we to regard the relics of humanity with a rising of the gorge, and oscillate between horrified disgust and a certain morbid attraction for the objects which revolt us? Or should we contemplate them with the indifference of a scientific observer walking through an anatomical museum and prepared, when a great man dies, to measure his skull, weigh his brain, and put a neatly dissected preparation of him in a case for the benefit of future investigators? Benham apparently took this last view of the question. He thought that the tenderness which people felt for their bones and tissues after they had ceased to perform the vital functions was a piece of unreasoning sentimentalism to be discouraged as much as possible. He accordingly left his body to be dissected and afterwards made into a mummy; and, if we are not mistaken, he was for a long time kept in the hall of a surviving friend, and is now on view for anybody who has a taste for such exhibitions in the museum of University College. There is in this proceeding a certain heroic defiance of popular prejudice and an adherence to logical conclusions which challenges our respect, though we may not feel inclined to imitate the example. It had, moreover, a certain meaning as a protest against the theories which then obstructed the supply of subjects for the medical schools. But, considered by itself, the practice is certainly not likely to become popular. Botanising on one's mother's grave is bad enough; but the most rigid of philosophers will shrink from allowing the scientific inquirer to penetrate to the interior.

And yet there is something not quite pleasant in the opposite theory which attaches a special interest to the body. In a quiet village in the Italian valleys of the Alps one may often come upon a scene which appears to have been arranged for the special edification of rude inglorious Shakespeares. The remains of the rude forerunners of the hamlet, instead of reposing beneath the turf, are piled in hideous stacks, open to all spectators. Sometimes the gratuitous exhibition goes further, and a couple of complete bodies may be seen watching like ghastly sentinels on each side of the church door. It is a rough but powerful mode of appealing to coarse natures. The old English epitaph which tells us, with an unpleasant air of insulting triumph, "As I am now, so you must be," receives additional emphasis when the present condition of the departed is open to actual inspection. Perhaps the ordinary effect upon the population is simply to induce the grave-digger state of mind; but the intention is of course to encourage meditations appropriate to a certain phase of religious feeling. The hideous monitors are told off to preach the transitory nature of the world, and it may be that they do it more effectually than a good many pulpit commonplaces. Whether or not the lessons thus impressed are edifying to the people immediately concerned, is a large question; but the effect upon the British tourist is undeniably disagreeable. We are quite conscious enough that we are not going to live for ever without having these offensive symbols of our mortality thrust in our faces. We have become too delicate for these vigorous appeals to the senses; and the sort of curiosity which impels visits to the Morgue at Paris, or to the collection of decaying relics on the St. Bernard, does not precisely harmonise with modern religious sentiment.

In fact Hamlet and the gravediggers were both in an objectionable frame of mind. The poet may extract some elevating thoughts even from a decaying skull; but he cannot be too intimate with such images without polluting his imagination. When saturated with the associations of decay, it becomes either hardened or morbidly stimulated, and either condition is unhealthy. Our bodies are becoming terribly in our way. They are very awkward appendages at the best, and have a tendency to produce gout, toothache, indigestion, and other abominations which materially interfere with the serenity of our souls. When we have once done with them, we are inclined to think that the sooner we put them fairly out of sight the better. Probably nobody ever attends an English funeral without forming a resolution, which, like other resolutions, is made only to be broken, that he will not do it again for the sake of his best friend. In spite of the surpassing beauty of the English service, the undertakers have got the better of us. They have taken advantage of our best feelings and of the unfortunate difficulty that exists in satisfactorily disposing of our bodies. We cannot resist with decency, and we are obliged to submit to the disgusting formality of mutes and hearse, penetrated to the core with vulgarity and sham solemnity. It must give an instant's pleasure to a man who is in the act of being lost at sea or engulfed in a crevasse that at least his friends will not have to accompany his remains to Kensal Green. Under any conceivable circumstances the ceremony could not be precisely exhilarating, but the studied and artificial gloom with which it is surrounded jars upon our feelings more harshly than even an absence of the natural solemnities. The worst of it is that the ceremonies appear to have been laid out by the undertakers themselves. To visit the resting-place of a friend is to expose oneself to a revival of all the dismal associations connected with the funeral. The average funeral of the middle class is the same which has determined the whole apparatus of hearse and funeral coaches, and they would appear to have been designed by a Dissecting tradesman in order to keep his mind properly in tune during the spare hours of a puritanical Sabbath. In this respect the Americans have the advantage of us. In their towns the cemetery is generally laid out as a cheerful garden, and is probably the most picturesque piece of ground in the neighbourhood. The sentiment which would associate flowers and sunshine with the graves of one's friends is surely healthier than that which places them beneath a ghastly collection of New Road statuary and stumpy trees caked with London soot. The idea in one case is that the body should return as soon as possible to the earth whence it came, and that the inevitable melancholy should at any rate be associated with nothing like a feeling of disgust. In the other, the idea seems to be that the proper tribute to a friend's memory is to assume an appearance of gloomy respectability, and that thinking of him should produce upon us the same effect as a slight attack of indigestion. It is the difference between making the association as ethereal or as material as possible. The logical result of the British method would no doubt be attained by preserving the body in the state of mummy. In many cases the difference between life and death would then be exceedingly small. The solid Briton, arrayed in his Sunday suit of rusty black, could not look much more dismal when he was stuffed than he generally did when his internal organs were discharging their vital functions. Set up in a clockcase, after the fashion of Bentham, he would harmonize with a set of old-fashioned furniture; though he should not be too much exposed, as there would be a danger of visitors mistaking him for a waiter. The general adoption of this plan would evade the difficulty of the burial of Dissenters. Every man would keep his own ancestors ranged around his room, and when they became too numerous they might be disposed of to anthropological museums. But, well adapted as the plan seems to be to the tastes of a particular class, we do not yet consider it to be suited for general adoption. If anything, we fancy that, as it is, we make too much of the material associations of death. We could find reason to doubt whether the habit of bringing back the remains of distinguished men from great distances, or even of depositing the actual bodies in Westminster Abbey, is altogether desirable. The monuments serve as well when they do not cover a coffin; and after a very short time nobody asks whether the tombs are occupied or empty. Without, however, discussing that question, we are quite clear that we are content with a national portrait-gallery without having the originals preserved by the side of their likenesses. Shakespeare, to return to our great authority, showed his sense as well as an almost prophetic insight when he had himself quietly buried at Stratford, and put up the curse which will preserve his bones from gravediggers and antiquaries. But for it, there are no doubt some people who would be glad to dig him up and exhibit him for the admiration of an intelligent public. Prince Henry, as we remember, proposed to embowel Falstaff, probably regarding him with characteristic coolness in the light of a natural curiosity; but he did not throw out any hint about treating Hotspur in the same fashion. The precedent may be decisive of the question; and though we have no objection to making occasional preparations of a giant or a dwarf, we cannot desire to see the admirers of great men eclipse Madame Tussaud's Exhibition by one of a still more startling character.

A DINNER WITH KING ALFRED.

THE Englishman's fashion of dining on every conceivable occasion and for every conceivable object has been laughed at often enough. Does the Englishman wish to do honour to a distinguished man? He dines. Does he wish to give relief to a distressed man? He dines all the same. Does he wish to promote a political object? He dines for that also. Is the Drama to be supported? He dines under the presidency of an English Prince. Is general Literature to be supported? He dines under the presidency of a foreign King. The oddest of all forms of benevolence certainly is that by which, if any set of people are hungry, we set about feeding them, not by putting food into their mouths, but by putting it into our own. Then we have a great gift of keeping remote anniversaries, centenaries, tercentenaries, and, when we have the chance, millenaries. Sometimes we keep the birthday of an institution which is still living; sometimes we keep the birthday of a man who has been long dead. But at any rate it is generally understood that the men, the events, and the institutions which we commemorate have, or once had, a real being among men. Great as is the temptation of dining on every possible opportunity, it has not hitherto been usual to dine in commemoration of mere shadows. Such a course might indeed be thought disrespectful to a thing which has so true and substantial a being as an English dinner ought to have. But, by an announcement which has just appeared in the papers, it would seem that there is a body of Englishmen, and that a learned society in the University of Oxford, who take another view of things, who think it no indignity to the solemn act of dining to couple it with events which most certainly never happened; in short, to keep the anniversary of an exploded falsehood, and to dine in honour of an acknowledged myth.

It may be said that when a college entertains in its own hall the past and present members of its own body, the thing is as strictly private, and as little open to any public comment, as when a private gentleman entertains his friends in his own dining-room. And so it is, so long as it is kept equally private. If any patriotic Briton should invite his friends to dine with him to celebrate the three thousandth anniversary of the landing of Brutus—a ter-millenary which we think must just now not be very far off—as long as he keeps his intentions private, it is no affair of ours. But if he announces in the Times or the Daily Telegraph that he is going to hold a feast to Brutus within his own tents, the charm is taken away, and it is no breach of the sacredness of private life to laugh in public at what he has himself chosen to make public. So, if the Master and Fellows of University College choose to believe that they were founded by King Alfred or by Jack the Giant-killer, and if they choose in their private meals in their own hall to drink to the glorious, pious, and immortal memory of either of those worthies, it is purely their own affair, and we have no more to do with it than with any other piece of private eccentricity done within the walls of an Englishman's castle. But if they choose to announce in the Times that they are going to dine on a certain day to commemorate the thousandth anniversary of an event which it is quite certain never happened, they bring themselves within the range of public criticism just as much as a man who makes a speech or publishes a book. It is announced that "This being the thousandth year from the traditional date of the foundation of University College, Oxford, by King Alfred, it has been resolved to use the opportunity for a gathering of former and present members of the College within its walls." There is certainly something droll in the notion of "using" for such a purpose the "opportunity" of an acknowledged falsehood. For this is what the alleged foundation of the University and the more daring tale of the foundation of University College by Alfred really is. The thing is not so respectable as a feast in honour of the landing of Brutus would be. The landing of Brutus is a traditional event; whether it has a traditional date we are not skilled enough in mythical chronology to know; to fix the date of Brutus we should be driven to the old fashion of counting generations, and should have to reckon how long after the taking of Troy—an event of which we believe some people know the date, and the week, and the hour of the night—a son of Æneas (we think he was a son of Æneas) is likely to have landed in the Isle of Britain. The legend of Brutus is a real legend. It may have been in its beginning an inference, perhaps even an invention of national vanity. But it became in the strictest sense traditional; the inference or the invention was made in times when the historic sense did not exist; we can hardly take upon ourselves to blame even its first authors, still less to blame those who handed it on and embellished it by the genuine process of mythopoeic growth. But the tale of Alfred founding either University College or the University of Oxford is not genuine tradition or legend at all; it is simply a lie; it is a deliberate invention made for an interested purpose in an age when the historic sense did exist, and when those who interpolated Asser, or spread the fable about in any other way, must have known that they were spreading abroad a mere falsehood of their own devising. The cheat is now fully exposed. No scholar who is in the least competent to judge now puts the slightest faith in it. It is fully acknowledged that neither the University nor University College was called into being by any one founder, but that the origin of both is the surely more honourable one of having come of themselves. We have ourselves before now dealt with the subject. So far from Alfred having founded the University, the legend of St. Frideswide is the only thing which gives any hint that even the city existed in his days. And we suppose that no member of University College will be so hardy as to maintain that Alfred founded University College, that the University grew up round about University College, and that the city grew up round about the University. The history of Oxford begins in the tenth century; in the eleventh it was a place of the first importance as a military post, and as the scene of great national gatherings. But it is not till the twelfth that we get the first hints of the coming University, the first glimpses of schools, scholars, and lecturers; and it is not till the thirteenth that we get our first glimpses of anything like colleges in the modern sense. In that age too comes, not indeed University College, but the benefaction out of which University College grew. The notion of a University, and still more the notion of a college, being founded in the ninth century is one of the most grotesque inventions that ever came into man's head. Nothing to be found in the wildest genealogical fables about Grosveneres, Bruces, or Comyns can outdo it. And when we look at the particular date of 872 the thing becomes more grotesque still. It would have been wiser if the forger had chosen some of the years towards the end of Alfred's reign, when there was comparative peace in the land, and when nothing is recorded in the Chronicles. Indeed we do not see where the particular date of 872 comes from. In the interpolation in Asser the date of Alfred's Oxford doings is put in 886. This year is far better chosen; the general absurdity of Alfred founding any University or college is of course as great in one year as another; but in 886 Alfred at least had something to do with the lands north of the Thames. Oxford, or its site, was at least part of his kingdom, under the rule of his Ealdorman Ethelred. It was the year when he restored London, and when he received a large submission of Englishmen beyond his immediate dominions. But in 872 he was only in the second year of his reign; he was himself getting a breathing space after the great year of battles in the midst of which his reign began, and the Danes were marching to and fro through the country in which he is said to have chosen this singularly odd time for the foundation of a college. Add to this that the place where the College is said to have been founded was no part of Alfred's own dominions. Those who invented the fable evidently looked on Alfred as King of all England. That there was such a person as Burhred King of the Mercians clearly never came into their heads; they clearly had no idea that the King of the West-Saxons had at most the barest external superiority over the realm of his brother-in-law. To conceive a King of the West-Saxons founding a University or a College at Oxford in the year 872 is, other objections apart, almost as grotesque as it would be to attribute the foundation of the University of Göttingen, not to the reigning Elector of Hanover and King of Great Britain, but to the reigning Emperor-Elect.

It would seem that the College itself feels in some degree the grotesqueness of the business, as it is only a "traditional date" the anniversary of which it asks its members to celebrate. If men were not glad to catch at any opportunity of dining about anything, one would have thought that a traditional date was a somewhat shadowy object to dine about. The zealous "Anglo-Saxons" who twenty-three years ago dined and did other things at Wantage in honour of Alfred's birth at least dined in honour of the undoubted date of a real event. University College is content to dine in honour of the traditional date of a thing that never happened. Is there no one to be found in the College to explain that the traditional date is not even a traditional date? We cannot answer for the present members of the Foundation, but the invitation is extended to the former members, and we can bear witness that among them there is no lack of men who are quite able to set their successors right on these matters. Or is the whole thing a joke? Is a dinner held in honour of a shadow to be itself as shadowy as the event in honour of which it is held? Are the present and late members of University College invited to a Barmecide feast? Is dining with King Alfred to be, under these circumstances, a ceremony as profitless as dining with Duke Humphrey? Or are the cakes which, six years after the foundation of University College, the great King forgot to turn, to be served up as the only fitting food for the refreshment of his faithful bedesmen? These are important questions for former members of the College who may be tempted from long distances. But, however they may fare as to the bodily banquet, the feast of reason and flow of soul are at least well provided for. The announcement in the Times which tells us that the dinner is to happen tells us also that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Dean of Westminster are to dine at it. And if they dine at it, they will surely make speeches after they have dined. The Dean is in this case the lesser light. He may be taken for granted. No preaching, no dining, no debating, can be perfect without its being enlightened with Dr. Stanley's views on something or other. Dr. Stanley's views about Alfred to be put forth at Oxford will most likely be as remarkable as the views about Alfred's daughter which he did put forth at Chester. The subject is one which exactly suits Dr. Stanley's genius. He can talk prettily about anything, and he can perhaps talk more prettily about those things which did not happen than about those things which did. But "the speech of the evening" will of course be that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. For Mr. Lowe to speak in Oxford about King Alfred is indeed somewhat. Two years ago the University of Oxford did honour to the man whom she had nourished and brought up, and who had so cruelly rebelled against her. But then Mr. Lowe had to receive his honours in silence, though very little silence was kept round about him by either his friends or his enemies. But at King Alfred's dinner he will be unmuzzled. He will have an opportunity of making it known whether he still thinks, with Mr. Tittlebat Titmouse, that the University teaches "nothing but some old languages which are no use, because they a'n't spoke anywhere now." He will have an opportunity of finding out that there is such a thing as a School of Modern History, and that there are Professors whose business it is to expound the subjects which are taken up in it. Perhaps we may see Mr. Lowe going to learn the Dooms of Alfred from the Regius Professor, and studying the exact build of those ships which were built neither after the Danish make nor after the Frisian at the feet of the Professor's gallant colleague. Mr. Lowe, as we all know, looks on the battle of Marathon as having been fought too long ago, and as having had too few people killed in it, for any reasonable person to trouble himself about it. A "good railway accident," with a more decent amount of slaughter, is much more to Mr. Lowe's liking. We are anxious to know whether A.D. 871 is near enough to our own time to deserve any of the attention which is forbidden to B.C. 490? We are sorry that we have not such exact statistics of the combined slaughter in the fields of Englefield, Reading, Ashdown, Basing, and Merton, as we have of the slain on the Athenian side at Marathon—Mr. Lowe, if we rightly remember, left out of sight the fact that there were barbarians killed there also. But somehow when we remember what hard fighting there was, how Alfred went forth like a wild boar against the hounds and all the rest of it, we cannot help thinking that Danes and English between them must have managed to kill people enough to reach the standard of a very respectable railway accident. We shall be glad to learn Mr. Lowe's views on these matters, and also, if respect for his hosts does not make him hold his peace, on the general question of the probability of academical colleges having been founded in the year 872.

We have always pitied conscientious members of University College when they have been called on to preach University sermons, and have had to usher in their discourses with a thanksgiving for a founder, real enough in some other relations of life, but purely mythical as far as they are concerned. But to eat a dinner is a far more serious business than to preach a sermon, and we can only hope that those who may come together to dine in honour of the imaginary foundation of University College a thousand years back may have a bodily digestion as strong as their intellectual digestion certainly must be.

UMBRELLAS.

THE greatest revolution of the eighteenth century took place on the day when Jonas Hanway walked down Fleet Street with an umbrella. The dress, the social tone, the very architecture of the West were modified in a moment. There was no longer any necessity for the heavy porticoes which sheltered a visitor from the rain. Men flung off the cumbersome coats and watchmen's capes which had been their only protection against a shower. Even the shaggy beaver gradually disappeared, and the silk hat weathered storms which at an earlier age in the world's history would have reduced it to a shapeless wreck in twenty minutes. The mere sense that rain was at last beaten, that it was no longer necessary to watch the clouds and tap the barometer before starting for a walk across the fields, gave a new sense of freedom and exhilaration to mankind. Child as it is of the East, the umbrella only found its true realization when it ventured in Jonas Hanway's fist into Fleet Street. The "Lord of a Hundred Umbrellas" is really only the master of as many parasols. The umbrella of the Assyrian King or of the Byzantine Cæsar was a mere appendage of royal pomp. The Papal umbrella of the present day is the last relic of a time when state had absorbed what was meant for mankind. So long, in fact, as the umbrella lived only in lands of the sun, it missed its vocation; and even now, when the peasant of the Riviera appears with an umbrella, it is with something utterly undeserving of the name. Rain is a phenomenon, and he constructs a phenomenon to shelter him against it, red, vast, and formless. It is hard to believe that the gigantic erection has any kindred with the exquisite little implement which daugles from every loungers' finger in Pall Mall. In the civilized umbrella, however, the practical plays only a subordinate part. It is far more than a mere protection against a passing shower; it is the symbol of a life, the companion of leisure hours, the index to character. It is impossible to dissociate her umbrella from Mrs. Gamp. There is something in the very bulginess of its vast circuit which marks the monthly nurse. A recent Archbishop of Canterbury used to be famous for walking across Westminster Bridge to the opening of Parliament with a cotton umbrella, and we at once recognize the temper and theology of the man. It is from a sense of this that an ingenious tradesman has just patented a "Clerical Umbrella," whose stout ebony handle and serviceable alpaca marks at a glance the decorous, hard-working parson. But a more glance at an umbrella-stand is enough to show the wonderful diversities of character which can be expressed in this way. We see the dapper little darling with its curious monogram on the top, and know we shall hear all the scandal of town as soon as we enter the drawing-room. The rough horn of another tells us that our solicitor is fussing for us in the study. Its neighbour, unkempt but lovely in its negligence, is the sign of an artist friend whose pictures find no favour with the Academy. The square, whose umbrella leaning against the wall means "a little bill." When Mr. Sampson Brass is recalling the memories of the departed Quilp, he does not miss the one great symbol of his character—"His wit and humour, his pathos, and his umbrella, all come before me like visions of my youth." But if it is this to the world without, it is more than this to its owner. There are few things so companionable as an umbrella. A stick is a shade too light. A dog is a shade too troublesome. A friend walks either too fast or too slow. But an umbrella is just heavy enough to give one the feeling of having something with one, it never bothers, and it always goes one's own pace. It is a prop in the moment of languor when one is forced to make talk in front of Lady Dawdle's garden-chair. It is a toy with which one plays as one flirts with her daughter. It has its peculiarities, its history, its stories of flights and returns, its memories of pleasant little lits-à-têles with charming beings who found a shelter in it from showers. There is something human about it which endears it to us. We talk of it to our friends, we discuss its stick and its colour, we make a grievance of it, and write to the Times about the harpies who rob us of it at the Academy. There are few hours of loneliness and desertion when a man cannot console himself with his umbrella.

It is owing perhaps to their late introduction into Europe that men have as yet hardly recognized any distinct or separate property in umbrellas. Like game, they belong to the class of fera natura. A faint trace of Communism lingers over the stand in the hall. Nobody feels very guilty at taking a "stray" umbrella if it happens to be raining as he leaves his club, or at finding himself walking home with a new umbrella when he was conscious of having left it with an old one. It is amusing to notice the unconcerned curiosity with which the new owner, as he puts his spell by with his hat and coat, guesses who on earth such a pretty little thing could have belonged to. There is not the least sense of guilt in the question. In common thought the umbrella is gifted with a certain vague personality which is supposed to explain its constant tendency to get astray. A kind of gipsy-like and vagrant nature is assumed to belong to it. It is credited with a volition of its own, and supposed to be in some way itself responsible for its presence in any man's hand but the man who bought it. Its own will brought it to us, and if it happens to be a new one, we generally leave it to its own will to take it back again. There are, we believe, persons eccentric enough to return umbrellas, but the instances are rare. And in the same way there are eccentric people who make a fuss about getting back their umbrellas. Dr. Buckland, for instance, after the loss of a good many, boldly carved on the handle of a new one "Stolen from Dr. Buckland," and found that his friends were only too eager to return it to him whenever it took its walks abroad. But the common sense of mankind has always frowned down invidious attempts of this kind to contradict a large and almost universal human instinct. If we recognize our watch in a friend's watch-pocket, it needs a very warm friendship indeed to reclaim it without a serious explanation. But if we fix an eye of welcome recognition on a long-lost umbrella, which happens to be dangling between a friend's thumb and forefinger, neither party feels the least embarrassment. The owner cries, with a start of pleasant surprise, "By Jove! isn't that my umbrella?" and the felon surrenders it with a discreet "Is it really?" but without an attempt to cover or explain his felony. Our feeling on the subject reflects itself indeed in common language. An umbrella is never supposed to have been "stolen," but always to have been lost, and to lose an umbrella is simply to be a man. The accurate person who "never lost anything in his life" is careful to except his umbrella. There are limits to the credulity even of the most credulous, and he knows that if he had omitted the saving clause nobody would have believed him. But it is just this vagrant tendency which renders it so dear to us. We feel as the mother feels towards the darling who is sure to go wrong. It is so seldom that we can count on a month's uninterrupted converse with our own umbrella that we cherish the intercourse of every day. Life, too, is never weary of providing pitfalls for our umbrellas. They are constantly being left from us at doors and corridors. There is a general theory among official people that we use them to demolish vases and to poke out the eyes of pretty pictures. Innocent and playful as the umbrella appears to us, it is to the official person a "dangerous weapon," which has to be seized and ticketed and detained in queer pigeon-holes. We sigh and part to meet no more. We leave the Gallery by a different door. We are chatting with an absorbing coquette as we hurry by the prison-house. It is sunny weather, and we simply forget it, or we remember the wanderer but have lost the ticket. Or, worst of all, we find ourselves amongst a mob of howling maniacs dancing before the fatal desk and shouting "Umbrella!" in vain. Let us do justice to Mr. Cole as he has done justice to umbrellas. We have had our little tiff with South Kensington, but South Kensington has freed itself from the superstition that it is necessary to consign the harmless partner of our joys and sorrows to an official black-hole. "Many men," mourns a helpless artist in the Times of last week, "who have an hour to spare, and would gladly look into the Academy late in the afternoon, are prevented doing so by the trouble and annoyance of surrendering and reclaiming the umbrella, the use of which our genial climate renders imperative." It is at any rate a consolation to these blighted beings that they can reconcile their love of art and their love of umbrella in the galleries of the International Exhibition. If over we are tempted by gratitude to place the bust of Cole, C.B. in our hall, its place shall be exactly over the umbrella-stand. A more terrible pitfall lies in the tendency of mankind to regard umbrellas as a sort of circulating medium. It is odd that, while it requires at least a year's acquaintance to borrow half-a-crown, a casual chat of five minutes is supposed to warrant one in borrowing an umbrella. The most terrible result of this is that there are a race of people who never have umbrellas, and steadily borrow their way through every shower. There is something agonizing in the sight of one of these predatory persons watching calmly the pattering of the rain out of one's window, while one is conscious that that little gem in the hall is destined to be carried off in a few minutes. But there is no redress. An adroit use of "Christmas bills," or the plea of an already over-drawn account, may evade the demand for a pecuniary loan; but there is no conceivable pretext on which one can escape the loan of an umbrella.

But these communistic aspects are not the only social aspects of umbrellas. It is curious to note the part they play in acquaintance-ship or in love. It is very difficult to remain an absolute stranger to the man who has walked a few miles with one under the same umbrella; a confidential relation seems to spring up with singular rapidity under the kindly circle of its roof. A good many very pleasant friendships have been born in this way out of a kindly shower. But prettier things have sprung out of showers than pleasant friendships. In the earlier stages of affection the umbrella is simply a vent for feelings which it is difficult to express in any other way. On the eve of a declaration, for instance, it is an immense relief to be able to fix one's eyes steadily on the ground, and to poke viciously at the gravel with one's umbrella. The awkwardness, the hesitation, the want of the right word is exquisitely annoying, and it is comforting to vent one's annoyance in a good poke, while the fair expectant is drawing curious and elaborately mathematical diagrams with the point of her parasol. But it is in hours of hesitation that the umbrella finds its noblest sphere of employment. Sunshine is by no means the best atmosphere for making lovers happy. The two companions loiter and dawdle; the gentleman hovers lightly over the new tender at the opera, the lady picks a flower or two, and murmurs monosyllables in reply. The subject they are both longing to touch seems to recede into a further distance as the end of their stroll draws near. After all, Strophon thinks, with a little thrill of vexation, there will be other strolls and other sunny afternoons. But the whole difficulty vanishes with a drop of rain. Strophon opens his umbrella, and Belinda is soon hanging to his arm, and pressing closely to his side. It is easier to utter the "three little words" when they can be whispered under an umbrella than when they have to be shouted across a gravel-path. The educational umbrella carries us into a widely different region of emotion and thought. The ingenious contriver of this new invention has evidently been struck with the enormous field which a walk in the rain offers to self-improvement. In one of his umbrellas he offers us an opportunity of studying astronomy. The concave of silk is turned into the concave of the sky, where a host of planets and constellations gleam down upon us from between the bars of whalebone. In another we are wooed to the study of geography, and our eyes may wander through Raffles's Straits to where the umbrella stick represents the Pole. The idea is ingenious enough, and in the case of poets or persons addicted to walking with their eyes directed heavenwards, might no doubt be turned to very pretty purpose. Imagine the consolation to Mr. Tupper of walking beneath an expanded copy of the Proverbial Philosophy, and of being able at any moment to turn to one of its golden sentences on the roof above him. In the present dearth of polite conversation, we can fancy very adroit use being made of models of talk, such as Swift drew up for the fine people of his time, and which could in this way be hung peacefully overhead. Each rib of the umbrella might contain a dialogue adapted to different people, and a dexterous twist, as Lord Heavy-side left us, would provide us with a sprightly and vivacious repartee for Lady Flighty. The uses of the umbrella, in fact, can hardly be said to have been as yet explored. But, after all, its great charm will always lie in its utility. To the Emperor Nicholas war was a nuisance, because it spoilt his admirable soldiers; and rain is, for the same reason, a nuisance to the amateur of umbrellas. A rose "just washed in a shower," as Cowper says of it, may be a pretty thing in its way, but the lightness and grace of an umbrella vanish with a wetting. It never folds again. Its slim proportions gather a shade of portliness. In side lights we see in it something of the trace of Mrs. Gamp. It is in vain that we watch its decadence with a curious regret, and veil the sadness of its last moment by a shilling cover from Redmayne's. Its hour has come, but there is a romance even in its last moments. It simply vanishes. Old sticks linger about the house, but an old umbrella is as invisible as a dead donkey. Jew voices rise from the area in the early dawn, and suggest to us, as we turn dreamily on our pillow, theories about its end. But we know nothing. The umbrella vanishes into the Infinite, and we make no impious attempt to lift the curtain of the dark.

PACIFIC PROCEEDINGS.

THE Report of the Proceedings of H.M.S. Rosario among the South Sea Islands is perhaps less satisfactory to readers than to the gallant officer who composed it. We do not wish to disguise the difficulty of dealing with the circumstances of those islands, or to throw blame upon a zealous officer who acted to the best of his judgment for the protection of the various interests committed to his care; but we think the time has come for seriously endeavouring to settle the principle upon which the intercourse of civilized nations with the South Sea Islanders should be regulated. They have suffered, as is generally admitted, outrages from white men who have been engaged in what we will for shortness call a slave trade, and they have committed in retaliation outrages upon other white men which have drawn upon them such "les-sons" as the shelling of their villages by men-of-war. It is of course evident that the brutal, or even murderous, violence of a kidnapping skipper and his crew does not justify the slaughter of a bishop and his attendant clergy. But these Islanders, like all other savages, assume that an injury may be requited upon any member of the tribe to which the offender belonged, and they prefer a chief if they can find one. The outrages committed by the kidnappers are clearly described in this Report. Their practice "actually amounts to downright slavery, and in many cases, where blood is shed in a most wanton manner, to murder." This is the conclusion of Commander Markham, after having given to the subject constant attention, and made inquiries at several islands. There is, indeed, a practice worse than kidnapping, which is called "head hunting." The chief of one of the tribes or islands enters into an agreement with the master of a ship that if he will supply him with so many heads of his enemies, which they keep as trophies, he will give him an equivalent in men to be sent away for labour. Thus some natives are murdered in order that other natives may be enslaved.

The evidence in support of these allegations is entirely satisfactory to Commander Markham. He even states that the kidnappers sometimes disguise themselves as missionaries, and he might have argued that it is not wonderful if missionaries are sometimes treated as kidnappers. In such cases, as if he were engaged in making out a case for a bill against the wards of a native, and we learn with some surprise that he can busy at the same time in punishing them. He had communicated with the Rev. Peter Milne, the resident missionary at Ngara, "concerning the recent atrocities committed by the natives of that island on white men," more especially with regard to the massacre of the crew of the schooner Fanny; and Mr. Milne being of the same opinion as himself that punishment ought to be inflicted for that offence, he took measures accordingly. He landed with a party of armed men, and Mr. Milne "put him in the right path," in a sense different from that in which clergymen are sometimes said to perform that office. Approaching a village where the murderers of white men dwelt, his party was fired upon, and he thereupon destroyed the village. He says that he had no other course left than to destroy the village, because he had previously sent a message to the chiefs to the effect that he wanted not to fight but only to talk. Like some other persons in authority, Commander Markham's actions are better than the reasons which he gives for them. It seems a reasonable course to land and hold a parley with the chiefs as to murders committed on white men, and if on landing he was attacked, he was entitled to retaliate. But unfortunately he has already told us that he had made up his mind to inflict punishment, which is surely a different thing from holding a conference and assuring natives that the British naval power is sent to protect them as well as the strangers who have come among them. However, his party was fired upon, and he destroyed two villages, which he feels confident—and Mr. Milne, who lives upon the island, is also of his opinion—will have a very beneficial effect upon the natives in future as regards their behaviour to white men; and he is glad to say, and we are glad to hear, that the whole was done without effusion of blood.

We might be content with this result, although we should not applaud it, but in the very next sentence we are taught that the important matter rather is how white men behave to natives. He says that if a notorious slave-trader had not visited the island half an hour before him, he would have been able to communicate with the natives, and everything might have been settled "without resorting to such strenuous measures." To put the matter plainly, the natives would not have been punished at all if they had behaved respectfully to the captain of a man-of-war. We are not told what the notorious slave-trader had done to them; but if he behaved like others of his kind, it is not surprising that the natives were not prepared to be especially civil to the next party of white men who approached their villages. The oddest part of the story is that Mr. Milne, the resident missionary, never seems to reflect that, although it is a fine thing to have a man-of-war to back you, yet when she departs and leaves you alone with the natives their turn must inevitably come. This, however, is Mr. Milne's business and not ours. He was promised a second visit of the ship, which seemed to give him much pleasure, and he was of opinion that, "if a few shot and shell from this ship, while passing the island, were thrown in, it would have a salutary effect upon the natives, as they seemed to have a very poor idea of the power of a man-of-war." Incredible as it may appear, Commander Markham acted upon the absurd advice which the Rev. Mr. Milne gave to him. The notion of "throwing in a few shot and shell" in passing a village, just as one might send a charge of shot among a flight of birds, would be grotesque if it were not barbarous. The uncertainty of the operation seems to deprive this proceeding of the character of punishment, unless indeed it be right to flog all the boys in a school on the calculation that some of them are sure to deserve it. This officer was intrusted to inquire into certain charges against Mr. Milne, which he reported to be without foundation. Among various reasons which he gave for his conclusion was this, that Mr. Milne was "a most humane and inoffensive man." We do not question the humanity or the Christianity of this missionary, but we never heard before of a shepherd who advised that a few shot and shell should be thrown in among his flock. The treatment is peculiar, but possibly, having regard to the peculiar nature of the patient, it may be soothing. At any rate it was applied next day. Commander Markham, seeing a party of natives assembled near one of the villages which had been destroyed, threw a few shot and shell amongst them for the purpose of dispersing them, as he had been led to believe that the natives were inclined to ridicule the power of a man-of-war. He does not say that anybody was hurt, and perhaps he did not intend to hurt anybody; but we cannot help thinking that the power of a man-of-war under such direction, if not alarming, is likely to appear ridiculous. He discerned with his telescope Mr. Milne, which gave him no little satisfaction, as he had feared the natives would have retaliated upon him for the punishment inflicted the day before. Mr. Milne ought to know the native character, and can calculate how far he may trust to it. We should have thought that this plan of throwing in shot and shell on the chance of killing some native of a tribe which has at a former time murdered white men resembled much too closely the barbarous practice of indiscriminate revenge. The strangest part of the story is that Commander Markham afterwards earned the gratitude of these islanders by recovering the wife of one of them who had been kidnapped. He was repeatedly charged on leaving the island, and "he believed that now the confidence of the natives would be thoroughly established in a man-of-war." It seems a pity that he could not begin where he finished.

At another island this officer's proceedings were less successful. He had been intrusted to inquire into the circumstances of the murder of a boat's crew belonging to an English ship. He went to the village of the delinquent tribe with an interpreter, interrogated the chief, and obtained from him an admission of the murder. He was unable to point out the graves of the murdered men, for the sufficient reason that he and his tribe had eaten them. It appeared, however, that the murdered men had intended to carry off a man of the tribe, and, having regard to the circumstances, it was judged sufficient to inflict a fine on the village of twenty-five pigs. But as the men had taken themselves off, and the pigs did not come in, Commander Markham destroyed the village. He seems to have taken pains to explain to the chief that in future any complaints of violence would be inquired into and redressed, but that he would not be allowed to take the law into his own hands. This indeed is the only course by which the miserable condition of those islands can be improved. We must put down kidnapping; and then we may insist that murder shall be severely punished. Bishop Patteson, as is well known, expressed the wish that, if he should perish, as he did, by native violence, vengeance might not be inflicted for his death. We do not find that Commander Markham went to the island where the Bishop was murdered with a design of punishing his murderers; but he was naturally suspected of such a design, and, being resisted, he asserted the honour of the British flag. Having arrived off Nukapu, he sent in a boat to attempt a friendly communication, which was received with a flight of arrows, "the natives at the same shouting, yelling, and dancing in a defiant manner." The boat returned according to orders, and, being sent again, was similarly received. Being determined after this reception of his boat to effect a landing, and to teach the natives that the British flag was not to be assailed with impunity, he fired a couple of broadsides into the village at 2,400 yards, and then pulled in with the boats and landed. There was a smart exchange of rifle bullets and poisoned arrows, and a village was taken and destroyed. The work was thus accomplished, and Commander Markham trusts that "a severe lesson had been taught to these islanders, which he hopes will make them in future respect the lives of white men." Two of his crew were wounded by arrows, of whom one afterwards died. He thinks that the native loss must have been severe. He is under the impression that the natives must have imagined that the ship had arrived expressly for the purpose of punishing them for the murder of Bishop Patteson. This is indeed highly probable. This officer proposed to himself a work of a didactic and exhortatory character. But on sending in a boat by way of preliminary to palaver, she is met with a discharge of arrows, and thereupon the British flag is found to be insulted, and must be avenged. Whether the men who were killed in the ensuing action were sacrificed to the manes of Bishop Patteson or to the honour of Britain cannot matter much. The Commander had no intention of administering a "severe lesson," but still he hopes that it may be useful. Of course the ordinary understanding of the proceedings will be that the white men misused the natives, whereupon the natives murdered the Bishop, whereupon the Bishop's countrymen killed several natives. Let us hope that the series of reprisals will not be carried further.

The inquiries instituted by Commander Markham show the existence in those islands of shameful practices which the civilized Powers whose ships frequent them are in honour and duty bound to prohibit and punish. The experience of China and India shows that a labour traffic may be so regulated as to avoid the character of kidnapping. This country can do again what has been done before, and other countries will probably be willing to follow her example. It may be clearly explained to the natives that they will be protected as far as possible in life and liberty against white aggression, but will not be allowed to take their own way to indiscriminate vengeance. It is better to say no more as to the past. We have heard of a sailor who finds on the sea-shore a bottle, and exclaims as he opens it, "Kum, I hope; sherry, I think; tracts, by jingo!" We compare ourselves to this sailor for the purpose of expressing our surprise at finding a captain of a man-of-war "throwing in" shot and shell instead of tracts at the suggestion of a missionary. The Rev. Peter Milne is in one sense a worthy follower of Him who came, not to bring peace on earth, but a sword.

THE MUTINY AT ST. PAUL'S.

TO lay it on thick is good policy if the thickness is well calculated. But there is such a thing as laying it on too thick, and then the pigment is apt to peel off. We should imagine that the over-active dignitary who now rules in the Mansion House, and who appeared in Monday's Times as the leader of a small troop comprising Sir William Tite, Mr. Fergusson, Mr. Onvendsch Bentinck, and Mr. Murray, must by this time have learned to appreciate that fact. There has, it appears, been movement in the Executive Committee charged with the completion of St. Paul's, consequent upon the meeting organized by Mr. Longman and held at the Mansion House, upon which we spoke a few weeks since; and as a first step it was resolved to strengthen the available artistic force by the appointment of some architect to supplement Mr. Penson. In the full exercise of their rights, and after two large discussions with an interval of some days, resulting on the second occasion in an increased majority, the Executive Committee, out of a list of well-known architects, selected Mr. Burgess for the work. Whereupon the Lord Mayor and his companions, all of them members of that Executive Committee, flew to the Times, and, for reasons and upon a statement of facts which we shall have to investigate, presented an appeal to the whole body, whoever they may be, of subscribers to the work of completion. On the face of it this letter was an odd document. A select body of gentlemen in responsible stations and with known antecedents, who have been gratuitously working together for months or for years in confidential counsel over public objects which do not involve electioneering or financing, are generally actuated by enough of mutual sympathy and good-fellowship to prevent any appreciable minority of them from openly nestling into the expansive bosom of a leading journal whenever they may find themselves outvoted within their own Committee-room. It was a still more risky measure to threaten an appeal from the regular authorities—selves and colleagues in their Committees, the Dean and Chapter, and so on—who have hitherto carried on the work of completion, and who may be supposed to know something of their own business, to a totally shadowy and unrecognized caucus of such subscribers as may please to answer their whip—theirself, it may be, over a cosy breakfast-table. Perhaps they may succeed in enlisting the valuable support of the "Large Subscriber" who bubbles over in Thursday's Times at the idea that Mr. Burges was averse to the Byzantine treatment of the work as too akin to Gothic, but proposed to carry out the decorations in "cinque cento," in profound ignorance that "cinque cento" expresses the style of St. Peter's, and of the other buildings which served as Wren's examples. Their menace could have but one meaning—namely, an attempt to starve the majority into compliance by cutting off the supplies, at the risk, whichever side prevailed, of sapping a great undertaking. We do not say that there are not cases in which it may be a moral duty to go down into the street; but in every such case the insurgents are bound to show that they are something better than brawlers. In the matter of St. Paul's they attempted to justify their proceedings by the allegations that to the Lord Mayor was due the credit of that augmented vitality which the world has hitherto assigned to Mr. Longman, and that his lordship had therefore, we suppose, Saturn's right to devour his own offspring; that a vote had been taken in Committee on the specific issue of "medievalist" and "classical," or "anti-medievalist," and that upon the medievalists scoring a majority of one (names being given on both sides), Mr. Burges in that character was subsequently elected, as a direct antagonist of Wren. No doubt these charges so manipulated seemed to involve much unwisdom on the part of the majority, although they wholly failed to justify the threatened appeal to the subscribers. But the Times of Wednesday contained letters placing the matter in a very different light—from the Dean of St. Paul's, covering one by Mr. Burges, from Mr. Longman and Mr. Oldfield, members of the Committee who had originally voted against Mr. Burges, and from Mr. Gilbert Scott, speaking with the authority of his great experience in favour of Mr. Burges's peculiar capacities. From these communications we gather that the quintet had simply been drawing upon a wealth of imagination which we had fancied had long been strange to the Mansion House, when they asserted that a division—of which they provide the list—had been taken upon the question of medievalist or anti-medievalist, or that the selection of Mr. Burges was a subsequent proceeding; the fact having been that, without any debate, motion, or a division on any question of style—all being equally resolved to complete St. Paul's as a building of modern and not mediæval character—Mr. Burges came out first as, in the Dean's words, a man "of genius, vigour, and varied accomplishments," in an exhaustive election out of five architects of established position, by a vote of nine to seven, which was incorrectly, and to Mr. Burges's disadvantage, scheduled in that letter, where, as we understand, two votes were reported as having been given which did not appear, while one which was given is forgotten. At a subsequent date, and, as rumour will have it, on the motion of the Lord Mayor, the former decision was revised, with the result that Mr. Burges was continued in his place by nine to six. On the first occasion proxies were received, but not on the second, otherwise the numbers would have stood eleven and six. Mr. Burges's letter to the Dean satisfactorily disposes of charges which have been trumped up against him on the score of some vigorous expressions which he had used in regard to the style of Wren, and which, stripped of the amplification which artists are fond of indulging in, simply prove that in any new building he would eschew classical architecture, while, as in the case of his own restoration of the eighteenth-century Chapel of Worcester College, he is prepared and able to complete an Italian building in the Italian manner. More important, however, is the letter of Mr. Longman and Mr. Oldfield, in which, after explaining that one of them had once and the other twice voted against Mr. Burges, they join in "loyally" accepting his appointment, in co-operating in the preliminary arrangements with him, and in anticipating success for his labours.

We shall be curious to see whether, in face of these exposures of the untrustworthy and inaccurate nature of their statement, the dissidents will dare to appeal even to their own fancy constituency of subscribers. We own, however, that we are far more interested in the broader question of the wisdom in itself of the choice which the Committee has made. No doubt Mr. Burges has chiefly, though not exclusively, worked in Gothic. But, behind the specialities of style which mark his predilections, the characteristics of the man are prominent—namely, a wide love for and acquaintance with all art; a hearty zeal for grouping and good drawing in pictorial work; a gift of composition, dignified and balanced in the constructive mass, and full of subtle fancy in the accessories; an especial familiarity with the details of church arrangement; a careful study of materials and processes; an inexhaustible copiousness of archaeological lore, combined with an ever-ready vigour of mind and a keen appreciation of possibilities. If we could be shown another architect possessed of these qualifications—who had made Italian architecture his speciality, we should gladly own that he had made good his claim to be charged with the completion of St. Paul's. But such a one we have never come across, and while waiting for him, we are well content to leave the work in the hands of one from whose genius and versatility we may confidently expect the most successful results. The Times indeed argues that the choice of an architect ought to have been made by way of competition, inviting the pressure of public opinion, enlightened or the reverse. We are totally unable to accept this conclusion. The work for which the choice was to be made was one of completion and not of construction. A competition in the latter case would be one between various independent, and probably diverse, leading ideas, and is consequently capable of a short, sharp, and direct issue; and therefore, in spite of many failures, we willingly admit the principle of competition for new public buildings. When, however, the man has to be chosen to work upon another man's construction, the reasons regulating the choice must be far more delicate, complicated, and unintelligible to the masses. In that case accordingly we believe that the best decision will be arrived at by a calm and judicial comparison, by competent persons in camera, of the competitors' antecedents, and the worst by a competition of showy designs open to the untrained impressions of an idle sight-seeing public. They might, for instance, fall under the ken of the "Large Subscriber" to whom we have already referred, who splutters out defiance at Mr. Burges because, having on a former occasion received a commission from the Committee to prepare a scheme for the "iconographic" treatment of the interior, and a treatment involving the introduction of figures and not of mere pattern and decoration, he carried out his orders in a report in which he recapitulated those typical forms of Christian art, Apostles and the Heavenly Host, Patriarchs, Saints, and Sibyls as emblematic of the yearnings of a heathen world after better things—with which any person of tolerable education, except the "Large Subscriber," has become familiar since Mrs. Jameson and Lady Eastlake introduced them to the general public—which inspired the pencils of Raffaele, Michael Angelo, and the other great masters of painting in the heyday of revived Italian, and which now attract tourists by shoals to the gorgeous churches of modern Munich. The Times hopes that some specimen of Mr. Burges's designs may be seen before the work is placed in his hands. The latter words are vague, but we may be certain that the Dean and Chapter will sign no contract until they and the world have had the opportunity of minutely studying their architect's mature thoughts in report, design, and model.

THE SOUTH KENSINGTON BAZAAR.

UNFINISHED work is proverbially exposed to unfavourable criticism; and if the managers of the International Exhibition find that the public is dissatisfied with what they have set before it they have only themselves to blame. An eloquent writer in a morning paper has compared the Exhibition to a gigantic flower opening its petals one by one. It appears, in fact, that the bud has only just burst, and that it will not be full blown for some time to come. It is now three weeks since the Exhibition was formally opened, and anybody who is willing to remain long enough in town will perhaps be rewarded by witnessing the completion of most of the preparations before it closes. One of the attractions held out to the purchasers of season-tickets was that they were to have a quiet private view all to themselves for the first few days; and those who went were gratified by the sight of empty or disordered rooms and barricaded corridors. The ticket-holders were also invited to inspect the Duke of Edinburgh on the opening night; and as those who were foolish enough to accept the invitation were probably confined to their rooms during the ensuing week, it may have been immaterial to them that the other privilege for which they had paid was a mockery and illusion. Perhaps it is in the nature of International Exhibitions to unfold themselves gradually; but it may be hinted that it would be more in accordance with ordinary conceptions of commercial honesty if the unfolding took place before the Exhibition was opened. People who have paid for a dinner are naturally not disposed to accept a sight of the waiters laying the cloth and setting out the spoons as a substitute for a first course of peculiar delicacy. One of the practical jokes of the management is to put up a series of finger-posts or placards pointing in a particular direction, and seeming partly to command and partly to entreat visitors to explore the court or annexe to which they are thus conducted. You are led to suppose that the Commissioners make quite a point of your going there, and that they would be hurt if you didn't, and as the Commissioners are all such very distinguished people you hardly like to refuse. After going very much out of your way to follow the placards, up one passage and down another, you come at last to looked-down-upon place to retrace your steps. It turns out that the annexe, or whatever it is, will not be opened for another week or so. It appears that the monotony of ordinary sight-seeing is also revealed by an interlude which has been described by an indignant correspondent of a contemporary, who does not seem to have entered cordially into the spirit of the thing. He complains that, having gone to the Exhibition with a small hand-bag, to which no objection was made on his entrance, and which he would gladly have deposited in a parcel-office if he could have found one, he was seized by the police as he was leaving, and subjected to an insulting inquisition with a view to ascertain whether he could prove that the bag did not contain stolen property. If this sort of thing goes on, a visit to South Kensington will be as dangerous as a visit to the polling-booth under the new system of ballot and handcuffs. On the other hand, a visitor to the Exhibition who escapes apprehension by the police can confer with the mysterious officials who are known as steward-attendants, if he is lucky enough to find one. The steward-attendants, as we learn from a printed notice, are distinguished by a white wand and a badge suspended by a blue ribbon, and are, we presume, selected from Knights of the Garter who are willing to make themselves generally useful. Their chief function is "to furnish any visitor on application with a form for making complaints, and to supply a pencil for the purpose." A wag on a wet day might find worse sport than stalking steward-attendants, and filling up their forms of complaints, which might afterwards be moved for as a Parliamentary return.

It is evident that the managers of the Exhibition have this year found great difficulty in collecting enough "exhibits" to hide their bare walls and empty shelves. As it is, with the exception of the pictures and the machinery, there is scarcely anything to be seen that may not be found every day in half-a-dozen shop-windows in a leading thoroughfare. It must be remembered, however, that what are mere shopkeepers' wares in Bond Street or Piccadilly become, by some curious process of transformation, articles of high art in the "purer æther and divinair" of South Kensington. It is, we believe, an elementary principle in the show business that whatever is exhibited must be supposed to have a peculiarly elevating influence. Artemus Ward had his "moral bares" and his "miscellanyus moral wax statoots of celebrated piruts and murderers"; and the trays of Brummagem jewellery, the sheaves of cheap coloured stationery, and "Her Majesty and the Prince of Wales in red sealing-wax" are invested with a peculiar moral and artistic beauty when taken in hand by Cole C.B. Anybody with a taste for shop-windows will find a much finer show of goods in Bond Street than at the Exhibition; but people who do not mind paying fancy prices for the honour and glory of buying things at South Kensington are of course entitled to please themselves. To such straits have the managers been reduced to make up their show, that they have been obliged to lay the adjoining Museum under heavy contributions. The Jackass Net and the Trawl for Flat Fish—familiar South Kensington institutions—are prominent features in this year's Exhibition. In one sense the art collections may be said to be of a highly comprehensive character, for they illustrate the depths to which what may be called art, at least technically, has sometimes descended. The valentines and fire-places ornaments in pink tissue paper may be considered real high art by the side of the deplorable French chromos representing women in bed. Two works of art—the largest and the smallest in the Exhibition—deserve attention. Nobody can overlook the vast "dry-goods" allegory, stretching many a rood, which Mr. Yvon has painted for Mr. Stewart, the great linendraper of New York, and in which all the States of the Union in the guise of fine young women, Liberty in a red cap, Minerva with her helmet, the ghost of George Washington, malefactors swinging on gibbets, dead bodies wriggling out of graves, and ever so much more—are all mixed up together in an unparalleled way. The gem of the show, however, is to be found in a modest alcove on the ground-floor. It is an etching by the great Cole himself; a mere nothing in size—three inches by two, perhaps—but overpowering in artistic depth and insight. It represents a gentleman seated on a bench outside a public-house, meditating perhaps on the bill he will immediately have to pay, or it may be on a remarkable phenomenon rising beside him, which might be either of a vegetable or meteorological character—a upas-tree or a water-spout; and it would no doubt be characteristic of the great showman to allow the public, when it has paid its money, to take its choice.

Among the wonders of the world which are supposed to be illustrated at South Kensington is the newspaper press. The walls of a dingy passage near the retiring-rooms are placarded with copies of newspapers and periodicals in English and other languages. There may be some people who find it peculiarly elevating and refreshing to contemplate this vast and varied array of printed matter, while others may not be able to resist a certain feeling of depression as they reflect on the brief and futile existence of a great proportion of these evanescent publications—the midges of literature, born one minute to die the next. The display of American papers is highly impressive, and as one gazes upon the Griggsville Reflector, or March Hawk Democrat, or the Daily Derrick of Oil City, one is enabled to appreciate the enormous moral and intellectual forces which permeate even the most secluded recesses of that great country, and which fully account for the philosophical temper and high political wisdom which it invariably displays, especially in its relations with the less civilized nations of the Old World. Our own press is also profusely represented, and the intelligent foreigner who explores this corridor will not fail to observe the Police News, with portraits of Lady Twist and the last new murderer, and Reynold's Newspaper, a nice emblem of sweetness and light, prominently enshrined in the midst of a group of religious publications, including the Record and John Bull. Under the patronage of Her Majesty's Commissioners, liquoring up has also, it appears, been elevated to a distinguished position among the fine arts. At every few paces you come upon a drinking-bar, and every effort has been made to cultivate the chronic alcoholism which the doctors tell us is consuming society. There are buffets on every side. There is a café in the French style, and an imitation of a German Bier-garten, and reckless drinkers can partake of Australian wines in the Queensland Annexe. Smoking is allowed in different parts of the Exhibition; and as the competition with Cremorne and the Surrey Gardens becomes more desperate, we shall perhaps have dancing added to the amenities of South Kensington. It is impossible not to be struck, on the one hand, by the poverty of the Exhibition and the grotesque—we might almost say revolting—degradation of art, which is its most conspicuous feature; and, on the other hand, by the imposing social organization which is supposed to discharge the duties of management. The Official Directory occupies ten pages of the Catalogue. First we have Her Majesty's Commissioners, thirty-eight in number, headed by the Prince of Wales and other members of the Royal Family, and including dukes and earls and other distinguished personages; next come twenty-seven Committees on all sorts of subjects; and then there are Deputy-Commissioners, Foreign Commissioners, Colonial Commissioners, and so on. The object of all these Committees and Commissioners is, of course, to secure social patronage and support for the Exhibition, the real management of which is necessarily left in the hands of one or two officials. The notion seems to have been borrowed from the usual arrangement at a public funeral, where a number of distinguished persons hold silken ropes, and appear to assist in carrying the coffin, which is in reality borne by two or three undertaker's men under the pall. Stripped of its artistic disguises, the Exhibition is little more than a shopkeeping bazaar and tavern under a high-sounding name and distinguished patronage.

A FREE-LOVE WIDOW.

LAST week a great Woman's Suffrage Convention was held in New York, at which Mrs. Woodhull presided, and she and other leaders of the women's rights party in the United States delivered thrilling harangues. It appears however that, although the demand for votes is still kept up by a certain class of American women, it is rather as a matter of form and in vindication of a principle than with a genuine and anxious desire that it should be successful. They seem to have come to the conclusion that, while they are logically bound to assert their equality in all respects with men, votes are of comparatively little consequence to them, and that they would perhaps be better without them. What they are most intent upon attaining is not so much political as social freedom. As one of them eloquently expresses it, "The old tyrannies are trembling for their power, not at the ballot-box, but at the fireside." If they could only erase all traces of the Seventh Commandment from modern legislation, or at least from the social compact, they would be pretty well satisfied. Mrs. Woodhull, for example, claims "an inalienable, constitutional, and natural right to love whom I may, to love for as long or as short a period as I can, and to change that love every day if I please." Under these conditions Mrs. Woodhull has no objection to marriage, and until a few weeks since she and her two husbands—we are not quite sure whether we should not say, two of her husbands—made a happy trio in the same house. It appears that her first husband died on the 6th of April, and a graceful "In Memoriam" from the bereaved widow, who has, however, still one husband at least left to console her, appears in the weekly paper which she edits and publishes. She is constrained to admit that "our former husband and later friend and brother" was by no means a perfect character. "Certain unhappy habits of life, with peculiarities of constitution, placed a not indefinite tenure upon the extension of his physical life." Dr. Woodhull, we gather, was too partial to the bottle; but then, as Mrs. Woodhull remarks, people are born to be what they are. Some people are constitutionally drunkards; others are constitutionally sober. "In either case there is neither merit nor demerit (sic), since both are alike the result of circumstances and causes beyond individual control." There is no use in struggling against fate. Mrs. Woodhull's own case is a remarkable illustration of this, for her biographer states that her second marriage was decreed by "those spirits whom she is ever ready to follow, whether they lead her for discipline into the valley of the shadow of death, or for comfort into those ways of pleasantness which are paths of peace." The dictates of the spirits, it may be observed, are always interpreted by Mrs. Woodhull herself. Colonel Blood, "the legal partner of a morally sundered marriage"—that is, he had a wife already but was tired of her—called on Mrs. Woodhull one day, and the instant she saw him she fell into a trance, during which she announced that his future destiny was to be linked with hers; and as he had no objection, so it was. After her divorce from Woodhull and marriage with Blood, she retained her first husband's name, and she and her two spouses, and her children by the first marriage, all lived together, a happy and united family. Dr. Woodhull, she says, felt the change severely, but "he was just enough to rejoice in knowing that the changed conditions offered a wider field of usefulness and happiness to us." The Doctor, it is evident, took a broad view of things, and was of an unconventional type.

Mrs. Woodhull confesses that at first, not being quite emancipated from old social prejudices, she rather shrank from having it known that she was keeping house with a couple of husbands. "It became a rod in the hands of unscrupulous persons, held in terror over our heads, to compel us to do their bidding, and most cruelly and unrelentingly did they make use of it." This, however, was only one of the trials reserved for all good and heroic people in this narrow-minded and uncharitable world; and she had the consciousness of her own moral elevation to sustain her, as well as the counsels of the spirits. But when, after the Doctor's death, it was suggested that perhaps an inquest would be necessary, "this," Mrs. Woodhull acknowledges, "was almost more than we could philosophically accept." It may be admitted that it is not agreeable to live in an atmosphere of suspicion of this kind, and we are afraid that Mrs. Woodhull can hardly say that her ways of pleasantness have been paths of peace. She appears, however, to have been exceptionally happy in finding a couple of husbands who took to each other with such frank and cordial affection as Dr. Woodhull and Colonel Blood, and who were so superior to worldly prejudicials. "These two people," she assures us, "were not rivals; they were brothers; and, in spite of all the attempts to make them enemies, they remained friends to the last; he who is still with us watching over the death-bed of him who has gone, with all the sleepless anxiety that danger imparts to those we love." Mrs. Woodhull will not say that she does not care for the approval of the world, but she prefers that of her own conscience and of the spirits; and perhaps on the whole it is just as well for her own peace of mind that she should do so. She is described by one of her admirers as the best representative of aggressive ideas in America; but very aggressive people find it difficult to commend the good opinion of society, especially when their aggressions are of the peculiar kind in which Mrs. Woodhull delights. Even King Arthur found his "white blamelessness" accounted blame, and a free-love heroine must not be surprised if the world does not all at once accept a mode of life which it has been accustomed to associate with harsh epithets as an embodiment of a highly superior kind of modesty and morality. It is difficult for a lady to pose as Sappho in these days without exciting unpleasant remarks. Indeed it appears to be one of the grievances of Mrs. Woodhull and her sisterhood that certain opprobrious names which we need not particularize are applied to women, while there are no corresponding names to apply to loose men; and one of the clauses of a Bill which has been drafted by the women's rights people, and which is published in Woodhull's Weekly, makes it an offence to designate any woman by these disreputable names. In the meanwhile it is open to the women to invent any names they like, and to apply them to men.

It is well known that nothing pays better than notoriety in America, and Mrs. Woodhull appears to have found it not unprofitable in her own case. She and one of her sisters carry on business as brokers; they have a weekly newspaper, which professes to be edited in one world and published in another; and they also do a good business as lecturers and spirit-mediums. It is evident that Mrs. Woodhull has a good many irons in the fire, and when the first sorrow is over she may find it perhaps rather a relief, in the midst of such varied avocations, to have one husband the less to look after. Mrs. Woodhull's journal is described as "a medley of politics, finance, free love, and the pantarchy"; and we find in the number before us some practical hints as to the free-love system. It is suggested that, as a matter of social convenience, it might be as well for free-love couples to give intimation to their friends and the public in some formal manner when a union is formed or dissolved. This regulation, it is urged, would be one of convenience only, and in no degree an oppressive abridgment of personal freedom. It would leave every person free to form a "marital alliance," and equally free to dissolve it. In the same number there is a stirring appeal to women to take up the work of estate and useless Man. The poor creature, it seems, has done his part, and now he can only "move in a circle and repeat in his revolutions society arrangements that have existed in the past." It appears that "he has arranged society in the structural form after the pattern of the stellar compacts and their rocky fragments," and it has now become the business of women to "arrange it in organic form after the patterns of the plant world." We gather that marriage as a limiting and enthralling institution is especially obnoxious to the plant world, and that one of the first things to be done is to get rid of it. Man, however, is not expected to submit to the proposed changes without a struggle. "It is not in man's aggressive nature," the writer fears, "to stop in a maddened revolutionary descent till he is at the bottom of the circle, drunk with blood and desolation; but on recovering from the stupor of desolation, he is ever ready again to ascend in the circle of progress to the summit of his capability." If "snitage," whatever that may be, were substituted for marriage, the power of the bloodthirsty monster would be effectually controlled. We hardly know whether it is male ribaldry or mere machinery, but in another part of the journal a pamphlet is mentioned, under the title of The Road to Power: Physical and Mental Regeneration, which the author asserts to be "priceless to wives and mothers, and such as are trying to be men." Seeing what creatures men are, it might be imagined that it would be a more beneficial process to make men feminine than to make women masculine.

It would be absurd of course to attribute any deep or serious influence to persons like Mrs. Woodhull, or to publications such as her weekly journal; but worthless straws will show how the wind blows, and the connexion between the free-love movement in America and the agitation for what are called women's rights is too close and conspicuous not to be remarked. Whatever gloss may be put upon it, there is no getting rid of the fact that the cardinal principle underlying the demands which are raised for a female franchise, for the legal independence of married women, and so on, is simply that marriage shall cease to be an absolute and permanent union in the sense in which it has hitherto been understood, and that it shall be reduced to a mere commercial partnership with limited liability. From this to free love is only a step, and not a very wide one. Under the new system a woman would be taught to regard herself as a person with separate rights and interests from her husband; the legal facilities which would be provided in order to enable her to assert her independence would supply a constant incentive to do so; and whenever any serious difference of opinion or quarrel arose, the minds of husband and wife would be turned, not as at present in the direction of compromise and conciliation, but rather to immediate separation. When married people know that they must make the best of each other, they naturally try to do so; but if it were once to be understood that they have separate interests and possessions, and a distinct legal existence, and that the only tie between them is a mere matter of commercial convenience, the natural consequence would be to destroy that unity of thought and sentiment upon which the permanent happiness of such a union so vitally depends. Of course, if personal convenience is to be the ruling principle of marriage, it would seem to follow that a marriage should be dissolved when the convenience has ceased; and thus we get to Mrs. Woodhull's theory that the duration of marriage should be measured solely by inclination, and that a woman has a right to take a new husband every day if she likes.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

II.

THE statistics of the Exhibition yield some interesting data. The works admitted are 245 in excess of the total number of last year; in other words, this one hundred and fourth anniversary shows a maximum never before approached. The tendency since the occupation of the new premises in Piccadilly has not unnaturally been to augment numbers in proportion to the increase in space; so cruel, indeed, is the disappointment when pictures are crowded out that liberal admission may be deemed an act of mercy. The only danger is lest the standard of excellence should be lowered. We are glad to say that this apprehension has proved groundless; in fact, the present collection presents the anomaly that while, on the one hand, the highest talent is exceptional, on the other, good average merit, save with a few Academicians and Associates, is all but universal. The unusually high average we ascribe to several causes. The first and chief is that members of the Academy are more moderately represented than heretofore. Fortunately they have not insisted on sending the full number of works permitted to them; out of forty Academicians and twenty-four Associates, only three reach the number of eight contributions, while twelve are satisfied with two, and eleven with one. Thus the much needed space is gained for the exceptional talent of new comers. Again the Exhibition profits by the general advance of art in the country at large; paucity of distinguished genius there may be, but of respectable talent, fairly well trained, there is an absolute plethora. And thus we may account for the anomalous fact this year presented for the first time, that with the increase in numbers the average standard has been raised. The statistics of the Exhibition, as we have said, afford data which point to interesting conclusions. The Academy is represented by only 58 contributors, while outsiders are present to the surprising number of 861; the collection owes to the Academy 194 works, but to outsiders it is indebted to the number of 1,369 works. The Exhibition then is mainly an assemblage of outsiders. These facts, rightly considered, are the reverse of a reproach to the management. If the Academy be an oligarchy, it is at least not without that show of wisdom which can alone make the government of the few endurable to the many. The Academy is proportion to its power is subject to attack, and bold criticism tends to the benefit of a public and responsible body. We will not dwell now on faults which have been and are but too patent; our immediate purpose is to point to the general spirit of fairness, and even of generosity, which has marked the conduct of the Academy within the last few years. The success of the present Exhibition is in part the consequence; a large and influential clientele bespeaks confidence; even the number of rejected pictures and of disappointed aspirants gives the measure of that power to which "all the talents" pay willing tribute. Assuredly nothing augments the success.

The present Exhibition proves the growing power of a school which for some years past has been struggling into life. Mr. Waite, R.A., Mr. Leighton, R.A., Mr. Pearson, R.A., Mr. Prinsep, Mr. Stanhope, Mr. W. D. Howland, and Mr. Drey, by choice of subject as well as by treatment, tend to an elevation of thought, an idealism and abstraction, wholly foreign to the realism and naturalism to which the vast majority of our painters were committed a few years back. Mr. Watts, who has justly been considered the father of the movement, exhibits his diploma work (558), taken from the story of Cain and Abel—"My punishment is greater than I can bear." Abel lies dead on the ground; Cain is driven out a fugitive on the face of the earth; a devouring fire descends upon his head; furies in the heavens pour out vengeance. The composition comes, as it were, in farvid heat from the artist's imagination, and only by imagination can it be accepted and understood. It is the victory of this all-potent faculty to make the past present, to make distant scenes near at hand, to annihilate time and space, and to take the mind into the immediate presence of the supernatural. Hence this bold composition essays to reconcile discrepant facts; two acts in the drama are brought into one—the time of Abel's death and the sequel when "the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother?" The tragedy of the situation is further enhanced by the immediate and visible presence of divine vengeance personified by furies amid flames. The wild spirit of Blake takes possession of the upper sky; the avenging powers, indeed, might almost have been transferred literally from Blake's illustrations to the Book of Job. We also fancy we can trace inspiration from the Greek drama and from classic marbles. The principles, indeed, expounded by Lessing in his Laocon are here maintained. The Laocon writhes in agony, but utters no shriek. Medea was not painted in the very act of murdering her children, but a few moments before or after; Ajax was not depicted raging among the herds, but meditative, and in such rest as is possible to unrest; and in like manner Mr. Watts has chosen the moment, not when the hand is raised or when the struggle of death is strong, but the after-time when dark remorse and black despair cloud the mind's horizon, and the murderer goes forth bearing a burden which no one shall lighten. The picture is something more than time present; it has a past and a future; the imagination is carried forward to the wilderness into which the figure rushes headlong. As to the execution, the painter does not rise above his habitual infirmity; the conception is imperfectly carried out; here and there a figure seems little more than a torso; and altogether the work can only be accepted as a magnificent fragment.

"The Lament of Ariadne" (498), by Mr. W. B. Richmond, is, of its kind, one of the most perfect and satisfactory works we have seen for many a year within the Academy. The grand figure, with head upturned in anguish, with arms impetuously thrown into the sky, and robe tossed by the storm, wanders on the wild shore desolate and in despair. The impersonation is as a statue endowed with life; it stands as nature idealized, as an individual made generic, and thus representative of humanity brought to extreme endurance. The work is inspired by the Greeks; thus the drapery, as in antique statues, is made to express onward movement; it becomes as it were a vital and organic part of the figure, while the generic type, and even the execution, respond to the manner of ancient bas-reliefs and gems. But the praise given to this and other cognate creations must fall short of the superlative degree, inasmuch as the classic, like the mediæval, revivals in the English school are little else than eclectic; persons familiar with the history of art have no difficulty in telling the sources whence ideas are taken. This eclecticism specially marks the scholastic and academic manner of Mr. Leighton. The clue to his success, and perhaps also the secret of his shortcomings, is that he paints up to an idea, and that, the conception once settled, the sequence is carried out with relentless logic. Sometimes the motive, as in the grand picture of Alcestis, is passion; but now, in the "Summer Moon" (202), the ruling sentiment is repose. The governing line is a circle, itself the emblem of eternity; the figures are disposed in sleep, as in eternal rest, within the architectural segment; the arms and limbs repeat each other in composition, like the refrain of some plaintive chant; the nightingale, "most musical, most melancholy" bird, wakes not the sleepers; stars are in the cool sky, and poppies lie upon the ground. The picture is almost too perfect; the melody is without a single discord; the execution is smooth and precise as a finely cut cameo; and, as in a cameo or Greek bas-relief, the figures lie on one plane. Another work which recommends itself by refinement, symmetry, and repose is Mr. Dacey's "Song of Solomon" (974). Two figures gracefully grouped and romantic in sentiment have gone forth into the vineyard. The drawing is careful, the tone tender, the colour subdued by a silvery haze common in the French school of Hamon. The picture as it now hangs wants force; indeed, a treatment thus delicately attuned is sure to suffer under the rude ordeal of our English exhibitions, which run into violence and seek effects by sudden contrasts.

The most conspicuous failure in the Exhibition is Mr. Poynter's "Perseus and Andromeda" (505); conspicuous for size, situation, and subject, but a failure from lack of unity and governing purpose. In fact this large gold frame does not contain one picture but three; Perseus, the dragon, and Andromeda are severally isolated. The artist has in vain striven for links and lines of connexion in the hero's spear and the monster's tail; the widely dissimilar materials hopelessly fall to pieces notwithstanding the effort to form the composition on the dragon's den. The subject has been so often treated that distinction is impossible; the chief novelty is that the dragon makes no such splash and fuss in the water as a sea-serpent, and yet the creature has no more power or terror than a stuffed stage property in a Christmas extravaganza. A dragon when well put together is a noble beast; witness Tamar's awe-moving dragon in the Garden of Hesperides. The picture was near being saved by Andromeda, a lovely creation conceived in the fine spirit of Greek art, which recalls the artist's admirable rendering of the character two years ago. It is needless for us to pay tribute to the signal abilities of Mr. Poynter, inasmuch as the present breakdown is merely a case of talent misapplied. Mr. Prinsep's "Penelope" (205) is not without grandeur and colour. The figure is statuesque, and yet is imbued with the life, the passion, and the suffering patience of a woman. The disquietude of anguish, the burden of distress, are finely rendered; and in the tone and execution are to be admired the delicately-wrought folds and the opalescent greys in the white robe thrown into relief by a richly coloured background. The style of Mr. Prinsep admits of no surrender; it is independent as it is powerful. The hangers have once more denied a favourable position to the student work of Mr. Stanhope, and we cannot altogether blame them. The theme here chosen, "Cephalus and Procris" (270), was comparatively early in entering Italian art; Piero di Cosimo in the fifteenth century was much given to mythology, of which we have pleasing illustration in an eccentric but fascinating composition, "The Death of Procris," in our National Gallery. We take it to be the misfortune of Mr. Stanhope that his style is neither ancient nor modern; he aims at incompatibilities; his landscape is large, and yet his figures are too large for his landscape; then his figures are at once graceful and awkward; again, as we have indicated, in certain passages the old masters are present, and then suddenly intrudes some anomalous trait of the nineteenth century. Our classic revivalists tread hazardous paths, and unless they take heed to their steps, instead of gaining the hill-top, they may find themselves in the ditch beneath; so true is it that there is but one step between the sublime and the ridiculous.

The false and downward steps which land artists in contempt or oblivion it were well to hide from observation. It seems, however, to be the supreme privilege of painters to cling to the very last to the hope of immortality. And such hope forlorn it is the special function of the Academy to sustain; though youth may be blighted, age shall be blessed. "The Streamlet" (213) is a name used by Mr. H. W. Pickering, R.A., for a carefully painted female nude; yet such a study would not in the year 1872 obtain for a scholar entrance to Burlington House or South Kensington. Another curiosity and anachronism in its way is the diploma work "deposited in the Academy on the election as Academician" of Mr. Frost, R.A. This "Nymph and Cupid" (126) might reach the ideal of "beautiful for ever"; or, to speak more critically, we might say that if Canova's weakest models were turned into wax, and then well rouged like a barber's block, the perfect work we now gaze on would be nearly realized. Mr. O'Neill's "Minna and Brenda" (228) we will not venture to criticize, partly because the work speaks for itself, and also because the painter has publicly expressed himself averse to criticism. As the Associate longest on the list, with the exception of Mr. Thornburn, he still awaits his reward at the hands of the Academy. We must apologize for naming pictures which by common consent are passed over in silence. But this painful duty we owe to the men of promise who year after year are kept outside the door of the Academy; an unworthy inmate cherished means a worthy aspirant excluded, a despicable picture hung means a deserving work ousted.

REVIEWS.

JONES'S CONQUEST AND SETTLEMENT OF BRITAIN.*

UNDER a somewhat long and cumbersome title Major Jones has succeeded in producing a very sound and useful little book. In spite of the modest disclaimers of his preface, he has really given us a brief history of the period from the first English invasion of Britain to the close of the Norman Conquest, founded, if not on the original authorities themselves, at any rate on the best modern works which have illustrated the subject. We don't think Major Jones need have been frightened at Beda and the Chronicle, but it is at any rate a distinct proof of the advance of sound historical ideas when a popular account of our earlier annals is drawn from the researches of Sir Francis Palgrave, Mr. Kemble, and Mr. Freeman. Its author has not only read books like The Saxons in England or The English Commonwealth, but he has understood what he read, and he has the additional merit of expressing his conclusions in a simple and manly way. The fault of the book as a history of our early kings is precisely what Major Jones's frank disclaimer of any acquaintance with original sources might lead us to expect. The tone is throughout modern. We never feel the air—so to say—of the time itself. The wild bursts of barbaric cruelty or barbaric self-devotion, the instances of profound reverence, deepening on the one side into a tender religion, on the other into a degrading superstition, which break so oddly the generic entries of the Chronicle or crowd the picturesque pages of * Considerations on the Military and Political Events accompanying the Conquest and Settlement of the Island of Britain by the Saxons, Danes, and Normans. With an Introductory Chapter on the Occupation of the Island by the Romans. By Major William Prime Jones, 7th Surrey Rifle Volunteers, late 5th Fusiliers. London: Beaumont & Son. 1872.

Boda, are all absent. The actual life of those early ages, all its higher enthusiasms or baser corruptions, nowhere meets us. We never see the "angel faces" in the Roman market, or the thanes dying in a ring round their lord, or the missionary preaching in the waste, or the slaves dragged for export to the port of Bristol. Based as it is on modern works, whose principal aim was that of explaining the political side of English history, Major Jones's little work is simply political. But it is far from being a servile copy of the authorities on which it is founded. Scattered throughout the book we find evidences of original thought, which are often singularly to the purpose. Its author seizes at once the cardinal distinction between the barbaric invasions of Britain and of the Roman provinces of the Continent, and the inference he draws from it is one of some interest:—

In taking a retrospective view of this great struggle, two facts principally strike us. The protracted and gallant resistance made by the Britons, so different from the behaviour of the other provinces of the Empire; and the stern determination of the invaders, backed by their ever increasing numbers. For had the attacks been made, as some have supposed, by mere bands of adventurers, however large, such victories as those gained by the Britons must have driven them into the sea.

Had the event been different, had the Britons submitted with but slight resistance, or had the Saxons been repulsed, the whole course of modern history would have been changed. In the former case we should have seen another image of France and Spain, a country of Teutonic Lords and Celtic Serfs, with perhaps another Norman Duchy in the Northern corner of the Island; in the latter we should have had a second Ireland, as she existed before the English Conquest. But in both cases the course of the world would have been very different. Constitutional liberty would not have existed, or would have appeared only in this nineteenth century; the dominion of the sea would have belonged to Spain, and the Western world would have been the inheritance of priests and Jesuits, ruling over the degenerate descendants of Spanish and Portuguese adventurers.

It is in its military remarks, however, that the especial value of this little book really consists. We are very far from thinking that the apology of the preface is needed, or that a soldier's comments on the wars of this early time are out of place. On the contrary, we have often wished that some one thoroughly acquainted with tactics and strategy would devote himself to the numberless military problems of our history. When Major Jones points out that the Danish army, "by their sudden seizure of Chippenharn, cut off the eastern parts of Alfred's kingdom, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, from all communication with the western part," or adds that "Wiltshire is a particularly open country fitted for the rapid movement of" the Danish horse, "so that all attempts of detached bodies of the Saxons to pass and join their king would be certain to be frustrated," he explains the great historic difficulty of Alfred's sudden prostration, and of his refuge in the Isle of Athelney. It throws a new light on Alfred's genius when we find a soldier pronouncing his later campaign against Hastings "the earliest example of a really scientific warfare in Northern Europe since the overthrow of the Roman Empire." The great principles of war, indeed, are as simple as they are great, and we quite agree with Major Jones in his conviction that they were as present to the mind of a man of genius in the ninth century as in the nineteenth; but it is only by such a careful analysis as he has given us of Alfred's operations that we can dissipate the ordinary notion of all early struggles being mere "battles of kites and crows."

The first warlike operation, however, in the course of our national history which can be said to have been preserved with anything like detail is the invasion and victory of William the Conqueror. It is odd enough that in the novel which he wrote on the subject Sir Charles Napier never seems to have discerned the startling difficulties which surround the account of William's landing, of Harold's march, or the battle between the two rivals for the throne, and it is only here and there that we are aided by Major Jones. But wherever he does aid us, the help is real enough. As in all early accounts of military operations, the first difficulty is that of numbers. The "fifty" or "sixty thousand men" given by William's chaplain have been accepted by our historian, and apparently even by Mr. Freeman though not without protest; and yet, as Major Jones remarks, "if the number of ships which carried them is correctly given at seven hundred and ninety-four, each ship must have had on board nearly a hundred soldiers, exclusive of the crew, horses, stores, arms, &c., a fact hardly credible." But surely even this is more credible than the facts which precede and follow the passage of the Channel. Nothing can be more exact than the account which William's biographer gives us of the embarkation and landing of the army; but with Mr. Kinglake's account of the Crimean expedition fresh in our memories, is it possible to believe that 60,000 men, or a third of that number, were fairly embarked in less than twelve hours, or that an army which had only appeared off the beach of Pevensey on the morning of Thursday, the 28th of September, was not only landed, but thoroughly equipped, and able to march on Hastings by the 29th? The smaller size of the mediæval transports would no doubt greatly facilitate both operations, but we should have been glad had Major Jones examined the question from a soldier's point of view. He is naturally startled with the statement as to Harold's march. "A Saxon thane saw the landing of the Normans on the 28th September, and instantly started to convey the news to the King. He may have found him at York on the 1st or 2nd of October. The battle of Hastings was fought on the 14th; therefore Harold must have accomplished the whole distance, allowing for his five or six days' halt in London, in a week, being at the rate of seven-and-thirty miles a day, as a march "one of the most wonderful on record." If, however, we accept Mr. Freeman's conjecture that Harold hastened from York simply with his "bus-carle," who may have been mounted, his own march presents no special difficulties; but the presence of soldiers from York and Somerset at Senlac implies a rate of marching wholly without parallel in modern experience. It is true that the great Roman roads were no doubt in far better condition than any English road up to the close of the eighteenth century; but they can hardly have been better than the French highways of our own day, across which the Crown Prince, pushing by forced marches to the great conflict of Sedan, hardly exceeded fifteen miles a day in actual progress. In his criticism of Harold's strategy before Senlac Major Jones appears to us perfectly just. He condemns his march to the coast as a grave military error:—

The defender of a country invaded from the sea has no business whatever to seek his enemy on the coast. The hostile fleet is a moveable base, and he may, while proceeding to one point, find the invaders landed at another, and placed between him and the country he has to defend. It is true that William was already landed, but still nothing was to be gained by intercepting him near the sea. The two reasons given by historians for Harold's proceedings will neither of them hold water. The first is, that he hoped to surprise the Normans; but an army chiefly composed of cavalry, under such a general as William, is not to be caught in that manner. The second reason is equally untenable—namely, that Harold could not sit still and see the country entrusted to him ravaged and ruined by an enemy; while in reality the whole country between Pevensey and Reigate was one dense forest, in which the Normans could have done little or no mischief, had they so attempted. Had Harold halted on the hills at Pluckley, behind Ashford, he would not only have gained time to augment and discipline his new levies, but he would have cut off William from the coast road, which he afterwards took; it being impossible, previous to a battle, either to have attacked Dover, in the near neighbourhood of the English army, or to have passed between them and the force stationed in the town. William would consequently have been constrained to seek Harold by marching his great body of horse through the woods of the Andred's Wald, at least a two days' march, with little or no provisions to be obtained. When the enemy was found, he must be then attacked, posted on a line of heights almost impregnable, and where cavalry would have been nearly unserviceable.

In the same judicious way Major Jones points out that it was only the absence of light troops and missile weapons on the English side which enabled William "to attack a palisaded position with an army chiefly cavalry." The Norman horse were able to ride close up to the entrenchments, and in the end to push their way through the breaks in them. We wonder, however, that while commenting on the first English battle in which the bow played a principal part, a soldier should have omitted to notice the use of that weapon. Considering its deadly effect in the later stage of the battle, it is one of the most puzzling of the problems connected with Senlac why we hear nothing of the Norman bowmen during the earlier attacks on the stockade. On the question of the sudden disappearance of both the English and the Norman fleets Major Jones is as much at sea as other people. The English ships, which had been masters of the sea through the summer, had undoubtedly returned to London when the army which had been guarding the coast broke up before Stamford Bridge; but their reappearance in the Channel after William's landing would have made his position a highly perilous one. William's own fleet, however, becomes equally invisible as soon as its work of transport is over, and we hear nothing of it in his operations against London.

In his general account of the designs and conduct of William Major Jones has trodden faithfully enough in the footsteps of Mr. Freeman, but his view of one event in the course of it is so different from that which Mr. Freeman has adopted as to be worth notice. The oath which William extorted from Harold while in his power is one of the standing problems of the story of the Conquest; but the solution which is here suggested is a novel, and rather a startling, one. Mr. Freeman takes it for granted that at the time of Harold's presence in Normandy his designs on the English throne must have been notorious to William and the world. It is quite possible, however, to take the contrary for granted, and to believe with Major Jones that "the affair was considered between them in a friendly spirit":—

It would naturally take this aspect. No male descendant of the House of Cerdic now remained except a child, and the English had often set aside the claims of children. Since the deaths of Harold and Hardicanute, none of the kindred of the Great Canute had advanced any claim, save an abortive one by Magnus of Norway, to which no one paid attention. The parties would, therefore, behold the Kingdom of England in danger of being without a ruler, for Harold, though certain movements of ambition may have stirred within him, must have been aware that no King had ever been chosen save one of the House of Cerdic or of the blood Royal of Denmark. Now William, although his countrymen had become, what we term, Frenchified, must still have felt that he was a Northman and the son of a Northman, of the kindred of Ingwar and Hastings, of Sweyn and Canute. He was, moreover, a cousin to the reigning King of the country.

He had seen the rule of the Danish monarchs accepted by the whole people, and conducted peaceably and prosperously. And what more probable than that the nation, both Danes and English, would accept him, of the same stock as the one, and related by marriage and friendship with the other.

On this theory Harold may have been perfectly sincere in the promise which he made to aid in William's election. All that the Conqueror claimed, it must be remembered, was the right of presenting himself, in virtue of Edward's recommendation, as a candidate for the throne, and in such a case Harold's support would have been invaluable. Reflections of this sort at any rate prove that, while steadily following in the main the march set out for him by the best modern historians, Major Jones is no mere servile follower. He thinks while he reads, and his thoughts are, as a rule, very sensible and suggestive.

The book is, on the whole, so genuine and accurate that we may pass lightly over its occasional blunders. The law of Canute, or the canons of Councils, which at a later time forbade the worship of sun, moon, river, or tree, afford no basis for the "very curious fact that in remote and out-of-the-way corners of the island Druidism long partially survived." Nature-worship is the most universal, as it is the most primary, of all forms of faith, and as popular with the Teuton as with the Celt. We do not know why "Myrena-rice" is construed "the wooded state" (we suppose from some supposed etymological connexion of the word with "mirk" or "mirky") instead of the "mark" or border-state. A look at Bosda would have corrected Major Jones's impression that "of Redwald or the time of his death hardly anything is known." We know him at any rate as the contriver of an ingenious compromise between Christianity and heathendom, as well as the protector of Eadwine and the conqueror of Ælthelforth in the battle of the Idle. We regret that after Mr. Freeman's examination of the question Major Jones should still adopt the Northern Saga as an historic authority for the battle of Stamford Bridge. These, however, are mistakes of an ordinary sort; but there is one topic on which the author of this little book flings history and common sense to the winds. The Picts have been stumbling-blocks to many writers before Major Jones, but amidst all the queer hypotheses that they have suggested to queer brains we cannot remember one quite so queer as that which he has presented to us. We will not dispute with him as to their expulsion from the Cimbrian Chersonese "by the advancing Teutons," for the very simple reason that neither Pict nor Teuton have been good enough to tell us anything about it, but we rub our eyes with amazement at their conduct when they arrived in Britain:—

They next spread themselves into the South-Western parts of the present kingdom of Scotland, where, after the departure of the Romans, they founded the Regnum Cambrense, or kingdom of Strath Clwyd.

There is little doubt that the language of the Picts, was Welsh; and it forms one of the most curious puzzles of the times of which we treat, that, after the withdrawal of the Romans, the most prominent characters in the island have Welsh names, and that the Welsh language is so largely intermixed with Latin words, although we have no reliable evidence of the existence of Cymraeg tribes in South Britain, during the period of the Roman dominion.

Of the meaning of this wonderful paragraph we have not the faintest idea. That Strath Clwyd was on one side the Forth of Clyde and Pictland on the other we take to be pretty certain; and as there are only two Pictish words preserved to us, and those have not the least similarity to the tongue of the Cymry, we don't know how the Pictish tongue can be undoubtedly Welsh, save in the broad sense in which everything is Welsh which is not English. Not only did "Cymraeg tribes" exist in Britain under the Romans, but no other tribes did; and why Welsh people having Welsh names should be a "curious puzzle" to Major Jones is simply a curious puzzle to us. But, after all, a very sane man may be allowed a temporary outbreak of lunacy over the Picts, and we should be sorry if our readers took their notion of the book from this wonderful extract. It is really a very sensible and useful little work, and if its author will only spell English names in an English and not Latin way, and discard the silly term of "Saxon" when he is talking of Englishmen, we shall be glad to welcome him again as a writer of English history.

POSEIDON.

THIS little mythological study marks a stage in human development the exact likeness of which we do not remember to have lighted on before. We are perfectly familiar with the sect who, living outwardly in scientific times, do yet live inwardly in pre-scientific; who study their Bryant and believe in their Cuthites as if scientific mythology had never appeared at all. We are familiar too with the sect represented by that wonderful Mr. Kavanagh whose philological work we reviewed some time back, the sect who know that there are scientific writers, and who know what the scientific writers have said, but who maintain that the scientific writers are all wrong, and that they themselves alone are right. Then there is a third sect, of whom we do not venture to say that they know what scientific writers have said, but who quote them with great respect and professed agreement, and yet go and maintain some doctrine which is utterly inconsistent with all scientific teaching. Mr. Gladstone, when he wrote his Homeris studies, was not wholly untouched by this state of mind. He had read, and he several times quotes, Professor Max Müller's famous Oxford Essay, but he went and set forth his own amazing theogonies all the same. Professor Rawlinson too professed a firm belief in Comparative Philology, and then went and thought that the French dans might have something to do with some Lycian or Phrygian dam or dev. We do not enlarge on the kindred derivation of lady, because an Ancient History Professor is surely bound to understand Latin, while we fancy that he is in no way bound to understand English. But Mr. Robert Brown, Junior, does not belong exactly to any of these schools. He has plainly read several of the scientific writers, and we think that he has understood them. He has quite got beyond the stage when people think that the object of Comparative Philology is to prove that Greek is derived from Sanscrit. He seems to us fully to grasp what the Solar theory is, and he makes criticisms on some parts of its most thoroughgoing form which we venture to think are not wholly wide of the mark. He fights vigorously against Mr. Cox on several points, but he has clearly read his Aryan Mythology, and he pronounces it to be a "truly great work." In short, he draws a distinction which is perhaps not an unreasonable one. He is ready to go as far as Professor Müller, but not so far as Mr. Cox. Yet, with all this, he goes off into a vast deal of Oriental talk, both of the wild and of the heavy variety, which is quite inconsistent with any scientific method. He not only quotes Professor Rawlinson, Mr. Ferguson, and Mr. Isaac Taylor, but he goes to Mr. Canaland, who writes about "Sermons in Stones" and "Builders of Babel," and he even quotes as "ingenious" a frantic book called the Two Babylons which we reviewed many years back, and the object of which is to prove that the worship of the Roman Church is the "worship of Nimrod and his wife." We are not quite sure whether he ever quotes Bryant, but he is deep in Gale's Court of the Gentiles. We do not think that he ever talks about the Outhites, but to the unsophisticated Aryan mind, "Aithiopes or Cushites," backed by Hyksos, Phoenicians, and Philistines, are nearly as frightful. He has so much to say about Hamites and things Hamitic that for a moment we looked forward to being benumbed or electrified by a "polarization of religious consciousness," or to being left hopelessly floundering in "the deposit of Sinism." These fears, we are happy to say, proved vain. But we are sorry to add that on one crucial point we have weighed Mr. Brown in the balance and have found him wanting. He is not at all positive, still less is he savage, but he would clearly be well pleased to make out Irish round towers to be something, else than Irish round towers. We also think that we have once or twice seen signs of that odd failure in scholarship by which some people, in trying to make out derivations for Greek words, bring the ending into the etymological process as well as the root. On the other hand, Mr. Brown fully grasps the fact that Greek and English are kindred tongues, and that an Englishman has a full right to get at Greek without going through Latin. Indeed he goes further than any one whom we have yet seen in spelling Greek names Greek-fashion—a process in which, while admiring his daring, we have not always daring enough of our own to follow him.

What Mr. Brown's view of the God Poseidón really is we should perhaps know more clearly if his small book were still smaller, and if Poseidón were not so long put out of sight by illustrations of the Hyksos, Phoenicians, Aithiopes or Cushites, and Philistines. The Kyklópes are more in their place in a discussion on the father of Polyphémus. But we gather that Poseidón started from Chaldaea and got into Greece by way of Phœnicia, Philistia, and Libya; that he is the same as Dagon and Oannes; and we get a hint that, though we must not "hastily conclude" that Mr. Brown regards Poseidón as "absolutely representing the patriarch Noah," yet he wishes to point out the strong connexion between the two. For Mr. Brown, who thinks that "the Natural Phenomena Theory" is "admirably useful," thinks that "the Eúmeristic Theory" is "admirably useful" also, and that "to ignore the merits of either, and consequently to depend wholly on the other, must necessarily be productive of serious error in many instances." And we get into a great deal more about "Aun" and "Dag-aun" and "Sid-aun" and "Hœ-Ana," and we are told, on the authority of Professor Rawlinson, that "there are no means of strictly determining the precise meaning of the word Hœ in Babylonian." This strikes us as exceedingly likely; but we shake our heads a bit when the Professor and Mr. Brown ask leave to connect—only "provisionally," to be sure—the Babylonish word of which they do not know the meaning "with the Arabic Hiya, which is at once 'life' and 'serpent,'" and when they go on, "on very strong grounds" attested by Sir Henry Rawlinson, but of whose nature we hear nothing, to "connect Hia or Hœ with the serpent of Scripture," with "paradisiacal tradition," and what not. We are old fogies enough to have scruples about the process of "provisionally connecting" a word in one language which we do not understand with a word in some other language which we do. It is at least not a received practice among Aryan scholars, though doubtless Hamites and Scythas are privileged above us. It is perhaps worth mentioning that it is just at this stage, when Mr. Brown's head is full of Aun and Hœ, and Professor Rawlinson and the Eúmeristic theory, that he quotes the Two Babylons with evident respect.

All this points to a very odd state of mind. It is a sort of thing which we are perfectly used to when it stands by itself, but we are not used to it when it comes in company with the amount of real scholarship and criticism which Mr. Brown shows in other places. His malady would seem to be local; he is like those Scottish antiquaries who scatter to the winds the follies of their Irish or Cornish brethren, and then go home and hug themselves in the possession of the real Latin epitaph of a grandson of Woden. But out of all this Mr. Brown has somehow to prove that Poseidón was not by birth a Greek, or even an Aryan, God, and that his original calling was not that of a God of the Sea. His connexion with the horse, with the bull, with the Kyklópes, with the walls of Illos, is brought to show that he was not in his first origin watery. His name Poseidón or Potidas proves nothing; it is in vain to show his connexion with the root wer or wec, for that root means "to drink," and what is wanted is to prove his connexion with sea-water, which nobody drinks. Yet somehow in the course of his travels he has got mixed up with personages sacred and profane, who are most of them of a somewhat watery nature. We can hardly bring ourselves to think of the patriarch Noah except in connexion with the Flood, and the idol Dagon is surely a fishy, and therefore by implication a watery, being. But we confess that to find out the nature of Poseidon by going even to Noah and Dagon—much more than to the Babylonian personage the precise meaning of whose name Professor Rawlinson has no means of strictly determining—is one of those inquiries which are far too subtle for our faculties. We must be content to stick to arguments which we can understand; and to us it seems that, if we are not allowed to look on Poseidon as a genuine Greek God of the Sea, we must strike out Apollo and Demeter from the roll of the Olympian Privy Council, and—we half shrink from writing it—depose Zeus himself without having so much as Dinos to play the part of a divine Henry of Lancaster. The position of all four in the Hellenic mythology is exactly the same. Mr. Brown brings in the elder sea-god Nereus as an argument against the claims of Poseidon. And we do not deny that, to the conservative minds of the Eumenides or of the Ocean-symphs in the Promætheus, Poseidon might well seem to be a usurper of the rights of Nereus. But then he is simply one of the many young gods who had lately arisen, and who had so irreverently trampled down the old ones. If we wished to be particular, we might even say that the word νεκρωταλεις, which the venerable representatives of past time apply to the doings of the new generation, would have a special propriety if applied to the creator of the horse. But anyhow the whole of these intrusive deities must stand or fall together. Nereus and Poseidon are like other people, only instances of a law. Almost throughout the Greek mythology we see a tendency to provide each element with a twofold ruler; there is an elder God, of a more purely physical and elementary kind, who hardly reaches to the dignity of a person, and who, though doubtless entitled to appear in the General Assembly on Olympus, has no place as a member of its inner Council. Such earlier deities are Ouranos, Gaia, Helios, and Nereus; they are hardly persons, they are hardly to be distinguished from the physical objects over which they preside. Alongside, or rather over and above, each of these is a younger deity, whose personality is much more distinct, and who throws the elder power into the shade, without wholly depriving him either of his being or of his divinity. Zeus stands in this relation to Ouranos, Demeter to Gaia, Phoebus Apollo to Helios, and it is not unlikely that Aidēs, the lord of the lower world of men, properly stands in the same relation to Tartarus, the lord of the under world, or the under world itself, not of men, but of Gods. Now, unless we have Poseidon to fill the same place with regard to Nereus, our series is left sadly incomplete. It is not for us to say how Zeus, Apollo, and Demeter came in this way to supplant Ouranos, Helios, and Gaia. We only say that, however it was, Poseidon supplanted Nereus in the same way, and that, if Poseidon is to be deprived of his rights as being a Libyan or Philistine stranger, the same measure of disfranchisement must be dealt out to Zeus, Demeter, and Apollo. And the thought that Apollo, the very lord of light and sweetness and culture, could anyhow come to be branded as a Philistine, really overpowers us. And the difficulty about Poseidon having to do with matters which do not seem quite in his line as lord of the sea is met by exactly the same difficulty in the case of Apollo. No sound mythologist can doubt that Apollo was at first the sun, as he again became at last. Yet Apollo is engaged in many matters which seem to have as little to do with his duties as lord of the sun as any of the doings of Poseidon have to do with his duties as lord of the sea. As for his relation to the horse, when we remember the ἵππο-λυστος of our own Chronicles and the white horses of O'Donoghue in the sister island, when we remember how many poets have likened waves to horses and horses to waves, ships to horses and horses to ships, the connexion between the horse and the God of the sea seems to us the most natural thing in the world, even without asking whether ἵππος, equus, agua, our own cock and our own ea, have etymologically anything to do with one another.

* Poseidón: a Link between Semite, Hamite, and Aryan. Being an Attempt to Trace the Cultus of the God to its Sources, with Illustrations of the History of the Kyklópes, Hyksos, Phœnicians, Aithiopes or Cushites, and Philistines. By Robert Brown, Jun., F.R.S. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

LETTERS AND JOURNALS OF LORD ELGIN.

It is not often that a reader wishes to hear more of a biographer; but the self-restraint which Mr. Walrond has shown in editing the Letters and Journals of Lord Elgin leaves something of this effect on the mind. The few sentences of connecting narrative, and the still fewer sentences of comment, might have been made more numerous with real benefit to the object of the book. A writer who knows how to bring out the lesson of many pages of correspondence in a word or two might well have used his power with less reserve. As it is, Mr. Walrond's part in the work is a model to be held up for imitation. Lord Elgin's life lends itself to this mode of treatment. It is marked off into three distinct divisions—Canada, China, and India—and in each the materials are of a kind which tell their own tale. As regards the first, the years from 1817 to 1824 are already remote enough to deprive despatches and official letters of that resemblance to a blue-book which attaches to them while the circumstances of their origin are fresh in recollection. During his two expeditions to China Lord Elgin kept an almost daily journal for Lady Elgin. It is not quite clear why more use was not made of this latter source of information for the first half of his short life in India. It would have been interesting to learn how Indian facts impressed Lord Elgin when they first presented themselves before his eyes, and what were the observations on which the views expressed in more formal correspondence were originally founded. Mr. Walrond mentions, however, that, as his first hot season in Calcutta went on, "his journal contains more and more frequent notices of the oppressive heat of the weather and its effects upon his own health." "I do not think," Lord Elgin says in one place, that the doctor "is particularly proud of the way in which I am bearing up against this oppressive and depressive season"; and it is possible that this foreshadowing of the end which was to come scarcely a year later may have made his observations less quick, or his records of what he saw less full. But there is abundant material in what Mr. Walrond has actually printed to secure for Lord Elgin that familiar recognition among those who come after him which he "was prevented by the peculiar circumstances of his public course from enjoying among his contemporaries." An intimate friend said of him after his death, that his distinguishing characteristic was disinterestedness; "he seemed utterly incapable of regarding any subject except with a view to the interests of his country." The form in which this disinterestedness showed itself was one which is especially rare in modern political life. He never sought to escape responsibility. His argument always was, If I make a mistake, the blame and all the other consequences will fall upon me; if I leave it to be made by some one else, the blame and the other consequences may fall on the Government which I represent. The most conspicuous instance of this quality is his conduct in Canada in 1849. A Bill had been introduced in the Assembly to give compensation to persons whose property had been wantonly destroyed by persons acting in support of the authorities during the rebellion of 1837 and 1838. This Bill gave great offence to the Canadian Tories, although something of the kind had been rendered inevitable by their own policy when in power. When the Bill had passed through the Canadian Parliament, a number of petitions were addressed to Lord Elgin, praying him to reserve it for the consideration of the Home Government. The question was an important one, for it concerned the payment of compensation to rebels on what might be treated as merely technical grounds, and many men would have seen in this fact a sufficient reason for handing over the decision of it to a superior authority. By so doing Lord Elgin might have avoided an amount of unpopularity which exposed him to danger of life and limb. He would not have been greeted with showers of stones when he drove through the streets of Montreal, or have had afterwards to choose between keeping away from the city and entering it at the cost of civil bloodshed. But by so doing Lord Elgin would have preferred his own comfort to the interests of England, and where the issue was thus clear he made no attempt to disguise it from himself. "I considered," he wrote, "that by reserving the Bill I should only cast on Her Majesty and Her Majesty's advisers a responsibility which ought to rest on my own shoulders." It was certain that the act of giving his assent to this Bill would be misrepresented at home; it was not impossible that the English Government might disapprove what he had done. But Lord Elgin felt assured that the Bill must in the end become law, and that whoever was the instrument of its becoming law would be exposed to great obloquy. An unpopular step had to be taken, and it was better that it should be taken by the Governor than by a Minister who would be supposed by the Canadian populace to be merely the mouthpiece of the Queen's personal will.

In this case Lord Elgin accepted responsibility when it brought with it physical discomfort and annoyance. At a later period he accepted responsibility when it involved still greater self-denial. When Lord Elgin determined to lend to Lord Canning, for the suppression of the mutiny in India, the troops which had been given him for the purposes of his mission in China, he condemned himself to six months of tedious inaction, and risked the success of the work which he had just taken in hand. As it happened, the sacrifice was appreciated, because the result showed how necessary it had been. But if things in India had turned out differently, and Lord Canning's request had proved to have been prompted by exaggerated fears, Lord Elgin might have been told that it was no business of his to do Lord Canning's work, and that the Government expected its emissaries to obey orders even when their own judgment led them to think that those orders ought to be modified. But Lord Elgin knew that patriotism demands sacrifices of reputation as well as of comfort, and he had the reward of hearing from Sir William Peel that "it was the Chinese Expedition that relieved Lucknow, relieved Cawnpore, and fought the battle of the 6th of December." Lord Elgin's Chinese journals are still interesting, notwithstanding that the story has been told by other hands, and that China is no longer an unfamiliar land to English travellers. The most striking feature in them is the way in which his hatred of anything like oppression of a population whom he could not regard as in any way responsible for the acts which he was commissioned to avenge, was tempered by his sense of the utility of half measures. "I have seen," he writes, "more to disgust me with my fellow-countrymen, than I saw during the whole course of my previous life, since I have found them in the East among populations too timid to resist and too ignorant to complain. I have an instinct in me which loves righteousness and hates iniquity, and all this keeps me in a perpetual boil." The whole contemplating the bombardment of Canton on unprovoked with a million inhabitants, he writes, "It was impossible for me to do otherwise than as I have done. I could not have abandoned the demand to enter the city without compromising our position in China altogether, and opening the way to calamities even greater than those now before us." The deliberate burning of the Summer Palace at Peking was another instance of how inexorable Lord Elgin could be when he had once determined that strong measures were necessary. Yet all this time his sympathy with the better side of the Chinese character, and his desire to get to understand it as thoroughly as was possible in so short a stay, continued undiminished. He seems to have been proof against the temptation to dislike that which he despised, which is so fatal in dealing with inferior races. There is no more suggestive criticism of the Chinese mind than his remark, made at the dinner of the Royal Academy in 1861, that "at all points of the circle described by man's intelligence, it seems occasionally to have caught glimpses of a heaven far beyond the range of its ordinary ken and vision." The invention of gunpowder has led the Chinese, not to military supremacy, but to the construction of crackers. Their knowledge of the mariner's compass has never carried them beyond the coasting junk. Their printing presses have given them nothing but editions of Confucius, and their occasional glimpses of the beautiful in colour and design have had for their principal products "the most cynical representations of the grotesque." Lord Elgin's appreciation of these occasional gleams of something higher than they have ever attained did not lead him to look too favourably on the dead level of their ordinary civilization; his perception of how low this level was did not blind him to the evidences presenting themselves here and there of a capacity for something better.

* Letters and Journals of Lord Elgin. Edited by Theodore Walrond, Esq. London: John Murray. 1872.

This quality eminently fitted its possessor for the post of Governor-General of India. Lord Canning had been endowed with it in a very large measure, and there seemed to be a special propriety in the continuation of his work being entrusted to Lord Elgin. He had been with Lord Canning at Calcutta "when there was hardly a countenance save that of the Governor-General's which was not blanched with fear"—when, except from the Governor-General, scarcely a sentence was to be heard from man or woman "which was reconcilable with the hypothesis that Christianity had ever come into the world." When he came back to India to fill Lord Canning's place he found the same disposition prevailing without the same partial excuse. One of the first decisions he had to arrive at was whether an English soldier who had killed a native, without deliberation indeed, but "in wanton recklessness, almost without provocation, under an impulse which would have been resisted if the life of the victim had been estimated at the value of that of a dog," should have his sentence of death commuted. The murder had been committed in the Punjab, and there was quite enough doubt on the question of jurisdiction to have justified Lord Elgin in referring the case to the Lieutenant-Governor. But he felt that the delay, "and, above all, the appearance of a desire to shrink from the responsibility of passing a decision on the case, which this step would involve, would be so mischievous," that he determined to take the matter into his own hands. The same characteristic displays itself here as in Canada and China. It might be pleasant to shift the responsibility to some one else, but it would be shirking his own proper work, and no man must ever be able to say that of him. Certainly no man ever did or could say that of him. A high sense of public duty was throughout his life his most eminent quality; it was this, joined to a "passionate love of justice," that, as Mr. Walcott truly says, made him what he was. There are no characteristics so precious in the Governor of a great dependency, and it must always be matter for sorrow that to the historian Lord Elgin is but "an unfinished torso in the gallery of our Indian rulers."

NEW HOMES FOR THE OLD COUNTRY.*

MRS. BADEN-POWELL informs us in his preface that he has had "very exceptional advantages" for observing the state of things in our colonies. He infers, and we quite agree with him, that under these circumstances no excuse is needed for giving to the world the results of his observations. At any rate the world is now in possession of one more volume, and we may add a very portly, handsomely printed, and externally attractive volume. We must indeed make a brief exception in regard to the illustrations, which do not, it is true, affect to possess any artistic merit, but which strike us as on the whole scarcely worthy of serving even as humble accompaniments to the text. The internal merits of the book require a rather fuller notice. We have read it with pleasure, and in a sense with profit; but the pleasure is not due to any very admirable literary qualities, nor the profit to any vast amount of recondite information. Mr. Baden-Powell appears to be a young Englishman of the better type; that is to say, a vigorous, healthy, sport-loving animal, with a good fund of almost common sense, but without any pretensions to philosophy or wide cultivation. He occasionally indulges in rather queer slang, some of which may be of Australian growth. The description which he gives of Australian houses, and his brief historical notices, are such as might be compiled by anybody with no more exceptional advantages than are implied in a three months' trip to the colonies and the perusal of a gazetteer. He tells us that he once spoke to an inhabitant of Madagascar who was under the firm impression that New Zealand was still exclusively occupied by savages; from which he infers, if such is the ignorance which prevails in the colonies in regard to each other, the ignorance which prevails in regard to all of them in the mother-country must be profound indeed, and very much in need of any sparks of enlightenment, however trifling. If he has not thrown any dazzling light upon the subject, we can very well afford to do without columns of statistics and abstracts of early colonial annals. When we are in want of such knowledge, we can turn to our blue-books; and, on the whole, we prefer to keep our blue-books and our books of travel separate. We therefore take leave of Mr. Baden-Powell's remarks upon this rather ungrateful part of the subject, to turn to that where he is considerably more at home, and speaks with greater freedom and freshness.

The two divisions of his book headed "Life in the Bush" and "Natural History" strike us as decidedly superior to the rest. Natural history, as we need hardly say, is pretty nearly synonymous with sport. Mr. Baden-Powell is not one of the murderous variety of sportsmen, and can take an interest in an animal without instantaneously conceiving ingenious plans for killing it. Indeed we fear that he can scarcely be up to the mark, when he says that it will "sound to English sportsmen something like murder to walk quietly round about some twelve little pigeons crouching down to the ground, and then deliberately to fire, getting five or six of them at one shot." English sportsmen are in the habit of practising an amusement which, to the outside world, is undistinguishable from this; for whether you show your skill by killing a number of birds on the ground, or hitting them in the air, is obviously a matter of detail. Mr. Baden-Powell, however, dilates upon nobler sports. The Australian sportsman has no concern with the brute aristocracy which is capable of occasionally exchanging parts with its pursuer. At worst an "old man" kangaroo may rip up one of his dogs, or in New Zealand he may get a nasty bite from one of the pigs which have run wild in the island. There is, however, no lack of excitement. According to all accounts, riding after a lively kangaroo must offer rather more chances of breaking your neck than are generally encountered by the foxhunter in a stiff country. An Australian horse, it appears, is as active as a chamois in galloping over loose rocks and fallen stumps, and can find his way through a dense forest, or, to use the poetical expression which our Australian friends have invented, a dense scrub, without ever bringing his rider's knees into collision with the trees. It is necessary to keep close to the dogs over every possible variety of obstacle under penalty of being hopelessly thrown out; and altogether, as kangaroos appear to be rapidly increasing, we should say that energetic sportsmen in search of a new variety of amusement might do worse than emigrate to Australia, greatly as their loss would be regretted in the mother-country. We may observe parenthetically that it is a queer illustration of the tenacity with which the expatriated Briton clings to his native prepossessions, that a strong prejudice exists against Kangaroo meat, which Mr. Baden-Powell pronounces to be excellent. We have a curious facility in taking a strong dislike to any course of conduct by which increased supplies of nutritious food may be obtained without unreasonable expense. The sportsman who has exhausted the interest of kangaroo hunting may fall back upon various resources. There are ducks, quails, and the afiread pigeons; and if a less commonplace bird is required, omias are still to be found pretty frequently in the wilder parts, though we are glad to hear that there is a general opinion that they ought not to be killed; and the sportsman of a naturalist turn may still flatter himself with the hopes that in the more retired interior of New Zealand he may come across the last surviving specimen of the gigantic moa, and so enjoy the rare pleasure of finally extirpating a very interesting species. Then, if hard up for amusement, the trees may be climbed in search of an opossum or the animal which is very absurdly called "a native bear." And, finally, if reduced to the last extremity, some amusement may be derived from slaying a little platypus. Mr. Baden-Powell, from a stern sense of duty, gives proper directions for insuring the death of one of these interesting animals, though he seems disposed himself to take a more enlightened interest in the habits of the creature, and suggests measures for procuring a live platypus for the Regent's Park. We should be very glad to welcome one to our shores, and he would probably prove a greater attraction than the hairy rhinoceros, who scarcely seems to have received the attention due to his value and rarity. Mr. Baden-Powell, however, confines himself to giving enough information to whet the appetite of the naturalist without attempting fully to satisfy it. His summary account, for example, of the manners and customs of the native cat—an animal so called with the usual discretion of the wandering Englishman because it has nothing of the cat about it—is pithy and characteristic. "It is a nasty vicious little beast," he says, "and so greedy that it often drowns itself in the mashtub." Sir W. Lawson might construct a useful fable for the benefit of our thirty population from this instructive remark, though a scientific inquirer would probably wish for a few more details.

We ought not to forget to remark that a good deal of excitement is supplied by snakes. The death-adder and other agreeable members of the same genus are extremely abundant, and have a special taste for taking up their abode in inhabited houses. Mr. Baden-Powell gives some sensible, but rather disagreeable advice, as to the proper remedies to be adopted in case of a bite in the woods. Most people, as he remarks, wear some sort of clothing, and therefore it is easy to extemporize some sort of tourniquet. Most people in Australia are also more or less provided with the means of getting drunk; and the more vigorously you drink any quantity of spirits—the stronger the better—the greater are your chances of recovery. But it is necessary to adopt some sharper and less agreeable mode of attacking the evil at its source. If by any accident you have not a knife at hand for cutting out the bitten part, “broken glass, china, or shells, are usually to be obtained; at all events, there are few who do not possess teeth or nails.” Whether there are many who would have the courage to bite or scratch themselves sufficiently is another question; but when the only alternative is sudden death, it is probable that we should develop an unusual energy in self-mutilation. Snakes are unluckily amongst the few animals which do not show a becoming readiness to evacuate the country in presence of the white man. The English fly, as is well known, succeeds in clearing off his big New Zealand rival as quickly as his countryman extirpates the savage. The European rats and rabbits have become nuisances, and the rabbits occupy large tracts of country to the exclusion of more useful animals. The English bee, having the great advantage of a sting, gets rid of his native rival, which has not that offensive weapon, from which we might draw a moral too obvious to require explicit statement. We might hope that some variety of poisonous snake might be induced to exterminate the indigenous varieties; but if it would be necessary, as in the case of the bees, to introduce a still more formidable animal, the exchange would not be an improvement.

* New Homes for the Old Country, By George S. Baden-Powell. London: Bentley & Son. 1872.

We have perhaps lingered rather too long over Mr. Baden-Powell's account of the fera natura. On the whole, it is perhaps the most animated part of his book; but we should do him injustice if we omitted to add that he has also much to say upon many other matters, and especially upon the pastoral life which fills so large a space in the industrial activity of the country. He discourses learnedly upon the rival advantages of “shepherding” and “paddocking” sheep, points out to what class of country each of these systems is best adapted, and we have no doubt gives excellent advice to intending settlers, though it appears to be a still better piece of advice when he urges such persons not to take anybody's advice until they have acquired the necessary experience for themselves. He becomes still more enthusiastic when he treats of cattle, the care of which apparently combines much of the pleasure of sporting with the tamer joys of the domestic agriculturist. Even the excitement of hunting the kangaroo seems to pale before the keener delight of “mustering” cattle in a rough district. Our author becomes enthusiastic over the marvellous feats performed by men and horses. The best of all sights is to watch a clever horse descending a steep hill with the dexterity of a biped mountaineer, springing and dodging to avoid rocks, and constantly “propping,” in order to prevent himself from gaining too much impetus. In addition to the other difficulties, there are stumps of trees, tall patches of grass concealing water-holes, and thick patches of sapling through which it takes a heavy horse to crush his way. The correct thing, it seems, is to do all this at a gallop, and under certain circumstances by night. Then, too, a beast will occasionally object to the attentions of the drovers, and a cow with calf has an unpleasant trick of charging in a systematic and cold-blooded manner, turning and dodging the object of its wrath. We do not wonder that such a pursuit is fascinating to the Australian youth, and that a fine crop of broken limbs and ribs is the natural result. All this has been often enough described; but Mr. Baden-Powell speaks of the performances with a keen interest which more or less communicates itself to the reader.

We shall not mention any of the other subjects upon which he touches in a more or less cursory manner. It is enough to say that we can recommend his book to any one who is tired of the old country and would like more breathing-space, and some exciting occupation amongst men of his own race. We shall only add that Mr. Baden-Powell concludes his book by the ordinary argument in favour of a closer union between the mother-country and the colonies. He sees in vision a vast confederation of the British Empire encircling the globe, and including within its folds a fifth part of the entire population of the globe. He even ventures to express a faint hope that the great Republic which has separated from us might in some form or other cast in its lot with those who are united to it by at least the tie of language. It is a grand vision, no doubt, and the advantages of its realization are as evident as the difficulties which he perhaps overlooks in his enthusiasm. But it is a delicate question upon which we cannot now enter, whether the people whom he addresses have the necessary disposition, and still more whether they can produce statesmen sufficiently wise and far-seeing, to encounter the innumerable perplexities of such a problem. Even excluding the United States, our rulers have not shown, as clearly as could be wished, that they possess the art, of making a great empire out of a number of fragments.

ROSSEL'S APOLOGIA.*

THE fate of Rossel will for ever form one of the most tragic episodes of the great Commune drama of 1871. To review the last words of a man who paid the penalty of his errors with his life is not a light task for any one, and least of all for those who, in their pity for the sad end of a young soldier of great promise, cannot forget the errors which led him to an early and dishonoured grave. We have endeavoured to approach the subject without any political or personal bias, in the hope to find in these prison utterances, written face to face with impending death, the true thoughts of one who, but for yielding to the errors of the time in which he lived, might have been an honour to his service, his country, and the literature of his profession. Those in whom newspaper tales of his inherited Scotch Protestantism, or late conversion from Roman error, had awakened special religious sympathies for Rossel, will find no confirmation of their fancies here. He died, it would seem, a good, though not an ardent, Catholic. Nor will that other party be justified in condemning him, who, following malignant rumours, too hastily spoke of the ex-Commune leader as a mere deserter seeking at Paris the recognition of the temporary rank which was refused by the Minister of War who succeeded Gambetta. On the contrary, it is clearly shown that Rossel took no time to judge of his professional prospects under peace, but prematurely declared himself on the side of war à outrance, which from the first seems to have been a notion that he cherished until it became almost a mania.

Put shortly, his history, as gathered from these detached papers, reads to us thus. A captain of engineers at twenty-seven without service—promotion far beyond what the youth of our less fortunate scientific arm hopes for or has any prospect of—Rossel found himself one of the myriads shut up at Metz by the combined errors of the Emperor and of Bazaine. He was kept on sedentary duty within the works whilst full of the ardent longing for real service natural to a young, active, and patriotic soldier, who had read enough to understand something of his profession, if not to master wholly its higher mysteries. But we must take the opportunity here of correcting the impression which prevails that his prison work on War contains deep or striking thoughts accumulated beforehand. Judging from the papers now before us, and from the course of Rossel's history, it would rather seem that the work referred to was simply the result of prison study in enforced solitude of subjects little understood before; whilst the book itself shows acute criticism rather than that constructive power which marks the higher order of genius. It is, in fact, rather a series of very good notes on what great military authors have written than a fresh contribution to the library by a new member of their body. But to return to our story. It is easy to understand, circumstanced as the young captain of engineers was at Metz, where he says he was “under fire occasionally, solely for his own satisfaction, and ran but little danger,” how his spirit must have chafed at the inaction of the vast army in which he was a unit. Nothing can be looser than his observations on the first actions of the investment, which read as mere repetitions of the rumours which ran through the fortress in which his own duty lay. His attention soon turned from these to the reports which gathered head of the treason of Bazaine; and the domain of politics, though Rossel “had never had the intention of doing anything of a political nature,” was instantly entered on, the occasion being of course Bazaine's reluctance to recognize the new Government of Defence. Early in September Captain Rossel was intriguing with those who desired to “hoist the flag of the French Government and overthrow the whole Imperialist set.” Their chief hopes lay in getting to their side Clinchant, then a popular Mexican brigadier, now one of the chief generals of Thiers's new corps staff, and old Changarnier, who had come down to the frontier as a volunteer. The bait, however, did not take with either. Changarnier indeed positively refused, using the strong expression which Rossel quotes, “I do not wish to dishonour my grey hairs.” Bazaine soon heard of what was going on, and, sending for the captain, questioned him in a long conversation. Of this we shall only say that the Marshal's part in it was—judging from Rossel's own narrative—remarkably frank as well as patient; and that, being met with what the mildest critic must call evasive replies, he let Rossel depart and remain free. So matters went on; and when the capitulation became inevitable, Rossel was again one of those who urged Clinchant to take the command and resist; but “nothing could be agreed on, and this attempt ended in smoke.” Rossel's efforts then turned in the direction of escape; and, covered simply with a peasant's blouse over his ordinary clothes, he found no difficulty in passing through the Prussian lines, and walking on to neutral territory near Luxemburg.

Of course he hastened to Tours, the centre of defensive effort. On his way he saw enough of the confusion then existing to discourage him; whilst at Tours itself there was a perfect military chaos. “The streets were full of queer uniforms. Every one had lace on his hat, his forage cap, his greatcoat. Undisciplined franc-tireurs strolled through the streets.” Rossel soon found his way to Gambetta, who “treated him as a man of importance,” but handed him over to the proper War Minister, De Freycinet, who treated him “simply as a place-hunter.” Asked what post he would choose, he sufficiently dispelled the notion that he was a suppliant of the ordinary type by his reply, “I should choose the sole direction of operations.” This boldness procured him a mission to the Army of the North; but as he went without power or credit (which, by the by, he tells us he discovered before accepting De Freycinet's offer), the service proved to be of no use to himself or others. Indeed he implies that it was offered solely to get rid of his importunity; and the first thing he learnt from the chief clerk on his return was that his daily reports still lay unopened. He came back just at the time of the Orleans disaster. One party were proposing to give Gambetta a more absolute share in the direction of the strategy than he had hitherto had. Others ("the reactionary party" Rosel terms them) would have made the Dictator responsible for the defeats of the armies he had conjured up only to see them destroyed one after another. There is nothing more noteworthy in the whole of Rosel's reminiscences than his acute judgment of the enterprising lawyer whose edicts at that period ruled all of France not yet conquered by the Germans:—

* Revue des Deux Mondes. Translated from the French. London:

How am I to speak ill of the energetic tribune who was the first to proclaim the downfall of the Empire, and who during six months of a desperate crisis was the life and soul of our imbecile Government? On the other hand, how am I to speak well of the undecided and ignorant Minister who was unacquainted with the condition and position of his armies, and whose barren and ill-directed activity could neither avoid disaster nor find remedies for its effects?

Just preceding this notice—and it is in such criticism that Rosel's best powers are shown—is an admirable sketch of the free and easy gentleman, Cavalier, better known as Pipe-en-Bois, then secretary to the Dictator. A long and interesting interview with the Dictator himself followed the conversation with the secretary. Rosel revealed such plans as he had, and left Gambetta on the understanding that they were to go into details next day. "Perhaps with a little quackery on my part," he adds, "I might have obtained a firm hold on the Minister's mind. But I had too much respect for the man, and the interests involved." So the next day came, and the appointed hour; but when the would-be Director of Supreme Councils came, it was to be put off with a "Not at home." He had failed, in fact, to convince Gambetta that he was the man of genius wanted, and, thus denied a second audience, he accepted in pique the appointment of Chief Engineer at the remote camp of Nevers, where he was still quartered when the armistice was proclaimed. His miscarriage with Gambetta he attributed naturally to the latter's ignorance of his powers. To us it seems that if he really had the genius for war which his friends have supposed, he would have had more influence after this interview than before it, and would have succeeded in impressing his powers on one who much needed an original adviser, but evidently did not distinguish between Rosel and the many amateur strategists who had thrust their counsels on him.

When the truce became known and was prolonged, Rosel's mind was not made up as to his future. On first hearing of peace he writes to his father:—"I am no longer a soldier. I shall join you in Paris, and either go in for politics in France, or industry in the United States." But there soon came the crisis in his fate. His papers written at this time all go to prove that he sincerely believed the war ought to go on. "Resistance," he writes, "has often lucky chances." "We are wanting in patience. We conclude peace as rashly as we went to war." In another place he refers to the successful resistance of the Convention and its armies to the Allies of 1793 as an example to be followed, forgetting the difference between the divided and half-hearted enemies of France in the days of Pitt, and the compact and resolute foe she had to deal with last year. All these expressions show one thing plainly. Rosel's intense desire, patriotic or personal, or both, to maintain the struggle, blinded him to the real facts of the case. He gazed so steadfastly at his object that he was blinded to the force of the opposing power. The dream which he indulged in, of a successful struggle to be continued in the South of France, was in truth a grosser illusion than ever possessed any civilian of influence in the country, and it is of itself enough to condemn for ever his military judgment. Thus feeding on his own angry heart in his remote station, he heard the news of the insurrection of the 18th of March, laid down his commission at once, and fled to join the Commune, the only officer in the armies who seriously believed that that ill-omened Government could or would maintain the war which had just terminated.

To Paris we have hardly space to follow Rosel, and we can do no more than commend to careful notice his observations on the men and things of the hour, and on the parody of government set up for the brief delectation of wretches who aped the vices but had none of the power of Danton and his Septembriseurs. "Paris," he says, in his final judgment of the leaders, "in the hands of those savages, was like a strong-box with a secret lock. The house was broken into, the people waited under the windows; and the Commune, scratching its head before the bulky strong-box which contained the social wealth, was obliged to put up with the copper coin; but, for the satisfaction of its conscience, it set fire to the house before leaving it." This being so, those who defend Rosel's action are plainly on the horns of a dilemma. If he really believed, when he deserted from Nevers, that the Commune was serious in its talk of continuing the war, he must be condemned as a hare-brained enthusiast whom the most palpable lie sufficed to seduce. If he did not fully believe this, all justification of his motives falls to the ground. It must be added that his own writings speak of his being disgusted on his very arrival at the names of those whom he found in power; yet he deliberately stayed among them, got elected chief of a legion of National Guards, and cast in his lot beyond recall with the Communist leaders whom from the first he despised.

No work has been published that criticizes them so freely from every point of view—political, military, and personal. The wholesale drunkenness of the Federalists, their leaders' incompetency, the utter disregard by the intriguing factions of all law but that of violence, have never before been so fully revealed. As a critic of the Revolution in which he lived, Rosel is, in our judgment, unrivalled, and his work beyond all praise. But in thus condemning the party to which he gave himself up, he condemns himself, and hands down his own unhappy memory as that of one who, though no deliberate or long-premeditating traitor, was at the best a dissatisfied dreamer, following one after another victims which it was impossible to realise, yet which were powerful enough to seduce him on to the saddest of ends. The long delay which French love of form interposed between his arrest and his execution has had the effect of throwing a halo of pity round the unhappy ex-captain. And to the same interval is due a work which shows that the man who knew so little how to take practical action in his own or his country's cause was yet keenly sensible of the mistakes of others. It has undesignedly well served the cause of truth and order by giving him the opportunity of leaving on record a more complete exposure of the hateful conspirators of 1871 than could have been penned by the bitterest foe that Versailles sent forth against them.

SWEDENBORGIAN SAVINGS.*

OF all projects or crotchets for bringing the world once more into joint, we have seldom seen one to compare for oddity or love of paradox with that put forth by "A Member of the Victoria Discussion Society." As regards the origin, the constitution, or even the locality of this Society, we confess ourselves with shame to be profoundly ignorant. Nor does the work now before us contribute in any appreciable degree to enlighten our ignorance. From an incidental allusion we infer, indeed, the sex of the particular Member who here speaks to us, if not that of every other member of the Society, it being the writer's ardent wish to see "a woman's Theological and Political Discussion Society formed in London," where woman with woman could bring forward her views, "the essence of which, after being analysed among ourselves, might be brought forward to undergo the criticism of men of sense and experience." We might perchance have inferred thus much from the free and utterly arbitrary use of italics and other typographical marks of emphasis which abound in the dedicatory chapter, as well as in the closing address from the Member's pen. The inference would have derived further, if not conclusive, weight from the nature of the suggestion propounded for the instantaneous return of humanity at the present day to primeval bliss—namely, if "after all its tossing and tumbling on the dark waves of error and ignorance, all women were only properly instructed, so as to be capable of becoming the ground-work of good instead of evil." We feel it to be due to the writer to give her words all the emphasis for which she has herself invoked the aid of the printer. This new Medea, hopeful as she is of recalling "humanity's young life," is yet not prepared with any cauldron of her own in which to cast the decrepit and withered shape. Her spell is but borrowed in all its entirety from a higher necromantic wisdom. "Man," in the Swedenborgian formula, "is the form of wisdom from love, and woman the form of love from wisdom. By evils they fell into an opposite form; yet by approaching the Lord, and shunning evils as sins, they may be brought back into the form in which they were created." Against the happy consummation herein urged upon man and woman alike we have nothing whatever to say. It is the hypothetical nature of the process which is to secure at once the magnificent result of universal rejuvenescence that stirs our doubts, and, we must add, transcends our understanding. So far as our limited or uninitiated intellect is equal to taking in our author's meaning, we ultimately go with her. Her views of woman's immediate mission, and of the duties to which she is primarily called in the world, are such as we have ourselves strenuously upheld against those of her sex who shriek for rivalry with man at the polling-place, in the dissecting-room, in the pulpit, or at the bar. Our misgivings arise when we find our sober senses set aside, and our practical experience outdone, by the summons to a sphere as much above or beyond our own as that of the spirit world or the rapping mediums. In her deprecation of the disuse of the Bible we heartily concur. Among all the signs of coming good which gladden her eyes, it appears to her that "good cannot come in its power and glory so long as a forcible argument can be met and crushed with the remark, 'I must remind you that the Bible is not allowed here.'" Her conviction is strengthened by a forcible story from the Eclipse of Faith:—"A scholar entered his library, which contained the best collection of books the world could produce. Some unknown agency had obliterated every sentence which had been derived from the Bible. The consequence was that he searched among them in vain for wanted instruction, for they had become a heap of confusion; the connecting links were broken, and all ideas scattered into fragments; in short, he could make neither head nor tail of them." Even the clergy appear to the writer's eyes guilty of some back-sliding, or at least of some voluntary ignorance in the matter. There are two points upon which she particularly fixes this charge of clerical blindness, and we can but rejoice that she has not extended wider the reproof in question; for we confess that we could but plead guilty in our own case. In the first place, "the clergy, while proclaiming Christ's second advent and the manifestation of the glory which shall be revealed when He comes in the clouds of heaven, are blind to the simple fact that the clouds of heaven are the literal sense of the Word." They also in the second place "seem blind to the fact that hell and damnation came to mankind through clever deceitful women and through ignorant women." We have certainly hitherto been blind to this version of familiar passages, and we must submit to share with the clergy the further disgrace of "having yet to learn that the Bible is given for the purpose of bridging us over back again to the 'Ancient of days.' " Our solace meanwhile must be the assurance of a good time coming, of which the Victoria Discussion Society, represented by one of its members, may be itself a hopeful sign. The language of the oracle is indeed to our feeble understanding a little obscure, but not perhaps more obscure than that of oracles in general:—

* Signs of the Times: Explanations Applicable and Necessary for the Present Time, extracted from the Works of the Honourable Emanuel Swedenborg. To which is added a Pamphlet by a Member of the Victoria Discussion Society. London: Clayton & Co. 1872.

Among these happy people whose church was denominated "Man," when the time arrives for the admission of the church denominated "Woman," and these two join hands across the abyss of time which has so long separated them, and again become one flesh, they will bear in their train a happy family of humankind.

Our wonderment at this Delphic language becomes less when we find that the fount of inspiration is throughout the peculiar wisdom of Swedenborg. It would almost seem as if something of what our Spiritualists call a rapport higher or closer than that of a merely literary kind subsisted between the heaven-sent sage and this Member of the Victoria Discussion Society. It is under the solemn title of "communications" that our Pythia delivers to us the utterances of the oracle. For those who are babes in this peculiar wisdom, to whom the mysteries of the Swedenborgian kingdom must be given as milk, or for whom the twelve volumes of the Arcana Cœlestia are a mass too vast and solid for digestion, a process of patient skimming has been gone through, with the result of presenting the cream of celestial wisdom, every paragraph so condensed retaining the number of the original, so that any reader hungering for more ample food may easily refer to the authentic text of the master himself. If we may venture to reduce the sum or substance of these communications to their lowest terms, and clothe them in anything like plain and mundane language, the great remedy for the evils of the time is to be sought in bringing things into correspondence with the Grand Man or Heaven. "The Grand Man or milux thence is that prior thing by which man, as to all and singular things appertaining to him, is connected with the first—that is, with the Lord." There is a mysterious law whereby all things in earth and man are constituted in similarity with the arrangement of parts in the human body. Thus all societies on earth and all situations in heaven are determined in respect to man's bodily frame, "according to points of direction (plagas) from it—that is, to the right, to the left, forwards and backwards, in whatever position—and also according to planes, as to the plane of the head and of its parts, as of the forehead, of the temples, of the eyes, and of the ears; also to the plane of the body, as to the plane of the shoulders, of the breast," &c. The helix, which are very numerous, have also a constant situation, "all things beneath man being in planes in every direction under the soles of the feet." Those who are in hell are seen by the angels in the queer position of "having the head downwards and the feet upwards, and also at times oblique." A series of circles, reminding us of the magic rings which link and unlink in the hands of professors of legerdemain, is employed by the interpreter of this mystic lore to set before our eyes the spiritual positions, from "heaven or divine love and wisdom" down to the lowest hell, "whence arise falsifications, delusions, and all magical arts," the central ring forming the iron age or "the plane of human existence." Below this central ring come circles typifying non-believers, represented by Assyria; "apparent goodness which is more policy," represented by Egypt; and "professing Christians who are inwardly bad," represented by Babylon. We look in vain for any hint of the place to be allotted to any existing nation in this descending scale. Still less do we gather what typical stage of degeneration or decay may be that of our own state and nation. We fear, however, if we have to revert to the scale of comparison laid down by the seer himself, "the correspondence of things with man himself, his organs, members, and viscera," that overmuch rule must be assigned nowadays to that lower kingdom which lies towards the lower extremities. "Beneath the sole of the feet," we read in the chapter upon the influx of natural into spiritual substance, "are they who in the life of the body have lived to the world and to their own particular taste and temper, delighted with such things as are of the world, and who have loved to live in splendour, but only from external cupidity, on that of the body, not from internal or that of the mind." They who have lived in pleasure, or in "a delicate life, conjoined with interior cunning, are under the sole of the right foot, but at a considerable depth there; thus beneath the earth of lower things, where the hell of such is." And we are sorry to hear that "several who in the world have been of distinguished celebrity have their abode there." "Beneath the left foot, a little to the left, are such as have attributed all things to nature, yet still have confessed an Être of the universe from which came all the things of nature." Further still to the left must come, we apprehend, not a few of our most advanced philosophers, who have got beyond any Être of the universe whatever. Worse still, were our eyes opened like those of the seer, we might behold even now, as he did, "a large quadrangular aperture obliquely tending downwards to a considerable depth, in the deep whereof was seen a round aperture, out of which, when opened, exhaled a troublesome heat, which was collected from various helix, arising from lusts of various kinds, as from haughtiness, lasciviousness, adulteries, hatreds, revenges, quarrels, and fightings." When this heat acted upon the seer's body, "it instantly induced disease like that of a burning fever." There are certain spirits, we also find out, "who not only have reference to the most viscid things of the brain, which are its excrementitious parts, but also have the art of infecting them, as it were, with poisons." Swedenborg himself came very near being killed by them. "They were deformed, and of a beastly countenance." Being defended by the Lord, he drove them to confess and show themselves. "They were spirits who in the life of the body had never been habituated to any employment, not even domestic; but had lived only in filthy ease and sluggishness, and had not taken any concern about others. They also despised faith; in a word, they were animals, not men." Can it be possible that such spirits are even now going in and out amongst us? We hardly need an inspired interpreter of the signs of the times to cause us serious misgivings upon the matter. It is not everybody who can see the secret cause of all our evils, social and political, in the great red Dragon, "whose tail is moved, bent, and vibrated according to the appetites, concupiscences, and pleasures of the body." But that depends upon being possessed of the peculiar inward light. Sceptical people will make fun of the visions from which the seer derived his illumination. They might be no more than a kind of waking nightmare, accompanied, as they undoubtedly were, with frightful internal obstructions. "Mr. Swedenborg," said his landlady at his lodgings in Fetter Lane, where the angelic shape first appeared to him in a corner of the room, and told him not to eat so much, "a good dose of calomel will do you a great deal of good." A drastic course of medicine might, it is possible, have been the means of keeping from us all that is distinctive in the dogmas or in the jargon of Swedenborg.

Still under all this verbiage and all these morbid workings of genius there lay a certain stratum of common sense no less than of science. We may say the same thing in a less degree of the present singular adaptation of Swedenborgian lore to the problems of the age. We have, to be sure, little hope of the regeneration of society from either the first or the latest version of the Arcana. But, as a woman's plea for the retention of true womanhood, for faithfulness to the domestic, as opposed to the political, mission of her sex—in short, for the "conjugal" state, if we must needs so put it, as higher and purer by far than anything that the so-called "woman's rights" champions are shrieking for—we are far from spurning such advocacy as that of this latest version of the Signs of the Times.

SHILLETO'S THUCYDIDES.*

QUITE as much as thirty years ago rumours used to emanate from Mr. Shilleto's contemporaries and pupils of his wonderful insight into the structure and interpretation of the Greek of Thucydides, and we were led to believe that an edition by him of the great Attic historian would be a permanent boon to scholarship. And now in 1872 appears an instalment of the opus magnum, which, then only a dream, has so far at least assumed form and substance, and become, even if it were to go no farther, a definite reality. With a little touch of humour the editor in his preface refers to the length of his hatching process or incubation, and remarks that, "if the public announcement of the promise has not reached the tether of the precept nonumque prematur in annum, yet the time elapsed since the edition was promised now well-nigh extends to the epic iovia etn of the Peloponnesian war." But we believe that those who honestly master the contents of the half-quarter of the whole history now put forth will see with thankfulness the advantages of the Fabian policy adopted in this instance; and will be satisfied that, if much less time might have sufficed for a clear and helpful edition, critical and explanatory, of the First Book of Thucydides, the result in that case could have been no way comparable to the present publication. For the work before us is not simply a mature and well-pondered pre-entment of his author, elucidated and annotated by Mr. Shilleto, but also a mine of scholarship, rich in illustrative and explanatory matter connected with the whole range of classical authors, and striking out new veins, as well as retracing old ones, in a way that recalls the Porsons and Dobrees of the glorious past history of Cambridge scholarship. The value of the volume before us can hardly be over-estimated, even as regards those who for historical purposes seek to ascertain the exact drift and true interpretation of Thucydides. We are sure that a translator, essaying his task after the study of Mr. Shilleto's text and notes, would find his pathway vastly smoothed by his eminent pioneering skill, and would be indebted to them for hints that would suggest an access of lucidity to his work; but it ought not to be lost sight of that this professed edition of one book only of Thucydides' History is in reality—so far as its notes are concerned—a repertory of ripe and sagacious criticism not limited to Thucydides, nor even to the historians, but covering the range of the orators, philosophers, and dramatists of Greece, and a treasure-house of the curiosities of Greek idiom, syntax, and construction.

* Thucydides I. With Collation of the two Cambridge MSS. and the Aldine and Junine Editions. By Richard Shilleto, M.A., Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Cambridge: Deighton & Bell. London: Bell & Daldy. 1872.

Our main consideration, however, is what this edition achieves for the text and interpretation of Thucydides. As regards the former, Mr. Shilleto has carefully collated the two MSS. known as N & T in the Cambridge University Library, and compared with these the Venetian MS. collated by Arnold. He has also availed himself of the collations, by Gottsche and Bauer, and by Duker, of two other first-class MSS., and has given with minuteness the first Aldine and the Juntine readings. The results of this part of his editorial work appear in an elaborate and minute apparatus criticus, whilst his English foot-notes deal chiefly with points of syntax or construction and of idiom; though here and there these also bear upon various readings with all the research and acumen of a master of the Greek language. As might be expected from such experience, and the more so when three nine years have taught their round of lessons as to caution and conservatism, Mr. Shilleto is much more disposed to stand fast by a fairly-established reading than to venture upon an emendation; and his small esteem for gloss-hunters is seen in his justifications of words which they would be only too eager to exchange. For example, in i. 82, § 2, καὶ ὅν μιν ἰσχυροῦσι τὴν πρὸς τὸν ἡμῶν ταῦτα ἀριστερὰ ὅν δὲ μὴ κ. τ. λ., he shows that the apodosis ταῦτα ἀριστερὰ, which might be colourably suppressed, and which is matched in Shakespeare by so, and in our English version of St. Luke xiii. 9, by well ("And if it bear fruit well"), is supplied in Thucydides vii. 60, 2, as well as in two passages of Plato. There can be no doubt that the more experience an editor has of texts and manuscripts, the more check will he be disposed to put upon the itch for emendation and conjecture, and the less disposed will he be to resort to modes of evading an existing difficulty by divinations, however happy, until every possible means of reconciling the received text with sense and plausibility has been exhausted. Even in matters of punctuation it is often safest to take one's stand upon the old ways, as is signally shown in a very valuable note of Mr. Shilleto's upon a passage in the 51st chapter of the First Book, which runs as follows:—Τοῖς δὲ Κερκυραίοις ἐπιπλεον γὰρ ἄλλον ἐκ τοῦ ἀφανοῦς, οὐκ ἰσχυροῦ, καὶ ἡσυχάζον τοὺς Κορινθίους πρῶτον ἀνομινοῦς κ. τ. λ. Here a device of modern improvers has been to bracket from ἐπιπλεον to ἀφανοῦς in a parenthesis, to the infinite confusion of the minds of inexperienced readers as to the governance of Κερκυραίοις and the cohesion of the sentence in general. But our present editor's valuable note affirms the old punctuation, and shows how sense is confused and syntax mystified by such ill-advised alterations of pointing. Left as it was, there was a chance of its being seen that τοῖς Κερκυραίοις depends upon ἐκ τοῦ ἀφανοῦς ("they sailed up more unpereceived by the Corecyreans"); but confusion is heaped up when, as Mr. Shilleto puts it, editors commit the same blunder as if they were to point the well-known idiom "quibus cum liceret nollent" thus—"quibus (cum liceret) nollent." Cognate instances of this sort of mispunctuation occur in the 72nd and 115th chapters of the First Book, where however our editor sweeps away the brackets, and gives the chance of a noun's dependence and government being discovered without resort to theories of a convenient "anacoluthon."

Of the few conjectures which Mr. Shilleto has not hesitated to accept and introduce into his text, the happiest is that of Cobet's colleague, Pluygers, in c. 61, § 2, where, in place of the MS. reading καὶ ἀποκρίνεται ἐς Βίρραν κἀκεῖθεν ἐπιστρέφοντες κ. τ. λ., the Professor has corrected ἐπιστρέφοντες into ἐπὶ Στρέφον, and so introduced the name of a town which Eschines (De Falsa Legatione, p. 31 st.) places next in order to Anthemus and Thurma, and which chimes in with the order of operations which Thucydides seems to be describing. As Mr. Shilleto puts it:—

After the convention and alliance which circumstances forced on the Athenians with Pericles, they prepare to evacuate Macedonia, first going to Beroia, then moving round the head of the Mænas Thermaicus they attempt Strepæ, and failing in this, they descend and reach Gigonæ, a town between Therma and Potidea, on the third day.

It is suggested that in the rec which remains unaccounted for, when this emendation is accepted, may lurk a missing participle, στρατεύοντες, which would make the sense all the clearer. Ἀφικόμενοι ἐς Βίρραν, says Mr. Shilleto, "rather suggests a visit than a hostile movement"; and he fancies that the name of Strepæ, which is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium and Harpocration, may lurk in the modern Peak of Stræsi. Not the least interesting and satisfactory point about this emendation is a fact which Mr. Shilleto has brought to light—no wit, that this happy conjecture appears to have occurred independently to Dr. Donaldson. To give the editor's own words, "In Donaldson's index, vol. ii., 294 b, I find Στρέφον (qu. num. in ἐπιστρέφοντες latest?). Thuc. i. 61, § 3. To point out this, which else might be unnoticed, I think due to the memory of my friend" (see p. 73, note). It is as satisfactory to find English scholars neck and neck with the Germans in all that is best of conjectural criticism; and it is interesting, here and elsewhere, to find Mr. Shilleto generous in his praise of an eminent departed fellow-scholar.

From the tenor of the note to which we have just referred, it will be gathered that, indirectly at least, Mr. Shilleto's edition does not ignore the historian's province; and indeed in a number of instances he handles the views of Grote and Thirlwall with an independence based upon a thorough acquaintance with his author. Not professing, as Mr. Seeley does in his Life, to discuss the subject-matter of Thucydides, as well as to give a true text and explain difficulties in the language, he has achieved not a little in the first-named department by such helpful notes as that upon ἡγεμονίας μὲν ἔχοντες ἀναστρέφοντες, in the 57th chapter, § 2, where he surmises that this incredible number of commanders for thirty ships and one thousand hoplites is an error for the or of. The number "three" would be in keeping with the appointment in c. 66, § 1 of five commanders to forty ships and two thousand hoplites. Still, the character of the work is for the most part critical, and, whilst in its own field it accomplishes for the scholar's work of enlightenment which Dr. Arnold's far weaker scholarship could only imperfectly attempt, it does not aim at superseding that learned historian's work as a commentary on the subject-matter of Thucydides. Its strength, in which it abounds to a degree rarely found in any English edition of a Greek classic, consists in its intimate penetration of the peculiarities of the Greek idioms, particles, and connecting links, in the author's wonderful insight, from collateral reading, into the meanings of words and phrases, and in the occasional more or less literal translations with which he illustrates his view of the drift of this or that passage. We shall endeavour to give one or two samples of his success in each of these lines, though we cannot hope to do justice to a work every page of which contains something to be noted.

Mr. Shilleto's notes on the meaning of certain words in Thucydides are calculated to exercise no little influence upon future translations, if, as we think is the case, they are borne out by the parallels adduced. Thus, in c. 29, Arnold, Güller, and others have taught us to take ζεύσαντες τὰς παλαιὰς ναὺς for "undergirding the old ships," as ὑποζώνωντες is used in Acts 17, 17. Mr. Shilleto stands by Poppo in mistrusting this interpretation, and taking the participle to refer to supplying benches, or banks, of oars to the vessels, according to the suggestion of the scholiast. In c. 38 he disabuses his readers of the established notion that in the sentence, οὐδ' ἐπιστρατεύοντες ἱερεῖς μὴ καὶ διαφείροντες τὴν ἀδυσμένην, ἱερεῖς is i. q. ἀπρεῖς and antithetic to διαφείροντες. By comparison of 3, 53, § 3 he shows that ἱερεῖς simply means "conspicuously," and deprecates over-straitness in the use of prepositions in composition; translating as follows, "Nor do we make war upon you in a remarkable degree, if we are not also in a singular degree wronged by you." The nice definition of the sense of ἀποστρέφειν, "to keep back what is due from," γυροῖς of c. 60, § 1, is most convincingly established to the material increase of lucidity of the Corinthian argument; and in c. 25, § 4 a learned note on the original of the participle γὰρ will assist them who accept its main proposition—affirmed by copious illustration—that it means "truly," "verily," to a right interpretation of a somewhat involved passage. The passage is one which sets forth the reasons why the Corinthians were disposed to accept the championship of Epidamnus against the Corecyreans—"partly on the score of right . . . but also from hatred, because, though their colonists, they slighted them." οὐρα γὰρ ἐν πανηγύρεσι ταῖς αἰσῶσι δίδοντες γὰρ τὴν νομιζόμενα οὐρα Κερκὶν ἐπ' ἀνδρὶ προκαταρχήμονι τῶν ἱερῶν, κ. τ. λ. As Mr. Shilleto notes, if γὰρ is to be translated "for," according to our old prescription, this and similar passages must be considered elliptical, and involve an awkward repetition of παραμύλιον. But such is not the case if γὰρ may be rendered "soothly" or verily. The sentence will then proceed on all-fours with what has gone before; "neither in sooth giving them in their general religious assemblies their customary privileges, nor granting a Corinthian by assigning him the duty of commencing the initiatory part of the sacrifice of victims." In this note and elsewhere our editor shows himself as observant a student of the early history of the English language as he is of the Greek, which he interprets so ably, and illustrates from so vast a store of reading and memory. If he wants to illustrate the use of ἀσθενία ("the poor" or "weak in purse") in c. 5, he quotes, among other passages, Psalm cv. 37, "There was not one feeble person among their tribes"; or, the sense of ἐπ' ἀμφοτέρω in ultramissis partem in c. 83, a. 3, he refers to the proverbial ἐπ' ἀμφοτέρω καθύδω of the Greeks, "represented with sufficient precision in Latin by in ultramissis avaris dormire, Tor. Haut. ii. 3, 101-342, slightly altered by 'Rare Ben' into 'For they sleep in either ear.' For another note on the twofold sense of ἐπὶ in one and the same sentence (c. 116, a. 3), and for an amusing illustration or two from Aristophanes, Juvenal, and modern humorists, showing how this variety of application may be made to subserve comic effect, we must refer readers to the pages of the book before us. We can do so with the assurance that many such annotations enliven, and lend an interest to, the progress of the commentary, to say nothing of their aptness to suggest new ideas as regards the comparison of style and language.

We have left ourselves scant room to speak of the clearness with which Mr. Shilleto evolves the tangled threads of Thucydidean construction, though instance after instance might be cited of it. Thus in c. 68, ἀλλὰ τῶν λεγόντων μάλαν ἵππασιν ὡς ἔκταν τῶν αὐτοῖς ἰδία διαφάρων λέγουσι, it is in the interest of a clear conception of the construction to find it explained that the subordinate clause ὡς—λέγουσι serves as a sort of accusative to which the genitive stands in the same relation as to τούτοις in the idiom θαυμάζω σου τούτοις; and in c. 33 the constructional obscurity of the clause ἔπειτα περὶ τῶν μεγίστων κινδύνωντας δέξιμενοι, ὅς δὲ μάλιστα μὲν ἀμνηστὸν μαρτυροῦν τὴν χάριν ἀναθήσει is elucidated by the suggestion that δέξιμενοι follows as if the first clause had been worded ἔπειτα ἡμῶν—ἐντυγχάν—so that the sense would be:—"In the second place you will have an advantage by having received us in our greatest peril, to the end that you (if you receive us) may bestow the obligation with the most certain and never forgotten evidence." For the most part Mr. Shilleto's bits of translation incidental to his explanation of the text strike us as exemplifying the just medium between freedom and literality, and in all cases where he might seem to superficial readers to lean too much to the latter extreme, it will be found to be because, as in c. 22-4, he resorts to a very literal rendering to disencumber the sense of its difficulties arising from style, figures, and blending of constructions. If, as some of his classical compeers have done, he could be induced to translate his author, and give us over against his Greek text his ideal of an English version, we are persuaded that it would be a scriba is dei worthy of the giver and invaluable to the receivers.

SAVED BY A WOMAN.*

THERE are many people, no doubt, who think that to review a novel must be one of the lightest and pleasantest of all labours. The first part of the critic's duty, they say, is mere play, and when they see him withdraw with his three volumes to some quiet spot, they are ready to mock him for giving out that it is time for him to set to work. There are very few novels, they go on to add, that have not an interest of their own, and none are so dull but that at times the reader is eager to read further on. Even if a novel is dull throughout, it is not in all probability dull as compared with last Sunday's sermon; and as no one when he listens to sermons is allowed to say that he is working, so they will not allow the critic when he is reading a novel to say that he is working. When they have thus proved that the first part of our duty is no work at all, they then show how easy and interesting a matter it must be to write the review. For what can be pleasanter than to give a light sketch of the plot of the story, and to bring within the compass of two columns the incidents that have with the greatest efforts been made to fill three whole volumes? The author's labour, they admit, was great. He is like the fire applied to a boiler which turns a drop of water into a cloud of steam some seventeen hundred times its bulk, while the critic is like the condenser which by mere chill can in a moment turn back the cloud of steam into a drop of water. And here, some go on to add, may be the explanation of the old story that the Iliad was once written in such small characters that the whole of it was got into a nutshell. Some critic perhaps, omitting the speeches, the battles, and the similes, had given a sketch of the poem in a very small compass; but rumour took hold of his labours, and, easy though they were, turned them into a matter of great difficulty and dexterity. We cannot, however, allow that it is an easy task either to read or to analyse a novel. The mere sight of one fills us with indescribable weariness, though at times we are almost exhilarated by finding that it is written not in three, but only in two, volumes. In like manner some criminal who expected to be hanged, drawn, and quartered may have been exhilarated on the scaffold by finding that either the drawing or the quartering was to be omitted, and his sufferings were to be thus shortened by at least one-third. Our misery, however, is increased by the recollection of a time when matters were far otherwise. Before novel-reading became a business with us, we could enjoy a novel as much as any one. Every one knows the story of Liston, how the physician whom he consulted when overwrought advised him to take rest and go to the theatre to see Liston act. His case is in a certain way ours. When we are overdone a little, our doctor recommends us not to work so long, and to find amusement in a novel. A grocer's apprentice might just as well be told to seek a wholesome variety in his diet by eating figs. We are satiated with plots, and utterly indifferent to heroes and heroines. When we want to read about criminals, we prefer to turn to the reports of the Police Courts; and as for accidents, we are more than satisfied with the supply afforded by the Railway Companies. And yet how pleasant it once was in early days to hide away somewhere with all three volumes, and to read on and on through a long summer's day! How base it seemed to stop even to eat and drink while hero and heroine were in all the despair with which the second volume always used to close! How great was the calamity if on any occasion the third volume was for a time missing, and how vast our impatience till we could find it! If we have altogether lost the relish for such reading now, we comfort ourselves to some extent by the reflection that novels are not what they were in our young days. The Daily Telegraph was as yet unknown, and the art of writing loud-sounding nonsense had not been brought within the reach of all classes by the newspaper that has the largest circulation in the world. The incidents, for all we know, may have been much the same; but while the world was as yet unknown to us, they seemed more probable. The love-making may have been scarcely less dull, but we were young enough to think it very natural. The novels of our schoolboy days, moreover, we often read perched high up in the branches of some great tree, where the sense of our own insecurity delightfully harmonized with the perils that beset our hero. When the last page of the last chapter was reached, when hero and heroine were lost to us, and the whole creation in which we had been so wrapped up was vanishing away, the change seemed less sudden as, closing our book, we slid down the tree and returned at the same time in mind and body to a lower world.

Into such a train of reflections have we been led by the novel before us. As we gladly reached its last chapter—longa finis atque stans—and were trying to estimate the merits of our author, we could not but feel in how different a light we regarded the end of our journey from that in which we should have regarded it of old. We had an ample allowance of heroines, and we had an equal supply of heroes. We had the good hero, who at first promised to be very disagreeable, and we had the bad hero, who at first promised to be no less agreeable. The bad hero soon shows himself in his proper colours, and goes on from bad to worse, given up by all the world except by one of the heroines, till just in the nick of time, when the close proximity of the last page of the last volume affords but the scantiest room for repentance, he suddenly reforms, leaves off drinking, gets decently clad, goes to the barber's shop, comes "under tonsorial sway," is forgiven by every one, and is blessed with a heroine's hand. A prodigal son comes off, by the way, better nowadays than he did in old times. Instead of a fatted calf, he is treated to a wedding-breakfast, and though there is a ring put on, it is put on, not on him, but by him. The elder brother, too, behaves in a decent manner, and instead of sulking in the fields while the feast goes on, proposes the health of the bridesmaids. We can remember how once we delighted in no story more than one in which the hero was led down the path of destruction in two volumes and a half, to be led in the remaining half volume up the path of reformation and matrimony. This class of heroes now, however, seems to us only to differ from the King of France with his 40,000 men in that while he first marched up and then marched down, they first march down and then march up. Both king and hero remain in the end on the same level as when they first started, at which, if only they had been content from the first to stay, they might have spared themselves and the company that went with them a vast deal of trouble. Though we have lost all enjoyment of such manœuvres as these, and cannot with any pleasure watch while an author leads his favourite character into a hobble solely with the view of leading him out, yet in our capacity of critics we have to consider, not so much what pleases ourselves, but what will please a reader who reads for pleasure and not for business.

Saved by a Woman, then, contrasts favourably with the majority of the novels that come before us; and though we would not have read it ourselves except in the way of business, yet, on the other hand, we should not hesitate about recommending it to all the ladies of our acquaintance. The style is easy, and is conspicuous by the entire absence of rant. We did not, so far as we can remember, come upon a single paragraph that we could not understand. This is no slight praise, as our readers will allow, at a time when the novelist and the poet seem to be contending as to whether prose or verse shall throw the fewest obstacles in the way of writing nonsense. There is a good deal of love-making, conducted, so far as our memory allows us to judge, in a highly natural manner. Yet at the same time we must admit that in ordinary life it is just possible to get a wife without following one of the heroes in dragging a young lady out of the reach of the advancing tide up a steep cliff, or the other of the heroes in putting a few shots through the arm of a woman who till then had been somewhat coy. Besides the love-making there is that most popular of all characters, an old sea-captain, who fills up a considerable part of the story in a pleasant enough way. Whatever faults may be found with the Admiralty, we are glad in these modern stories to notice the vast improvement that has taken place in the language of the service. The future historian of the Progress of Civilization will delight in tracing the oaths that have dropped out between Smollet and Marryat, and between Marryat and the authors of our day. Meanwhile the Civil Service Commissioners, in the next examination they hold in English literature, might in a most pleasing manner test the candidate's knowledge of naval literature by requiring him to write the following passage in the style of Commodore Trunnion:—

"I doubt it—I doubt the whole story; and as for your proofs, I believe that you haven't a grain of proof to back it up. Tell it to 'the Marines,' boy, not to an old sailor like me. And where was the beggarly falsehood coined, did you hatch it yourself? If so, by the 'living jingo,' I wish you joy of your day's work. If any fellow but you, Tom Russell, had brought me such a rascally budget, I would have kicked the son of a sea-cook over the ship's side, and left him and his rotten yarn to go to the bottom together."

With the help of the lovers, the sea-captain, some gossips of the neighbourhood, and pleasant and natural descriptions of the scenery of Cornwall, where the incidents of the story occur, the first two volumes pass off very fairly. The third volume, however, we must regard as a great failure. The fight with the smugglers may be allowed to pass, and if a hero cannot conveniently get married till he has been first charged with murder, we must not object to the murder of a Custom House officer. But while we do not object to any number of the inferior characters being butchered to make a hero's wedding-day, yet we must protest against the manner in which novelists make their own law and their own administration of justice. Those of us who are not lawyers have surely opportunity enough, in the full reports of murders that are furnished to us when Parliament is not sitting, to gain a tolerably accurate acquaintance with the laws of evidence and the method in which a trial is conducted. It would be a fortunate thing, whenever the jury lists get properly revised, if novelists could be compelled to serve at least twice as often as their readers. Better still would it be if advantage were taken of the approaching trial of the Claimant to give twelve of the leading novelists a practical lesson which would keep their books free from scenes as absurd as they are sensational. The author of Saved by a Woman seems to go out of the way to make mistakes. Though the trial is supposed to take place some time in the last few years—at all events since the Volunteer movement was set on foot—the cause is described as Rex v. Russell. The attorney engaged by the prisoner, unlike all other country attorneys that we ever heard of, was “a clever, though rather unscrupulous, lawyer in small criminal cases,” and at the same time “the agent for several county families.” The Western Circuit, moreover, is, we find, so ill provided with barristers that when the “leading counsel had been suddenly taken ill, and the other side had secured the services of both the other best men,” there was not a man left capable of conducting the defence. A retired barrister has to get out his wig and gown and once more appear in Court, in order by an almost desperate effort to save his enemy and rival. The evidence against Mr. Russell was indeed overwhelming. The chief witness for the prosecution testified that she had “a suspicion—only a suspicion—that the dress of the person was in some way familiar to me.” Though she was a witness for the prosecution she began with “a cross-examination,” and though she was the chief witness, she was taken in hand by the junior counsel. Before the coroner it had come out that the murderer had worn a naval officer’s cap and jacket, and that Mr. Russell wore one also. In fact, it was entirely owing to this resemblance in dress that he had been arrested. The “junior counsel,” however, altogether forgets to refer to this, but to make up for this omission he asks the witness if the prisoner “seemed a likely man enough to commit the crime charged against him?” As the witness concludes by saying she cannot swear that the prisoner is the person whom she saw striking the fatal blow, but that, on the contrary, she saw many points of difference, he was of course placed in a position of the greatest peril, from which nothing but a miracle could save him. The judge sums up against him, and leaves it to the jury “to determine what deduction must be drawn from the prisoner’s obstinate refusal to say where he was, if not engaged in the act of lawless violence charged against him.” The judge thereupon retires to get some luncheon. The jury, having had their luncheon before the trial began, retire to consider their verdict. Every one seemed to think that the prisoner must be hanged, when happily an old gipsy woman is found ready to give the most important evidence. The judge calls back the jury, and the old gipsy-woman swears that the prisoner had nothing to do with the murder, that she knows who committed it, though she will not tell his name. The prisoner is of course at once acquitted; but he is “severely cautioned by the judge.”

* Saved by a Woman. A Novel. By the Author of "No Appeal," &c. &c. London: Tinsley Brothers. 1872.

The author of Saved by a Woman requires, in our opinion, to be quite as much “severely cautioned” as the prisoner. He, at all events, was innocent of the murder, while our author, for the sake of an exciting scene and a third volume, has gone far to spoil a story that had considerable merits of its own.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE third and concluding volume of Professor Friedländer’s excellent work on Roman manners and morals during the earlier ages of the Empire* is in some respects the most interesting of any. The author apologizes for having made it to a considerable extent an analysis of antique culture rather than of ethics; but in reality the two subjects are so intimately connected that this scarcely amounts to a departure from his original plan. The inquiry, for instance, which occupies the first section of the volume, into the degree in which the refinements and conveniences of life were diffused at the period, necessarily involves the whole disputed question of the prevalence of luxury in Imperial Rome, and its supposed influence in producing national degeneracy and decay. The author contends that the profligacy of the age has been much exaggerated, from a too implicit reliance on the highly coloured representations of satirists and rhetoricians, from an casiness in admitting exceptional incidents as typical of general circumstances, but, above all, from placing ourselves at the point of view of writers unacquainted with the principles of commercial and industrial science. The accumulation of wealth, he argues, naturally demanded a vent, and the outlay which appeared so extravagant to the theorists who would have regulated it by precepts derived from ages of comparative hardship and poverty was but the legitimate consequence of a new order of things. A very considerable degree of corruption in the Roman society of the first century of our era must be admitted, but that it was neither universal nor fatal is proved by the remarkable recovery which took place in the second. The second century was indeed pre-eminently the age of moralists, as is shown not merely by the most distinguished and influential authors of the period belonging to that class, but by the severe ethical dignity of contemporary historians and men of science, and the utilitarian tendency of the belles-lettres themselves. Coincident with this moral renovation appears the phenomenon of a literary reaction in the direction of antique simplicity, which forms the subject of one of Professor Friedländer’s most interesting chapters. The condition of art is likewise investigated, and ample evidence of its flourishing condition is produced. Another important department of inquiry respects the condition of religion; and here the author alleges an overwhelming mass of testimony to invalidate the generally accepted conclusions respecting the decay of religious sentiment among the people at large. If the evidence of public and private inscriptions is worth anything, the allegiance of the mass of the people to the ancient divinities was unbroken; while, with the single exception of Lucian’s writings, the general tenor of literature attests a decided reaction among the cultivated classes towards those forms of philosophical thought most compatible with the traditional mythology. Society, in fact, has rarely presented a more imposing appearance of stability, and even the dark blot of slavery seemed likely to be effaced by the humane and philanthropic spirit of the time. The frustration of this fair promise must be imputed to the decline of fecundity among the cultivated classes, and their consequent incapacity to control and transform the overwhelming barbarian element unavoidably introduced into the body politic, but, above all, to the vicious political system which, by entrusting unlimited power to the most unworthy of mankind, eventually destroyed all respect for the principle of authority itself.

The purpose of Dr. E. Buchholz’s* elaborate contribution to the study of Homer is to describe the material and moral world of the poet agreeably to the conceptions of the writer himself. The first volume is devoted to Homeric cosmology and geography; subsequent divisions of the work will discuss the natural history, the public and domestic morality, the general religious ideas and special mythological beliefs of the age, in so far as they are exhibited in the Iliad and Odyssey. The present volume commences with an investigation of the Homeric conceptions of cosmical and specially terrestrial phenomena, from the all-enveloping æther to the winds and tides. One interesting feature of the inquiry is the care with which the precise force of the various Homeric epithets is sought to be defined. To this succeeds a description of all the nations and countries mentioned by Homer. The commentator has evidently bestowed laudable diligence in endeavouring to ascertain his author’s meaning, and it speaks well for his modesty and good sense that he should see reason for adhering to the established view in almost every instance. On one point—the topography of the plain of Troy—he appears not unnaturally bewildered among the multitude of commentators. Their conflicting opinions are faithfully enumerated, but Dr. Buchholz seems unacquainted with the positive verdict of Count von Moltke, that, when tested by the rules of the military art, the text of Homer affords no opening for misconstruction whatever.

Dr. H. Düntzer’s essays on Homer†, chiefly reprinted from classical journals, come before the world in their collected form with the recommendation of the deceased Professors Büchh and Welcker. This testimony to their value is the more welcome as the author’s views respecting the integrity of the Homeric text are very conservative for a German critic. The most important of his dissertations are occupied with the examination, and for the most part the disproof, of the theories of Lachmann and Köchly, who, accepting the Wolfian hypothesis of the origin of the Iliad as established, have essayed to go a step further and resolve the epic into the ballads by the aggregation of which it was, according to their view, originally constituted. At the same time Dr. Düntzer feels unable to maintain the primitive unity of the poem, and considers it to have been mainly composed out of two metrical narratives, one treating of the wrath of Achilles, the other of his vengeance. It certainly appears to us that one subject implies the other, and that the inconsistencies and incoherencies which have thrown so much suspicion on the integrity of the poem are more easily explained on a fair consideration of the writer’s period and circumstances than its fundamental unity of action and style can be upon the hypothesis of a plurality of authors. Specific interpolations may be readily admitted, and Dr. Düntzer certainly shows strong reasons for rejecting the episode of Dolon and the whole of the last book after v. 677. The remainder of this book he vindicates stoutly, and expresses a fitting contempt for the barbarous criticism which has recently pronounced it unworthy of Homer. He justly contends that taste as well as scholarship is essential for the decision of questions affecting the artistic unity of works of genius, and his own criticisms prove that he is himself something more than a mere philologist.

Horse and Horseman, by Captain Max Jähns‡, affords a striking proof alike of the industry of the author and of the real importance of the noble quadruped as regards the history of civilization. The writer appears to be officially connected with the management of the Government studs, and his book bespeaks practical experience as well as fine literary culture and profound research. The first section of the first volume treats of the horse in actual everyday life, the names applied to him, with their definitions and derivations, his management and breeding, his relations as a subject of property and traffic, his trappings and equipments, and the social distinctions to which his domestication has given rise. The second section is devoted to the appearance of the horse in mythology, both as the personification of natural phenomena, such as the clouds and waves, and in immediate connexion with the deities of the Gothic Pantheon. His relations to Christianity and mediæval legislation occupy the third section, and the part he plays in German history will afford material for the second volume, and complete a work rich in curious information and entertainment.

* Die Homerischen Realien. Von Dr. E. Buchholz. Bd. 1; Auth. 1. Leipzig: Engelmann. London: Williams & Norgate.

† Homeriche Abhandlungen. Von Dr. H. Düntzer. Leipzig: Hahn. London: Williams & Norgate.

‡ Horse and Rider in Life and Speech, Gleanings and Geschichte der Deutschen. Eine kulturhistorische Monographie. Von Max Jähns. Bd. 1. Leipzig: Grunow. London: Williams & Norgate.

* Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms in der Zeit von August bis zum Ausgang der Antonine. Von Ludwig Friedländer. Th. 3. Leipzig: Hirsch. London: Williams & Norgate.

The volume added by Dr. G. Gerland to the great but unfinished work of the late Professor Waitz on the Anthropology of Primitive Races* contains a full account of the Polynesians, Melanesians, Australians, and Tasmanians. It is an extensive compilation, showing wide reading, extreme diligence, and adequate powers of arrangement, but abstaining from any comprehensive generalization, and chiefly valuable as a storehouse of facts. Especial attention has been paid to the religious beliefs and social organization of the people, and the comparison of the shapes which these have respectively assumed among races so dissimilar in intellectual endowments as the Polynesian, the Melanesian, and the Australian is full of interest and suggestiveness.

The fourth volume of J. J. Honegger's "History of Modern Culture"† treats of the period of Louis Philippe. This strict chronological arrangement has its advantages, but is destructive of the unity of the subject. The accession of Louis Philippe happened to coincide with the beginning of a new era of literature, but this was not terminated by his overthrow, and the restriction of criticism to such works as chanced to be published within this arbitrarily defined period is equally unjust to the writers and to the literatures which they represent. No fair idea, for instance, of the general characteristics of the modern English school of fiction can be formed without a full consideration of Thackeray and George Eliot, who are excluded by the author's chronological limits. The writer's own criticisms, though not original or striking, are in general sensible and to the purpose; but his work as a whole is too fragmentary and disproportioned to fulfil its design as a thorough survey of the intellectual cultivation of the age.

Professor Ewald's‡ views on Biblical literature are entitled to the highest respect, not merely on account of his profound erudition which may be rivalled though it can hardly be surpassed, but from a unique endowment of nature, the essentially Semitic character of his mind. With little regard for science or art, indifferent to natural beauties and unobservant of natural laws, he is entirely occupied by the one imposing monotheistic conception which sufficed for the spiritual and intellectual nutriment of the Hebrew prophets. In their days he would no doubt have been one of their number; in ours he enjoys unrivalled facilities as their interpreter. The first volume of a work designed to embody the results of the study of a lifetime comprises a definition of the idea of revelation in the abstract; an exhibition of its manifestations in Moses and Christianity; a comparison of those with the heathen religions, and an inquiry into the destiny reserved for Biblical literature in the future. The second volume is to contain a scientific confirmation of the author's Theistic standpoint, which is assumed in the present. Although the method of the book may be pronounced rationalistic, its purpose is essentially constructive, and its spirit is even fiercely conservative of the ideas most subject to modification from the spread of natural science and the general spirit of the age. The style is as Hebrew as the matter; massive, direct, decisive, devoid of all adornment, and free from all effeminacy. The book may be regarded as a monument of prodigious learning and marvellous intensity of conviction, and as destined to a durable, though probably a very limited, influence; a rare instance of dogmatism, often haughty, not seldom intolerant and narrow, but so elevated and purified by a lofty enthusiasm as to be deprived of all offensiveness.

An essay on the controverted question of the genuineness of the last two chapters of the Epistle to the Romans, by Dr. H. Lucht§, expounds the view of Baur, that those chapters, which certainly present some slight difficulties on the score of style, external testimony, and peculiarities in the MSS., are an addition by a disciple of St. Paul, made for the purpose of softening the energy of some passages in the genuine epistle. It is by no means apparent why St. Paul should not have made the addition himself, and neither Baur nor Dr. Lucht seems to have remarked that, on their theory, the interpolator must have possessed the dexterity to abstract what was genuine, as well as to palm off what was spurious, as the epistle, in its original form, cannot have terminated abruptly with Chapter xiv. The most valuable portion of Dr. Lucht's work is probably his full analysis of the dissertations extant on both sides of the question.

In a very interesting volume Dr. M. Heinze|| traces the conception of the Logos throughout the history of Greek philosophy, from its origin in the physical speculations of Heraclitus down to the last Neoplatonists. Especial attention is paid to Philo, the connecting link, so far as this idea is concerned, between Greek philosophy and Christian theology. The writer considers that Philo had formed no definite conception with regard to the personality of the Logos.

Dr. Bona Meyer's lecture on Schopenhauer¶ is not uncandid,

* Anthropologie der Naturvölker. Von Dr. Theodor Waitz. Fortgesetzt von Dr. G. Gerland. Th. 6. Leipzig: Fleischer. London: Williams & Norgate.

† Grundriss der allgemeinen Culturgeschichte der neueren Zeit. Von J. J. Honegger. Bd. 4. Leipzig: Weber. London: Williams & Norgate.

‡ Das Leben der Bibel von Gott, oder Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments. Von H. Ewald. Bd. 1. Leipzig: Vogel. London: Williams & Norgate.

§ Ueber die beiden letzten Kapitel des Römerbriefes. Eine kritische Untersuchung. Von H. Lucht. Berlin: Uebersch. London: Williams & Norgate.

|| Die Entdeckung der Logos in der Griechischen Philosophie. Von Dr. Max Heinze. Leipzig: Schmidt. London: Williams & Norgate.

¶ Ueber Schopenhauer als Mensch und Denker. Von Jürgen Bona Meyer. Berlin: Uebersch. London: Williams & Norgate.

and may even be esteemed generous in its forbearance towards a philosophical opponent whose personality presents so many sides open to attack. Nevertheless he seems to have formed an inadequate conception of the force of Schopenhauer's character, and of his peculiar significance as the European representative of the intellectual tendencies which have produced the most widely diffused of Oriental religions—Buddhism.

Dr. Reuschle's* contribution to the tercentenary commemoration of Kepler consists of an essay on Kepler's place in the history of astronomy, in which his discoveries are compared with those of Copernicus and Galileo, out of which they sprang, and of Newton and Laplace, by which they were completed; an investigation of Kepler's own grand, but in some respects fanciful, speculations concerning the architecture of the Cosmos; and a condensed biography. The work is rendered interesting by the picturesqueness of the subject and the author's lively sympathy with his hero; the style, however, is not attractive, and the arrangement appears somewhat confused.

R. O. Meibauer's† manual of the physical constitution of the solar system contains a fair digest of existing scientific knowledge on the subject, but is chiefly remarkable for the author's strenuous assertion of the presence of an atmosphere throughout the whole of space, the identification of this with the luminiferous ether, and the employment of these hypotheses in support of Sir W. Thomson's conjecture that the original germs of life may have been imported into our planet by the agency of meteorites. This remarkable conception appears in a fair way to be promoted from the department of ingenious guesses to that of "provisional hypotheses," the number of which is already sufficiently alarming, and their tendency to harden into accepted dogmas even more so.

The late Otto Ludwig‡, who was considered one of the most promising dramatists of modern Germany, left behind him a satisfactory proof of the zeal with which he had cultivated his art in a mass of observations and reflections, principally referring to Shakespeare, which have been deemed worthy of publication after his death. As the notes of a professional dramatist made for his own use, their practical bearing on stage economy may recommend them to the notice of playwrights; and they afford a not uninteresting psychological study of the manner in which the German mind addresses itself to æsthetic research. Ordinary readers will hardly find them attractive. Their general aim is to reconcile poetic idealism with the principles of the realistic school of dramatic poetry; and such, as would appear from the editor's elaborate introduction, was the object proposed by the author in his own dramatic attempts.

It is refreshing to descend from the speculative altitudes of philosophical criticism to unpretending investigations into matters of fact. In a learned, lucid, and sensible essay Johannes Meissner§ has brought together nearly everything capable of illustrating Shakespeare's Tempest. The greater part of these materials are necessarily derived from English antiquaries, especially Malone and Hunter; but the writer displays a much deeper insight into Shakespeare's genius than is usual with critics of this class. He establishes beyond cavil the connexion of the Bermuda shipwreck with the piece, and fixes the probable period of its first representation as the winter of 1612-13. His essay includes a full literary history of the drama, comprising a reprint of that singularly impudent fabrication, the ballad of "The Enchanted Island," first published in 1839.

Die Stiftsherren von Strassburg||, Der Dräumling¶, and Geschichten aus dem Emserlande** are respectively fair specimens of characteristically German styles of fiction—namely, the historical romance, copious in description, prolix in narrative, and sparing of dialogue; the novel of manners, with just enough of imaginative colouring to impair the impression of reality without attaining poetical truth; and the literal reproduction of the details of peasant life. None are excellent, but all are sufficiently readable.

* Kepler und die Astronomie. Von Dr. C. G. Reuschle. Frankfurt: Heyder & Zimmer. London: Williams & Norgate.

† Die physikalische Beschaffenheit des Sonnensystems. Von R. O. Meibauer. Berlin: Uebersch. London: Williams & Norgate.

‡ Otto Ludwig. Shakespeares Studien. Aus dem Nachlasse des Dichters herausgegeben von M. Heydreich. Leipzig: Cnobloch. London: Williams & Norgate.

§ Untersuchungen über Shakespeares "Sturm". Von Johannes Meissner. Dessau: Reimer. London: Asher & Co.

|| Die Stiftsherren von Strassburg. Historischer Roman aus dem 13. Jahrhundert. Von Louise Otto. 2 Bde. Leipzig: Schölk. London: Williams & Norgate.

¶ Der Dräumling. Von Wilhelm Raabe. Berlin: Janka. London: Williams & Norgate.

** Geschichten aus dem Emserlande. Von E. von Dincklage. Leipzig: Schölk. London: Williams & Norgate.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on the following mornings, in time for the early trains, and is sent by post to all parts of the Country, through any Newsvendor, on the day of publication.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 865, Vol. 33.

May 25, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

IT is useless and tiresome to speculate on the decision of the American Senate. The Committee of Foreign Affairs has recommended the adoption of the Supplementary Article; but the assent of two thirds of the Senate is still doubtful. It is not improbable that Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE's unexpected announcement may furnish a pretext for abandoning all efforts to save the Treaty. No Englishman will doubt the accuracy of the statement, but the American Commissioners may perhaps have conveyed the impression that they gave a promise in words which admit of a less definite interpretation. If alterations are introduced by the Senate into the proposed Article, it is scarcely probable that the English Government can proceed further with the compromise. The Article as it was drawn by Lord GRANVILLE is more ambiguous than could be wished; and any modification would probably be framed for the purpose of making the withdrawal of the indirect claims still more uncertain and indefinite. Little encouragement is furnished by the recent Correspondence, which contains few traces of that friendly disposition which Lord GRANVILLE courteously and conventionally acknowledged. Mr. Fish exhibits in his communications the forensic astuteness in which American diplomacy is never wanting. One argument on which he dwells with especial favour sufficiently characterizes the tone and temper in which the American Government has thought fit to conduct a great international controversy. To Lord GRANVILLE's declaration that the English Ministers had believed the indirect claims both to have been excluded by the Treaty and to have been waived by the American Commissioners, Mr. Fish replies with visible complacency that the English Government must have had notice of claims which had, according to its contention, been waived. The answer is, that the claims were on the 10th of March simultaneously preferred and waived, so that it became unnecessary to protest against demands which, according to the understanding of the English Commissioners, were only held in reserve. Discussions of this kind can scarcely fail to become personally offensive when they go beyond the purpose of explaining an actual misunderstanding. Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE states that the English Commissioners represented to their Government that they understood a promise to have been given that the indirect claims should not be put forward by the United States. Mr. Fish may, if he thinks it worth while, endeavour to prove that Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and his colleagues were unduly credulous; but an elaborate demonstration that they must have told a falsehood is neither conciliatory nor likely to be convincing. If they were mistaken, there is strong reason to believe that the American Commissioners and Government shared their error. Although the SECRETARY OF STATE professes to attach great importance to a settlement of the indirect as well as of the direct claims, it is almost certain that the demand for consequential damages was inserted in the Case by an afterthought. The indirect claims and the pretexts on which they are founded occupy five or six pages at the end of a thick volume, and in the earlier part of the Case an Italian lawyer is quoted as approving not only of the direct claims, but of the indirect claims, on which, as the draughtsman adds, the American Government does not now insist. Not the faintest hint was ever given that the amicable settlement by payment of a sum was the only possible settlement which could be described as amicable. When the American Commissioners accepted with full acknowledgment, and perhaps not without surprise, the English apology and the admission of retrospective rules of law, they can scarcely have supposed the English Government to have abandoned the hope of an amicable settlement.

Englishmen and Americans will learn with equal astonishment from Mr. Fish's despatch that the Treaty was not a settlement of the pending disputes, but an agreement as to the means of obtaining a settlement. It now appears that the Treaty which was regarded in both countries, and described by the PRESIDENT himself in his Message to Congress, as a triumph of modern civilization and of pacific doctrines, was in itself rather the commencement of a new quarrel. It "makes necessary a prolonged, disagreeable, and expensive litigation with a powerful nation, carried on at a great distance from the seat of the American Government, and under great disadvantages; and, more than all, it compels the re-appearance of events and facts for the keeping of which in lifeless obscurity the United States were willing to sacrifice much, as they indicated in their proffer to accept a gross sum in satisfaction of all claims." If indeed the Treaty had rendered necessary the insulting language of the American Case, England might reasonably have doubted whether the arbitration could promote an amicable settlement; but charges of bad faith, and imputations of base motives, were rendered necessary, not by the terms of the Treaty, but by the peculiar taste and disposition of the American agents. It was assuredly not necessary to quote and adopt rhetorical phrases of English orators who had been led into exaggerated denunciations of their own Government by their enthusiasm for the cause of the United States. It must be gratifying to Mr. BRIGHT and to the admirers of Mr. CORBEN to find that even in the recent correspondence Mr. Fish is unable to refrain from using against their country their own inflated language. If the Treaty and the arbitration which it provided were, as now appears, unpalatable to the American Government, it is difficult to understand the professions of friendliness and good feeling which were profusely exchanged after the conclusion of the Treaty. After-dinner speeches are not diplomatic proceedings, but the mutual congratulations of the Commissioners on either side, and the subsequent Message of the PRESIDENT, naturally tended to promote the widespread and indeed universal delusion which was disturbed by the violent injustice of the American Case, and which is now finally dispelled by Mr. Fish's declaration.

Mr. Fish cannot but admit that the jurisdiction of the Arbitrators is limited to claims which are "generically known as the Alabama claims"; but he contends that every demand which was at any time preferred by Mr. ADAMS, Mr. SEWARD, or himself, is included in the definition; and he begs the question in dispute by contending that any claims which are not "Alabama claims" will be rejected by the Tribunal. The argument would be unanswerable if it had been agreed that the Arbitrators should determine the measure of their own jurisdiction; but, as neither they nor any superior Court have power to interpret the submission, the litigants have the right and the duty of guarding themselves against an undue extension of the reference. Any doubt which may be raised as to the intention of the English Government and Commissioners is removed by the nature of the claims which they are alleged to have entertained. When the American Government disclaims any desire to obtain unreasonable pecuniary compensation, it is a sufficient answer that, through its agents, it has formally demanded an amount of some hundreds of millions sterling. As an American writer remarks, it would require some command of face to argue before the Tribunal that General LEE would have disbanded his army after the battle of Gettysburg if he had not supposed that the Alabama was cruising somewhere in the ocean with a crew of a hundred and twenty men; but this very suggestion is deliberately advanced in the American Case; and the Arbitrators are invited to award in consequence the costs of a year and a half of the Civil War. The professed moderation of the PRESIDENT can only imply that he and his advisers are fully aware of the unfounded nature of their demand; but flagrant illegality and injustice cannot bring within the terms of a reference matters which were not included in the submission. A Government which retains any particle either of prudence or of self-respect could not hypothetically sanction a monstrous and unprecedented claim by treating it as a proper subject of reference. The principle of consequential damages would be admitted if it were referred to the Arbitrators, and their decision against the claim would only apply to the particular case. The claim for the prolongation of the war was based by its author rather on the Queen's Proclamation than on the acts of the Alabama; and it had not been invented by Mr. SUMNER when Mr. SEWARD drew up the list of what are generically called the Alabama claims. Lord GRANVILLE's elaborate analysis of the Correspondence affords a conclusive answer to Mr. FISH's suggestion that Mr. ADAMS at different times complained of national injuries. Injuries inflicted on the subjects or citizens of a country may in ordinary parlance be described as national wrongs; but the allegation that the war was prolonged through the exertions of blockade runners has nothing whatever to do with Alabama claims.

The device which has been jointly elaborated by Lord GRANVILLE and General SCHENCK for the evasion of the difficulty furnishes an unintended and curious comment on the American demand. The draft of the Article recites that the President of the UNITED STATES adopts for the future the principle that the indirect claims "should not be admitted in principle as growing out of the acts committed by particular vessels alleged to have been enabled to commit depredations upon the shipping of the belligerent by reason of such want of due diligence in the performance of neutral obligations as that which is imputed by the United States to Great Britain." If the Government of the United States holds that for the future indirect claims are unjust, or that they are not warranted by the rules of international law, it seems to follow that from the time of Mr. SUMNER's speech to the present day the claims were, as indeed they undoubtedly are, extortionate and wanton. That the English Government should be required to disavow an absurd doctrine against which it has uniformly protested is an anomaly which it may be worth while to perpetrate for the sake of peace; but the unparalleled patience of the English nation has been tried to the utmost, and with conditional acquiescence in a ridiculous position its long-suffering will have been finally exhausted. If the Alabama claimants are deprived of the opportunity of preferring their plausible but questionable demands, they will have their own Government alone to thank for their disappointment. Plausible and conciliatory to the utmost, successive English Governments have negotiated the RIVERDY JOHNSON Convention and the Washington Treaty, nor have they shrunk from consenting to the marvellous involutions of the Supplemental Article. The consideration for the apology, and for the acceptance of the new rules of international law, may have failed; and it is too late to retract concessions which were offered in a spirit of mistaken confidence. That the claim for consequential damages will never be recognized except as the result of a disastrous war is absolutely certain; nor is it possible to imagine that any English Minister will consent to the payment of a gross sum on account of claims which have never been recognized. The whole civilized world, although England is the object of many jealousies and resentments from which the United States are exempt, is agreed in condemnation of extravagant pretensions which could not be a baited without dishonour as subjects of arbitration.

THE GERMAN EMPIRE AND THE JESUITS.

IT is evident that the rejection of Cardinal Hohenlohe as German Minister to the Papal Court was only one small incident in the great struggle for power between the German Empire and the Pope. The issue is now fairly raised, and the battle has begun. The German Government has taken up the position that the present attitude of the Court of Rome being avowedly hostile to Germany, it is incumbent on Germany to defend itself. The present EMPEROR, as Prince BISMARCK observed, has not the slightest intention of repeating the memorable scene of Canossa. How the quarrel has come about is notorious, and it need scarcely be said that each party on its own principles is in the right. If there is a living source of infallible authority, knowing absolutely what is right and wrong, seeing how far the modern world is going away from its true aims, and possessed of the power of deciding on the future fate of millions of human beings, it most naturally and properly claims the right to mould every action of human life in order to save as many souls as possible. The whole tendency of Catholicism in the last quarter of a century is to assert this claim more loudly every day and to act on it more boldly. The dogma of the Immaculate Conception, the dogma of Papal Infallibility, and the conversion of the power of the Pope into a power wholly of a spiritual kind, have been the leading causes or manifestations of this tendency. The Jesuits are the staunchest, most resolute, and most untiring champions of the new order of things at Rome, and their action has been sufficiently successful to convulse every Catholic country in Europe. Until lately the Catholicism of Germany was in the main of a quiet, sleepy, old-fashioned sort, resting happily under the shadow of the State, and giving little trouble to rulers or people. In Prussia Catholicism was especially honoured and cared for. A Prussian was free to be a Catholic or a Protestant; but if he was a Catholic, the State required him to be baptized and married by a priest of his own persuasion, and Catholic bishops were treated as high and most respectable Government officials. There was no religious question in Germany, for the rival creeds were cherished and disciplined in the fold of the State. But now all is changed. The Jesuits teach that every principle on which the State acts in Germany is wrong. Ultramontaniam comes into conflict with the allegiance of the subject to the King. Prelates assume to decide the exact shade of doctrine which Catholic officials must hold. The Old Catholics have raised the flag of rebellion against the prelates, and the prelates have excommunicated the Old Catholics. But it appears that excommunication, if it can have any effect on civil life, is illegal in Prussia without the permission of the Government. The Bishop of ERMELAND, when this was pointed out to him, replied that if he found the canon and the municipal law in conflict, he should be guided by the canon law, and excommunicate as much as he pleased. This has drawn down on him the wrath of Prince BISMARCK, who has informed him that, if he does not repent and see the error of his ways at once, the worst shall be inflicted on him that it is in the power of the State to inflict. As it is very improbable that the Bishop thus challenged will give in, a very short time will suffice to show what it is that Prince BISMARCK proposes to do in order to coerce refractory Ultramontanes. In whatever he chooses to do he will undoubtedly have the support of the German Parliament, which has come forward to urge him to strike a strong blow if he strikes at all, and to expel the Jesuits and the members of other obnoxious orders from Germany. If the defiant bishops are put down, and the Jesuits got rid of, then it is hoped Germany will be at peace, and good sound German doctrine will be taught in every German school, and the dangerous and disruptive doctrines of the Syllabus will no more infect the minds of German youth.

To Englishmen it would seem at first sight as if the difficulty with which Germany has to contend were one of its own making. The State in Germany chooses to associate itself with an alien institution, to protect it, uphold it, and patronize it. If this alien institution gives trouble to its protector and patron, the simplest plan would appear to be to cease to have anything to do with it. Why should the Prussian Government trouble itself to see that Catholic children are properly baptized, and Catholic bridegrooms and brides properly married? So long as men and women are legally married, that is all that the State has to see to, and baptism is a religious ceremony with which parents may dispense, or which they may have recourse to, according to their tastes. If Ultramontane bishops choose to excommunicate a Catholic because he does not assent to the last new dogma, that is purely a matter between him and them; and if he does not believe that the excommunication will do him harm, no one is hurt. The Jesuits may be bad teachers, but so long as they do no one an injury appreciable by legislators, they may teach bad doctrine while better men teach better doctrine. This was the line adopted by some of the leading friends of the Ultramontanes in the recent debates. They professed to be perfectly indifferent to State support and protection, and only asked to be let alone. If all creeds were treated equally and the State stood aloof from all, it was not Catholicism, as they urged, that would suffer. Protestantism is the creature of the State, and would soon fall to pieces if it lost the support which supported it. An attempt was made to defend the Jesuits on their own merits, to contend that they were excellent, useful, modest men, and very patriotic. But this argument was utterly irrelevant, and rested on an equivocation. The Jesuits are excellent men, or some of them are, if once the principles on which they act are accepted.

whole lives are spent in attempting to establish a system which is at complete variance with the ordinary habits of thought and action prevalent among German laymen. The right line for their friends to take was obviously that a fair field should be given to all, and then, if truth was on the side of the enemies of the Jesuits, it might be expected that truth would prevail. Religious toleration is one of the watchwords of modern Liberalism, and the Ultramontanes called on German Liberals to be liberal. But the appeal met with no response in the German Parliament. One of the principal speakers declared that a Free Church in a Free State was one of the most foolish of fancies. The view of the majority was most unmistakably that the Jesuits should be put down, and not that they should be simply let alone. In order to judge of the true character of the struggle now imminent, it deserves to be attentively noticed that what may be termed the English theory on the subject, but which Count CAVOUR desired to have carried out in Italy with far more logical boldness than it has ever been carried out in England, was distinctly submitted to the German Parliament and rejected. Men of known sense, liberality, and courage talked of the Jesuits in language which in England is scarcely ever heard except from the lips of Mr. NEWGATE or Mr. WHALLEY. The perfect fairness of Constitutional government was treated as being entirely a mistake, and the example of Belgium was adduced to show that, under cover of what is called fair play and religious toleration, scheming priests and bold clericals may obtain the whole guidance of affairs and have the nation at their feet.

Several reasons may be suggested why this should have been the course of opinion in the German Parliament. Perhaps something should be attributed to the inexperience of a young legislative Assembly which thinks that whatever it wishes can be easily effected, and, in its sublime faith in its own decrees, ignores the difficulties of practical life. But there can be no doubt that influences prevailed of far greater moment. In the first place, to sever Church and State would be to most Germans to embark on an experiment totally foreign to all their familiar traditions and ideas. The Prussian State is always nagging at a man from the day he is born, if not before, till the day when even bureaucracy admits that, the fact of his death and burial being properly certified, there is no more to be done with him. To leave him alone at the most important crises of his life would seem to German officials something terrible. In Prussia the good man is the man who at every epoch of his tiny history has received exactly the right certificate. The Catholics receive their certificates and the Protestants receive theirs, and the order of the world seems intelligible so long as the latter are regarded as soldiers belonging to a regiment that wears blue facings, and the former are regarded as soldiers belonging to a regiment that wears white facings. But a state of things in which religion was not used as a means of marking off men as if into different regiments would be, in the eyes of the most thoroughly German of Germans, revolutionary and monstrous. Then, again, it is easy to guess from some of the speeches made in the Parliament, that some part of the pressure put on the Government to use sharp measures arises from the fears of that portion of the German Catholic world which is not Ultramontane. Many German Catholics dislike the Jesuits, and, without distinctly rejecting the dogma of infallibility, bitterly resent its consequences. But they scarcely dare call their souls their own, and dread what they may have to go through at home or in provincial circles if they boldly oppose those whom the Pope regards as his best friends. But if the State would act and clear all the Jesuits away, what a comfort it would be! and if in a German home it was distinctly apprehended that the State had to be obeyed or disobeyed, even feminine zeal would recoil from the advocacy of disobedience. But by far the most potent cause of the desire for State action was, we may be sure, the political one. The friends of the Jesuits are politically the enemies of Germany, and find in France a field from which to carry on their attacks. The Jesuits are of necessity, and on their own principles legitimately, the allies and instruments of a foreign foe. Regarding the German Empire as the greatest barrier in the way of their success, which it no doubt is, they wish to help France to break it up. Great allowance must be made, however, by the friends of religious toleration, for the Germans under these circumstances. Ultramontanism and Communism are in many respects very similar, as they both aim at destroying national life and moderate liberty. In a country like England, where neither of them have any real power, we can afford to let them both have their sting within certain bounds; but it would try our temper and our liberal principles very severely if either displayed an irritating activity as the partisans of a foreign and hostile Power. The struggle between Germany and the Papacy is as far a political one that Germany may be justified in having recourse to political means of defending itself. But it is easier to state this in general terms than to see what measures could be adopted that would be efficacious, and yet would not have a tinge of petty and undignified persecution.

M. ROUHER'S REAPPEARANCE.

SOME indignation and some contempt have been expressed in this country at the concerted silence of which M. ROUHER was the victim on Tuesday. It is not very clear upon whom the blame of this conspiracy ought to rest. The Right, which might perhaps have been expected to cheer M. ROUHER, is not accused of having remained mute of set purpose; the Left, which is accused of remaining mute of set purpose, could hardly have been expected to cheer him. In the English House of Commons a member defending an unpopular cause with as much tact and eloquence as M. ROUHER might secure a considerable amount of purely intellectual approval. But a French Assembly does not usually discriminate in this way. It means its cheers to convey good will to the cause as well as admiration for the advocate. At all events this is the interpretation affixed to its applause out of doors. M. ROUHER's speech was evidently designed to produce this effect. It was from no idle wish to achieve a momentary popularity that he angled so persistently for the support of the Right. The Vice-Emperor can dispense with a claque. If his plan had succeeded, the Conservative majority would have been arrayed against the Revolutionary minority, and the Imperial ex-Minister would have been exhibited to France as the natural leader of the party of order. Even as it was, considering the ingenuity with which he identified himself with the Assembly, and defended its claim to constituent powers against the depreciatory criticism of M. GAMBETTA, it is matter for wonder that he did not carry the majority with him. To be told that their mission is not finished, and that a dissolution would be an injustice to everybody for the profit of a few individuals, must have been pleasant though the speaker was M. ROUHER. If the Right had been roused by an inarticulate contest with the Left, the temptation would probably have proved too great to be resisted. Any demonstration of disapproval on the part of the minority would have enabled M. ROUHER to sit down amid the excited cheers of the majority. Their applause would have meant nothing, but it would not the less have had its use. It would have enabled every Bonapartist journal in France to adduce the reception given to M. ROUHER in proof that Imperialism is gaining ground in the Assembly. The concerted silence of the Left was consequently a perfectly allowable stroke of policy. It put M. ROUHER to no unfair disadvantage; it simply prevented him from gaining an unfair advantage. Not a single Deputy who wished to cheer the speech on its merits was debarred from doing so. The only applause that was stifled was applause that would have been taken as a homage to the Empire, while in fact it would only have expressed hostility to the Republic. The self-imposed moderation of the Left has allowed the real feeling of the majority towards the Empire to become apparent. It may secretly suspect M. THIERS or openly defy M. GAMBETTA, but it has no love for NAPOLEON III.

It is probable that even in the Assembly Frenchmen are able to draw a distinction between the military contracts concluded under the Empire and those concluded under the Government of National Defence. Very possibly the waste of money was hardly less in the latter case than in the former. The circumstances under which M. GAMBETTA had to work were wholly incompatible with a careful comparison of tenders, or a careful supervision of the goods supplied. A Government which is honestly bent on accumulating the materials of war with the utmost possible speed must buy all it can get without much regard to price or quality. A bad rifle is better than none at all; a good rifle can only be too dear when an equally good one might be had at a smaller cost. That the Government of National Defence was grossly cheated is likely enough, but it was the cheating of contractors for whose control there was neither time nor machinery available. That the Imperial Government was grossly cheated is certain, but in this case the sinners were its own officials, whose dishonesty must have been suspected, if not known, by the men who ought to have punished them. M. GAMBETTA may also have suspected that he was giving his money for goods of doubtful value. But there is all the difference between suspecting this in the very crisis of a war, when the choice lies between supplying the needs of the army in this way and not supplying them at all, and suspecting it in time of peace, when the only evil that can follow from verification is the necessity of dismissing unfaithful agents. The secret of the immunity extended to fraudulent contractors under the Government of National Defence was the pressure of military necessity. The secret of the immunity extended to fraudulent contractors under the Empire was the pressure of political necessity. The latter necessity was in part real, and in part imaginary. It was real in so far as the EMPEROR could not have released himself from it without quarrelling with some of his most trusted agents. It was imaginary in so far as he believed that this quarrel would have weakened his hold on the country. But from whatever cause—whether from the indolence which could not dispense with useful instruments, or from the fear that he had allowed them to become too strong to be dispensed with—the army was sacrificed, and its defeat involved the fall of the Sovereign on whose head the guilt ultimately lay. Other faults have contributed to make the Empire odious to Frenchmen, but it might have borne up against all of them had it not been for this crowning sin. The diplomacy of the Duke of GRAMONT is unpopular enough, but the provocation which he received from Prussia is likely to be better appreciated as the incidents which immediately preceded the war are more candidly studied. The interference of the Empire with personal liberty may be paralleled under the Republic. The cruelty of the Coup d'état was reproduced in every detail during the entry of the Versailles troops into Paris. But the neglect of the Government to provide for a war which it cannot even claim not to have foreseen is something different in kind from all these errors. There is nothing that can be alleged in palliation of it; there is nothing in the Republican administration to which it can be compared. It is a story that admits of being reproduced in shapes which come home to every peasant and to every soldier. When Frenchmen hear General VINOT's declaration that his great object was to avoid meeting the enemy, because he was not provided with cartridges, and remember that the money to buy these cartridges was yearly voted by the Corps Législatif, and yearly wrung from the taxpayer, they are not likely to miss the obvious moral. They have always been willing enough to believe that a French army could only have been beaten by extraordinary ill fortune, and here is the ill fortune they are in search of ready to hand. Englishmen may be disposed to think that even if the French troops had been perfectly equipped the superiority of German discipline and German strategy would still have ensured success. But Frenchmen will naturally hold that the whole secret of their defeat lay in the want of arms, of horses, of ammunition—of all, in short, that ordinarily makes one brave man the superior of another. They will admit of no partition of responsibility; they will place it whole and undivided on the head of NAPOLEON III.

The result of M. ROUHER's appearance in the tribune makes it extremely doubtful whether he would not have been better advised if he had remained outside the Assembly. Being in it he could not help defending the Government of which he was so important a part against the attack of M. D'AUDRIFFET PASQUIER. But there are some cases so bad that it is wiser for the defendant to let judgment go by default. There is more chance that the facts will not be so unrelentingly brought to light; there is at all events more chance that if they are brought to light they will be sooner forgotten. M. D'AUDRIFFET PASQUIER's speech might have been less bitterly hostile if the chief representative of the Imperial Government had not been there to be stung into a reply. And if the original attack had been none the less violent for being directed against an absent instead of a present offender, it could not have been followed by M. D'AUDRIFFET PASQUIER's rejoinder. There may not be much meaning in the warning addressed to M. ROUHER that a time is coming when the country will insist on the Empire restoring the legions which have been destroyed, but it will help to fix in the minds of those who read it the fact that it is the Empire that has destroyed them. The effect of this debate will be to strengthen the conviction of the French peasant that all he suffers from increased taxation and diminished prosperity is the work of the Imperial Government, and, more than this, that it is due not to incapacity merely, but to selfish treachery. It is probable that the Bonapartist faction have not realized the extent of the hatred which is felt against them on this score. If they had, they would hardly have attempted to defend themselves against accusations so universally believed and so strangely borne out by all the accounts which have been published of the early days of the war. M. ROUHER's failure may have more serious and lasting consequences than commonly follow upon Parliamentary reverses in France.

MR. LEEMAN'S BILL.

A SELECT Committee of the House of Commons has approved, with few amendments, Mr. LEEMAN's Bill to authorise the application of funds of Municipal Corporations and other Governing Bodies in certain cases. The same Bill failed in the last Session, in consequence of the usual difficulties which impede legislation by private members. It will now certainly be passed by the House of Commons; but it is uncertain whether it will meet with equal favour in the House of Lords. The object of the measure is to relieve Corporations and governing bodies of a serious disability which has in some late cases produced serious inconvenience and injustice. It had long been known or suspected that under the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act corporate funds were not applicable, except in the rare cases where a surplus existed, to the promotion or opposition of Bills in Parliament. The subject had escaped the attention of the framers of the Act, and the general words which limit the discretion of governing bodies happen to be stringent. The iniquitous consequences which might follow from a strict enforcement of the law were so obvious that all parties concerned have for many years, consciously or in ignorance, connived at disregard of the legal rule. If Corporations are good for anything, they ought to act as guardians and agents of the communities which they represent, both in the promotion of improvements and in vigilant resistance to any measure which may injuriously affect the interests of their constituents. Almost every important Bill relating to gas, to water, or to railways, has been watched by the Corporations which it may have concerned, either in direct opposition or for the purpose of securing protective clauses. In many instances Gas and Water Companies, on asking for additional powers, have been met by Corporation Bills for the compulsory purchase of their undertakings. In the majority of cases the application has been successful; and it is probable that in a few years the ownership of gasworks and water works will have been almost universally transferred to public bodies. The Royal Commission under the presidency of the Duke of RICHMOND recommended that the supply of water should in all cases be entrusted to the local authorities; and there is a strong reason for adopting the same course with gasworks as soon as they return the maximum dividend. From that date additional profits legally belong to the consumers, who are nearly identical with the ratepayers; and it is reasonable and convenient that the beneficial owners should, after paying off the incumbrances, enjoy the administration of their property. The Corporation of every considerable town has found it necessary to codify and extend its local legislation by an Improvement Bill, which often from time to time requires amendments and supplementary provisions. Improvement Bills often involve collision with private interests; and both parties are fully heard before Committees of Parliament. There is a strong presumption that in all cases the Corporation represents the public interests of the borough, and it has seldom been doubted that the necessary expenses ought to be paid out of the corporate funds. It is absurd to impose on those who happen to hold municipal offices the expense and risk of a Parliamentary contest in which they are interested only in common with the local community. There are other kinds of litigation to which the same principle applies, as when special tribunals are legally authorised to adjudicate on questions which involve the interests of a town or district.

Every Private Bill contains a clause providing for the payment of the costs of promotion out of the funds raised under its provisions; but when a Bill is rejected by Parliament, it becomes a serious question how the expenses are to be paid. Costs of opposition in all cases must be met by the petitioners out of private or public funds; and only a few instances have occurred during five-and-thirty years since the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act in which legal objections have been raised to the discharge out of municipal resources of liabilities incurred by governing bodies. The Gas and Water Companies of Sheffield, and the Water Company of Edinburgh, may claim credit for having exposed for their own purposes the latent defects of the law. Having been engaged in legal and Parliamentary contests with their respective Corporations, the Companies have succeeded in making the members of the Corporations liable for expenses which ought in common justice to fall upon the rates. The Water Trustees of Edinburgh were some years since defeated in a scheme for providing a new water supply for the city; and the Water Company followed up their victory by objecting to the payment of the costs out of the municipal funds. The Corporation of Sheffield has been engaged in a still more complicated struggle, both with the Gas and Water Companies. After the calamitous bursting of the Holmfirth Reservoir, the Corporation opposed the Bill of the Company for the ascertainment of damages and for the increase of rates, and under both heads they succeeded in obtaining considerable advantages for their constituents. The contest was renewed as often as the Water Company applied to Parliament for further powers, and until the year 1869 no objection was raised to the payment of the costs of litigation out of the rates. In that year the Company submitted, under one of their Acts, to the borough justices certain proposed regulations preparatory to a constant supply; and the Corporation, in the interest of the consumers, opposed the regulations, and obtained considerable modifications. At the same time the Company promoted a Bill which would both have superseded the jurisdiction of the justices and have postponed the time of constant supply. The Corporation petitioned against the Bill, and deposited a counter Bill for the acquisition of the waterworks, and a similar Bill for the purchase of the gasworks. The Companies now combined for the purpose of crippling the action of their pertinacious opponents, and, on the relation of some of their shareholders in their capacity of ratepayers, the Court of Chancery granted an injunction restraining the application of the municipal funds to the promotion of Bills. The accounts which included the costs of the contest before the justices and of the opposition to the Companies' Bills were removed by certiorari to the Court of Queen's Bench, and after argument they were quashed, although the Judges expressed a strong opinion that the Corporation had acted in good faith and for the benefit of the borough. The hardship of the case was aggravated by the fact that the Companies paid their own costs out of their corporate funds, in which the ratepayers of Sheffield had a contingent interest. If those who conducted their affairs had not been excited by long-continued litigation, they would probably have hesitated to enforce a strict legal right at the risk of establishing the necessity of a change in the law. If Mr. LEEMAN'S Bill is passed, it will have been principally founded on the experience of Edinburgh and Sheffield; and it will arm Corporations with new powers of dealing with Joint Stock Companies.

The Bill which has been approved by the Select Committee contains a clause authorising the payment, under certain conditions, of costs incurred within three preceding years. The Committee, having probably satisfied themselves of the justice of the general enactments, determined to hear evidence only on retrospective claims; and they heard at length the statements of all the parties concerned in the Sheffield and Edinburgh transactions. As the clause was ultimately approved, it may be assumed that the justice of the case was on the side of the Corporations. It was, in fact, only by a fiction or an accident that the Companies obtained a locus standi in a court of law. Their nominees complained as ratepayers of proceedings to which, as Companies or as shareholders, they would not have been allowed to object; and yet it was possible that all the shares might have been held by strangers, and that no ratepayer could have been induced to join in a conspiracy against the corporate body. It is true that the Companies pay large rates, but, by another anomaly of the general law, they are not entitled to the privileges of ratepayers. About a hundred Corporations have petitioned in favour of the Bill, and as many Gas and Water Companies against it. There can be no doubt, between the two classes of petitioners, which is more likely to secure the favour of the House of Commons; and the House of Lords will probably prefer public to private interests, although it may possibly introduce some security against vexatious interference with the property of Companies. Several Corporations and one or two Companies must be supposed to approve the principle of the Bill, as they have petitioned for alterations. The tendency of recent legislation is to extend the power of local governing bodies; and Mr. LEEMAN'S Bill will operate in the same direction. The ratepayers, with whom ultimate power rests, are not altogether a satisfactory constituency, and serious scandals have impaired the credit of municipal elections; but on the whole increased responsibility tends to raise the character of elected administrators; and fortunately Corporations are largely under the influence of professional advisers who are for the most part upright, sagacious, and dispassionate.

SPAIN.

THE wretched little civil war lingers on in the Northern provinces of Spain like an intermittent malady which cannot be extirpated from the constitution, although it may not be immediately dangerous to life. It is not worth while to examine in detail the puzzling reports of Carlist gatherings and defeats. It seems that after the last serious check Don CARLOS recrossed the French frontier, and it is possible that he may have since re-entered Spain. Some villages which were supposed to have been favourable to his pretensions have refused to receive his emissaries, and bands of insurgents who have been surrounded, or who have become weary of the contest, have surrendered to the Government authorities. On the other hand, the friends of Don CARLOS assert that the insurrection is spreading in Navarre and Catalonia, and SERRANO has not yet thought it prudent to return to Madrid. The report that he had been defeated in person turns out, as might be expected, to be an impudent fiction; and the accounts of the campaign which are published by the partisans of the Pretender at Geneva are evidently works of imagination. It is difficult to understand the motives of a hopeless rebellion; and no light is thrown on the problem by the occasional proclamations of Don CARLOS and his lieutenants. The cry of "Death to the foreigner" is partially intelligible as the expression of a prejudice common to all nations; but it is doubtful whether popular dislike of an unknown Italian prince is combined with any warm feeling of loyalty to a Pretender descended from an imbecile King who ceased to reign more than sixty years ago. The other alleged reasons for insurrection are even more unsubstantial than professed dislike of King AMADEO. The Biscayans or Navarrese are from time to time exhorted to take arms because the time has come to choose between death and disgrace; and they are assured of the questionable proposition that it is better to die for liberty than to live dishonoured. If it were especially dishonourable to pursue peaceful avocations under the existing Government, it might perhaps be unnecessary to inquire how far Don CARLOS deserves to be regarded as the champion of liberty. It is surprising that any Spaniard should be so magnanimous as to risk his life in deference to empty rhetorical commonplaces. The zeal for religion which is stimulated by a portion of the clergy may perhaps be more operative than enthusiasm for hereditary right; and, however paradoxical the arguments of the Carlist leaders may appear, the fact remains that some thousands of partisans have at different times assembled in obedience to their summons, in places which were thought to be beyond the reach of the Government troops. In the petty skirmishes which have been reported, the small number of killed and wounded on the Carlist side indicates both their inability to stand against regular troops in the field, and the facility of escape which they derive from their lax discipline as well as from their knowledge of the country. It is even asserted that many of SERRANO'S prisoners were merely inhabitants of the neighbouring districts who were suspected of entertaining friendly relations with the insurgents. It is not easy to distinguish between the members of armed bands who have after a repulse resumed their ordinary occupations, and shepherds or cultivators who may have taken no share in the insurrection. Such enemies can scarcely be formidable, but they are extremely troublesome.

The conduct of other political factions must be more disheartening to the King and his adherents than the sporadic efforts of the Carlists. The members of the regular Opposition enjoy the embarrassments by which SAGASTA is beset, although they may themselves at any moment be called upon to encounter the same difficulties as his successors in office. The Republicans have ostentatiously announced that they have no relations with the Carlists, but that in conformity with their principles they remain neutral in the contest between two monarchical dynasties. There had been some reason to suspect that the coalition of extreme factions for the purposes of the late election had extended into a conspiracy of armed resistance against the Government. The Carlists hoped that their Republican allies would create a diversion in the South of Spain by taking possession of some of the great towns in which they are most numerous. For the present the expectations of the insurgent leaders have been disappointed; but the affectation of abstinence and impartiality almost amounts to rebellion against the Government. The chief obstacle to freedom in Spain, as in France, is the universal unwillingness to acquiesce in the decision of the majority. When the question as to the best form of government was thrown open by the dethronement of the QUEEN, it was natural that the Republicans should advocate their own doctrines in opposition to the various schemes for reorganizing the Monarchy. Two general elections since that time have produced overwhelming majorities against a Republic; and it is not disputed that the Cortes who framed the existing Constitution were elected with perfect freedom. It is possible that the administrative authorities may have interfered unduly in the elections of the present year; but many Republicans have been returned, and there is no reason to doubt that the Cortes on the whole represent the opinion of the country. The King is neither an intruder nor a usurper, for he was invited to Spain after election by the Cortes, which had been authorised by its constituents to choose a King. It was known that he was a foreigner, and the objection was deliberately overruled. No rival candidate would have been unanimously accepted; and the establishment of a Republic would have been in the highest degree distasteful to the respectable classes, and probably to the bulk of the population. If, in a divided community, no party will submit to a Government which it has not itself selected, the only alternatives are anarchy or coercion.

The most encouraging result of the petty struggle in the North is the fidelity of the army. It is perhaps fortunate that SERRANO, who is the nominal head of the Government, and who has just been invited to form a Ministry, is also the only military chief of considerable reputation. Ten or twenty years ago O'DONNELL, NARVAEZ, or PRIM could always rely on a certain number of regiments to mutiny against the Government. It was after the latest and most successful experiment of the kind that PRIM, who had risen by means of insurrection to supreme power, sternly warned the officers and soldiers that they had no concern with political disputes, and that their only duty consisted in loyalty to the established Government. It might almost seem that his counsels have been followed, for the troops have hitherto repressed, both under the Provisional Government and since the accession of the King, all attempts to disturb the peace. SERRANO's summer campaign will furnish a pretext for confirming the attachment of the officers to the Government by a due liberality in promotions and decorations. The best security for the obedience of the soldiers is the habit of following their flag. There is little probability of any serious disaster; but the insurgents may perhaps harness the troops by their pertinacity, and there may be some difficulty in providing reinforcements. The greater part of the Spanish army cannot be spared from Cuba, and the conscription is always unpopular. It is necessary to guard against Republican disturbances by the maintenance of garrisons in the principal towns; and the civil war will aggravate the chronic embarrassment of the finances. If the King succeeds in overcoming present difficulties, the lapse of time will tell in his favour. The objection to him on the ground that he is a foreigner will gradually become weaker, and all reasonable Spaniards must long since have discovered that any tolerable system of government is better than a revolution. The scandals of Queen ISABELLA's reign were tolerated for thirty years, although her title was regarded by many of her subjects as doubtful. The indignation which ultimately proved fatal to her cause was in itself highly creditable, but since her fall there has been incessant uncertainty as to the future. The expulsion of the new dynasty would only prolong or perpetuate the moral confusion which enables the Republicans to proclaim a kind of political secession. No other candidate for the throne is supported by the bulk of the nation, and the Republic is generally thought to imply disorder and spoliation.

The life of a Royal cadet is probably dull; and the possession of a throne seems to present peculiar attractions to those who have been born and bred in its immediate neighbourhood. If the Archduke MAXIMILIAN sacrificed ease and security for the precarious Crown of Mexico, it is perhaps not surprising that an Italian Prince should be willing to become King of Spain; yet it is possible that Prince LEOPOLD of HOHENZOLLERN, who had been previously selected by PRIM, may sometimes congratulate himself on the real or pretended jealousy of which the smallest result was the rejection of his claims. The absurd pretext which was selected by NAPOLEON III. for the commencement of a ruinous war appears still more frivolous when the advantages and powers of Spanish Royalty are illustrated by the position of the actual King. France would not have been endangered nor would Germany have been strengthened by the elevation of a Prussian Prince who would have been denounced by Carlist rebels as a foreigner, while Republicans would have refused to acknowledge his title or to assist in maintaining his authority. If King AMADO overcomes his numerous adversaries, he will have added lustre to the ancient House of SAVOY; but his family connexion with the Italian dynasty will have little political value. To himself it is for the moment injurious, because a son of the King of ITALY is especially obnoxious to the Ultramontane clergy. A Biscayan peasant may possibly believe that there is a peculiar merit in rebelling against a member of a family which is popularly thought to have been excommunicated, and which has undoubtedly been the object of innumerable comminations. In Spain, as in other parts of Europe, the power of Rome is declining, but it has not become wholly extinct. Although the Pope himself is not known to have formally approved the Carlist insurrection, the Pretender might safely count on his blessing if he had any reasonable prospect of success. Only a few years ago the Spanish Court was governed by two or three prelates and miraculous nuns, and probably DON CARLOS, if he were established at Madrid, would be found equally manageable. Parliaments in modern times are habitually exempt from the influence of confessors.

THE BANISHED COMMUNISTS.

THE French Government has very injudiciously renewed the practice which it was understood to have agreed to abandon, of forcing bodies of its political prisoners on board the Calais packets, and having them landed at Dover without a furthering. The consequence is that these unfortunate wretches are seen walking along English roads, living on vegetables stolen from the fields, footsore and bewildered, and obliged to depend on casual charity in order to reach London, where they hope to find at least shelter and food. This is not a spectacle which a foreign Government ought to force on the eyes of Englishmen, and it is not strange that those who live in the districts immediately concerned should be alarmed and indignant. English ratepayers do not relish the prospect of having to pay increased poor-rates because foreign paupers are thrown on their hands, and there is a natural feeling that it is contemptible in the French Government thus to parade the misery of Frenchmen, and that it is an unjustifiable abuse of English hospitality to throw batches of Communists on our shores simply because we are proud of offering a safe asylum to political refugees. It is because these men are banished to England by the French Government that we complain. If they were escaped prisoners we should not have a word to say. They would have risked their lives to get away, and we should be quite willing that they should take their chance; and if they got over, and could earn their living when they arrived, they would be welcome to drag on here such kind of existence as might be possible for them. But the intervention of the French Government entirely alters the character of the proceeding. Escaped prisoners cannot be very numerous, and their coming would entail no serious burden on English charity. But a Government can deport as many of its political enemies as it chooses to get rid of. If forty Communists may be sent here, so may forty thousand. Nor, if it is the Government that sends them here, can we have the satisfaction of thinking we are offering an asylum. We are simply helping the French Government to get rid of a vast body of citizens of whom it is afraid. Why should we be asked to do this? We do not wish to act as the policemen of France, or to have to decide which of the various revolutionary parties in France is right. But the French Government did more than land these poor creatures at Dover without a sou in their pockets. It actually prevented their having any money or clothes to leave France with. The Communists recently landed at Dover were suddenly told that they must petition to be sent to England, and on this request being granted, they were hurried from the hulks at Cherbourg to Calais without being suffered to communicate with their friends at Paris, who would gladly have contributed a few necessaries for the journey, and a little sum in hand to start with. If they had been private persons escaping from a hostile Government, they would have provided themselves with something of an outfit before they tried the hazard of escape, and if they got away they would not have come here utterly destitute, and England would not have had to provide them with immediate support. But these men were made destitute by the French Government, and then sent here in their utter destitution. This was neither fair to us nor to them, and we trust that Lord GRANVILLE will be perfectly frank and firm in his communications with the French Government, and will let it know that, in filling the Dover packet with batches of destitute Communists, it is committing what we distinctly pronounce to be an unfriendly act.

In justice to the French Government and to the exiles themselves the Communists should be looked on as ordinary political prisoners. We do not for a moment believe that the French Government would think of landing destitute thieves and bargains at Dover. It would recognize the duty of taking care of its own criminals of the ordinary kind, and it is mis-stating and weakening the case against the French Government to assume that, because these Communists are landed in this way, we are in danger of being overrun by the refuse of the French gaols and hulks. Nor can it be pretended that those who are sent here are men to whom any serious suspicion attaches of having been guilty of any of the great crimes which have affixed so black a stain on the memory of the Commune. Had they been caught burning buildings, or throwing petroleum, or shooting priests, they would have been brought to justice in France. They are merely men who for one reason or another took part against the existing Government in the civil war of last year. Many of them say, and probably they only speak the truth when they say, that being in Paris when the Commune was proclaimed, they had no choice given them, and were obliged to fight against the armies of Versailles, unless they preferred being shot by Communist soldiers. Others drifted into the civil war because they had been accustomed to live a half-military life during the siege, and believed they were only continuing an easy and exciting existence to enjoy which they had established a right by their remarkable services against the Prussians. Others, again, avow that they took up arms against the Government because they considered that the Assembly was reactionary, and that they had a right to defend their beloved Republic when it was attacked. We do not see how it is possible for any one who has read the documents recently published by the French Government to think that the mass of those who took part in the revolution of the 18th of March were in any way worse than those who have taken part in other Continental revolutions. They were foolish and unpatriotic, and tried to do much mischief, and were under the command of men of dangerous principles. But exactly the same may be said of those who are taking part in the present Carlist insurrection. At a moment when Spain is in great difficulties they are trying to upset the only decent Government that Spain has a chance of getting in order to favour the interests of Ultramontanes. The evidence given before the Commission appointed to report on the history of the siege of Paris and the subsequent insurrection shows clearly that everything had for months been in such a state of anarchy, the ruling force so weak, and the ruled so excited, that men altogether lost their power of judging and controlling themselves, and did not know which way to turn for guidance. The Government against which Paris rebelled had fulfilled in Paris scarcely any of the functions of Government, and when the crisis came, it suffered itself to be ignominiously surprised, and then ignominiously slunk away. The National Guard fought against a Government that seemed to have abdicated, and when fighting had once begun, could not draw back. The result to which their investigations brought the Commission was that the Communists properly so called were a fraction numerically insignificant, and that the fraction gained and kept supreme power because the demoralization of the siege had removed all the barriers by which society generally restrains bad and violent men. There is a convenience in using a short and popular phrase; but it is really inaccurate to speak of such men as those recently banished to England as Communists. They had nothing to do with the special crimes of the Commune, and this, we may repeat, is the precise reason why the French Government sends them here. After the second siege of Paris was over, prisoners fell into the hands of the Government in most inconvenient quantities. Thousands upon thousands of men and women were taken, and had to be done something with. The massacres in which the guilty and the innocent were shot down in order to create an impression, or to gratify the bad passions of officers and soldiers, had been so terrible that it was impossible to go further in that way of ridding the conquerors of the conquered. All these thousands of prisoners had therefore to be kept as prisoners, and no doubt they suffered great hardships, which the Government, having no means of providing for their detention in a proper manner, could not entirely prevent, and, we fear, did not much regret. Out of the mass of prisoners three classes of persons were weeded—the leaders of the insurrection, those guilty of the great Communist crimes, and those who had deserted the ranks of the army. These select persons were tried, with more or less attention to the rules of justice, by court-martial. The rest remained, too dangerous after all they had endured to be immediately released, too numerous and too little guilty to be severely punished. What was to be done with them? It was a difficult question to answer, and the French Government, feeling much pressed by the difficulty, sought a practical solution by banishing them to England.

Continental Governments have a very simple mode of behaving under such circumstances. They positively refuse to receive banished political prisoners. Belgium, Germany, and Switzerland will not let these Communist exiles cross their frontiers. They consider that to do so would be to encounter a serious political risk to themselves. They are troubled with a revolutionary element which they do not wish to see augmented. Even if the German Government is too strong to be afraid of democratic infection, the notion of sending French beggars into Germany would be preposterous in the present state of things; and it is easy to understand how weak Powers like Belgium, Switzerland, and, we may add, Spain, should shrink from receiving a set of men who might be dangerous to the Government receiving them, and whose future proceedings might seriously embroil that Government with France. England is in a very different position. We are not in the habit of driving away any one who chooses to come here. Every one is free to land here who likes. No questions are asked, and no precautions are taken. We cannot pretend to be in the least afraid of the Communists, and believe that our institutions are far too firmly established in the habits and affections of the people for a few foolish foreigners to upset them. Nor can we assert that it is contrary to good faith and international usage that a Government should send its political prisoners to another country, for we lately sent a batch of our Fenian prisoners to the United States. But then we not only paid their passage across the Atlantic, but gave them a sum in hand to start with, and we encouraged the friends of the prisoners to give them every aid in their power. The true cause of complaint is not that the French Government sent a few political prisoners here, but that it sent them in a state of destitution. Even if they had come sufficiently provided we should have reason to complain if they were sent here in very large numbers. If there were a Fenian revolution in Ireland on a large scale, no one would expect that if, after it had been suppressed, we sent thousands of Fenian prisoners to New York, the United States Government would offer no remonstrance. It is all a question of the mode and extent of doing the thing. If the French Government chose to send as many political prisoners here as we sent to America, and provided them with necessaries, and allowed their friends to assist them, we should not have a word to say. But we have a right to complain if those who are banished here come unprovided, or if they come in excessive numbers. The French Government cannot fail to see the justice of this complaint if it is clearly brought to their notice. They will see that they must find out some other mode of dealing with their inconveniently numerous prisoners. They now assert that they do what they are doing out of kindness to those they banish. If such men are not banished to England they can go nowhere else, and must pass their lives in a French prison. The true way of putting it is that only a fraction of the prisoners can be sent to England, and that at a considerable cost, which the French Government would dislike meeting, and therefore, as the mass of the prisoners must remain in France, it is the business of the French Government to devise some means of letting them out of prison without endangering the safety of the State. No doubt the French Government is awkwardly situated in the matter. It is afraid to let these men out of prison, for there is a large portion of the population, especially in Paris, which is still in a disturbed and excited condition; and it is afraid to keep them in prison, for they have at least a right to be tried, and the task of trying all the civilians who simply took part in the insurrection would be a long and arduous one, and would raise political questions of a most embarrassing kind. There would appear to be no better course open for the Government than to let things go on as they are for a little while longer, and to seize the earliest possible opportunity of proclaiming a general amnesty for all those whose conduct does not come under the special heads of criminality to which we have already referred.

THE TIMES AND IRISH UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

THE Times has performed a difficult operation with great skill and boldness. It has turned completely round on the Irish University question. There has been no parade of conversion, and no attempt at reconciling its present with its former position. The subject is taken up with the tone and manner of a journal approaching it for the first time. "The facts of the University system of Ireland, the anomalies and "harsh inequalities in it, and the manner in which it hurts the feelings of a portion of the community at least," are assumed, with great truth, to be "very imperfectly known" to Englishmen. "Theories which, however plausible and even sound they may be in the abstract, fail to meet the real circumstances of the case, or to afford a fair solution of the problem," are declared with equal truth to have "exercised an unfortunate influence on the popular judgment." Yet "time," "thought, and a candid endeavour to discover the truth" will eventually lead Parliament to sound conclusions; and to promote this object the Times proposes to "indicate the principles of a true reform." It has a further reason for undertaking this task, that the only plan at present before Parliament for improving the University system of Ireland is "essentially partial and inadequate," besides falling so far short of meeting the fair requirements of large classes of Irishmen that "it almost appears to them a cunning device to maintain existing anomalies by the expedient of an illusory compromise." Considering the articles on Mr. FAWCETT's Bill which appeared in the Times a month or so back, it will be admitted that this is as complete a recantation as could be desired. It is an additional merit in the conduct of the Times that it displays the modesty so characteristic of true sorrow. It enters into its closet and shuts the door; in the less allegorical language of journalism, it prints its confession in the outer sheet.

We are too glad to have the Times for an ally to dwell further on the fact that it was once an adversary. The articles devoted to Irish University Education and Reform on Wednesday and Thursday last state the case against the Secularist Liberals with great force and succinctness. The shortcomings of Trinity College are first set out. "It is not, and has never been, anything like a national University," and without "thorough and organic change"—the precise kind of change which Mr. FAWCETT has abstained from proposing—it never can be a national University. It is not the system of tests alone that gives it a sectarian character. "It is that all the associations of the spot, that many of the studies connected with it, that the moral atmosphere which surrounds it, that the social life which prevails in it, are in an extreme sense Protestant; and these combined influences powerfully affect and give its tone to the whole community." If the atmosphere of the place were more congenial to them, the Roman Catholic members of Trinity College would contribute a fourth or a third of the Society. As it is, they do not average more than a twentieth. The Queen's University, with its three affiliated colleges at Cork, Belfast, and Galway, shares with Trinity College the defect of being "in no sense of a national character." By attempting to create a University system on the principle of compulsory and combined secular instruction and voluntary and separate religious instruction, the State has practically excluded a great number of Roman Catholics from the benefit which it intended to give them. "If it is true that institutions are made for men, and men not merely made for institutions," this fact "cannot be disregarded by statesmen." Taking into account the class of young men usually educated in the Queen's Colleges, the Roman Catholic students ought to be a majority of the whole body. As it is, they are not nearly a fourth. Mr. GLADSTONE "is correct in saying that the Roman Catholics have a real grievance as regards the higher education of Ireland"; it remains to be seen in what way this undoubted wrong is to be remedied.

The Times begins this inquiry by an examination of Mr. FAWCETT's Bill. The main vice of this measure is that, even if it removed the administrative anomalies and abuses which disfigure Trinity College far more completely than it promises to do, it would not in any appreciable degree "satisfy the legitimate demands" of the class which is at present alienated from Trinity College. The College would either remain essentially Protestant for many years, or it would become unsectarian. In neither case would it attract any more Roman Catholic students than it does at present. As a Protestant place of education it would be shunned by the Roman Catholics who dislike Protestantism. As an unsectarian place of education it would be shunned by the Roman Catholics who dislike Secularism. The choice would be between continuing to fail as it has failed hitherto, and failing over again as the Queen's University has failed hitherto. Whatever other merits Mr. FAWCETT's Bill may possess, it does not "meet the fair demands of the Roman Catholics," and consequently it does not "even approach a settlement of the University question of Ireland." The Times next examines with great fairness the proposals of the Irish Roman Catholic bishops. The "levelling up" scheme of chartering and endowing a separate Roman Catholic University is dismissed as having no chance of obtaining the approbation of Parliament, and as being at issue with recent Irish legislation. The alternative scheme of a single national University in which Trinity College, the Queen's Colleges, and the present "Catholic University," should be so many distinct colleges, is next considered. As we understand the Times, it sees no objection in principle to this arrangement. On the contrary, it admits that "a system of exclusively Roman Catholic colleges, affiliated to a national University," may possibly be the "best expedient for procuring the benefits of high education for those Roman Catholics who dislike Trinity College and the Queen's University." It objects to the scheme only so far as it involves the endowment of Roman Catholic colleges out of the funds of Trinity College and the Queen's Colleges; and it rests this objection on two grounds—the impossibility of carrying such a Bill through Parliament, and the inexpediency of interfering with the endowments of the existing institutions. That Parliament would reject any proposal for endowing exclusively Roman Catholic Colleges, whether out of the Consolidated Fund or out of the endowments at present devoted to the higher education in Ireland, may be taken as practically assured. As regards the alleged inexpediency of diverting educational endowments from their present holders, it may be granted as a matter of course that it would be "iniquitous in a high degree to appropriate their private endowments." The Irish Church Act has set an example of discriminating between public property appropriated to specific objects and private donations bestowed on the same objects, which ought certainly to be followed in dealing with Trinity College. But the further concession, that "it would be very unwise to resume any of their public endowments except such as were absolutely required for the maintenance of the National University," goes very much too far. If any of the public endowments are left in the hands either of distinctively Protestant or distinctively secular colleges while no public endowment is given to distinctively Roman Catholic colleges, there will be an obvious inequality in the treatment meted out to the several religions of Ireland. Either no form of University education must be specially endowed, or all forms must be endowed impartially; and if it be granted that the latter solution is virtually impossible, it follows that all the public property now in the hands of Trinity College and the Queen's Colleges must be made over to the National University. It would be a further advantage of this latter scheme that it would not necessitate that abolition of religious tests in Trinity College which the Times regards as a natural and inevitable supplement of the plan it proposes. Undoubtedly if Trinity College is allowed to retain its public endowments, it would be impossible to leave it a distinctively Protestant institution. But the connexion between the present grievance and the proposed remedy is not apparent. The fault of the existing condition of things is that the State provides Protestant education at Trinity College, unsectarian education at the Queen's Colleges, and Roman Catholic education nowhere. The Times would meet this by a system under which the State would provide Roman Catholic education at the "Catholic University," unsectarian education at Trinity College and the Queen's Colleges, and Protestant education nowhere. Surely it would be a fairer course to give Trinity College the option of retaining its connexion with the disestablished Irish Church. Of course Parliament cannot do more for the Irish Protestants than they are willing to do for themselves. If Trinity College insists on divesting itself of its theological character, it is no one's business to say it nay. But before the authorities are taken at their word, it should be made clear to them that they will not save their public endowments by so doing. There is some reason to suspect that their new-born zeal for the abolition of tests may not survive their enlightenment on this point. With the single exception of the passage relating to the disposition of existing public endowments, the scheme put forward by the Times is identical with the scheme that has been more than once expounded in the Saturday Review. There may be difficulties in carrying it out in practice, but we are more and more convinced that it contains in principle all the essentials of a satisfactory settlement.

MR. TREVELYAN AT LIVERPOOL.

IT appears that a great event has just happened in Lancashire, which quite eclipses Mr. DISRAELI's recent visit. Mr. G. O. TREVELYAN has made a speech, or delivered a lecture, at the opening of a new Liberal Club at Liverpool; and has patted Mr. GLADSTONE on the back, and kindly presented him with a new patent recipe for healing all divisions in the Liberal party and making it again as one man; and forthwith the newspaper which gives itself out as Mr. GLADSTONE'S favourite organ salutes this "fresh and shining standard" of Liberalism, and sings a song of triumph over the exorcism of the Conservative Reaction. Even that other Liberal journal which is supposed not to enjoy Mr. GLADSTONE'S confidence from the eagerness with which it watches for every opportunity to have a dig at him, announces the immediate restoration of the Liberal party to perfect unity. When two such organs agree in asserting that the party feels very much the better for Mr. TREVELYAN'S prescription, we are perhaps bound to believe that there is really something in it. It would seem, however, that the cure has been rather a sudden one, inasmuch as the patient, who is admitted to have been in a bad way, must have rallied the instant Mr. TREVELYAN'S speech or lecture was delivered, so that the news of the recovery might be published next morning along with the address. Nor can we forget that a few weeks ago one of these journals announced with equal confidence that the German armies were marching back to Paris, while the other intimated that our own Government had resolved to stake its existence on a vote of confidence which it is known to have used all its influence and ingenuity to avoid. It is true that all sorts of odd things have from time immemorial been deemed good against witchcraft, and as the Conservative Reaction appears to be regarded as something to be exorcised, there is perhaps no reason to be surprised that what might otherwise seem to be a trivial and petty remedy has been devised to put an end to it. A ready faith goes a long way in such cases, and if the Liberals choose to believe that this sort of thing is likely to do them good, they have a right to try whether believing will help them. We can only say that the lecture does not strike an impartial observer as a medicine of much potency. Not long since there was a Zouave in Paris who professed to be able to cure persons afflicted with lameness or paralysis, and whose treatment consisted simply in a peremptory order to get up and walk; but the result was not generally deemed satisfactory. It would seem that Mr. TREVELYAN adopts pretty much the same expedient. His object and that of the new Club is stated to be to draw closer the ties which unite, or rather should unite, the different sections of the Liberal party; and he appears to be of opinion that when he has said "Be united" in an authoritative manner, a union will immediately be effected. We are afraid that the schisms from which the Liberals are suffering will continue as long as the causes from which they arise are in operation; and we fail to discover in Mr. TREVELYAN'S address any reason for supposing that these causes have ceased to exist.

It is obvious that the reason why the Liberal party is at present out of sorts is simply that one section of it wants to go faster and further than another, and the party is afraid to move lest it should pull itself asunder. Mr. TREVELYAN belongs to the section which is in favour of fast and violent movement, and he thinks he has settled everything when he has assured those who desire to go slowly and surely that they must make up their minds to go at just the pace which he and his associates choose to dictate. Nobody doubts that the Liberal party would soon be all right if the various branches of which it is composed would only come to an agreement as to the road they should take and the rate at which they should travel; but this agreement is not likely to be attained by the most extreme and violent members of the party insisting that they alone shall regulate its movements. It is not very long since Lord GRANVILLE, at the opening of another Liberal Club at Manchester, exhorted his hearers to study compromise and conciliation, and to bear in mind that it was better to move in the right direction slowly than to come to a standstill through disputes as to the course to be followed. Mr. TREVELYAN'S notion of compromise and conciliation would seem to be that everybody is bound to do exactly as he bids them. He expresses his satisfaction at finding that Mr. GLADSTONE was not afraid to exercise in the name of the majority of the people "that strength of hand and that direct and fearless action which have hitherto been employed only by Ministers who were carrying out the dictates of a despot." It is a convenient assumption that the majority of the people is always on the side of your favourite policy, and the despots whose modes of action Mr. TREVELYAN would like to see substituted for the cautious processes of constitutional government have never hesitated to plead a justification which they did not think it necessary to prove. It is supposed to be one of the advantages of a constitutional system that it provides the means of ascertaining the wishes of the people, as well as a security that their wishes shall be consulted; and as Mr. GLADSTONE was satisfied that the majority of the country was on his side, he would have lost nothing by seeking the sanction and assistance of its legal representatives. It is characteristic of one of the schools of modern Liberalism to prefer the success of its own peculiar tenets to the larger conditions of genuine freedom. Mr. TREVELYAN holds that it is impossible to keep a strong Liberal party together except by means of great and searching reforms. The political machine, he says, is now far more powerful than it was, and therefore it wants a larger fire under the boiler. He has come to the conclusion that working-men cannot be induced to come to the poll by holding out hopes of trivial changes which they hardly care to understand. It is necessary to rouse them by proposing large measures, and by encouraging them to expect vast changes. It is quite possible that this may be the most effectual method of working on the passions and desires of the labouring classes; but it may be doubted whether it is the kind of programme which is calculated to unite the Liberal party and to conciliate moderate men. A man must be very blind to the political signs of the times who does not see that the country has had enough of great measures for a while, and that it wants rest and peace, and quiet practical legislation in familiar grooves. The journal which professes the most profound admiration for Mr. GLADSTONE has observed, in commenting on this address, that this is a great age, and that legislation must be large when the nation votes. Household suffrage, it appears, is too grand a machine to be employed for common everyday work; it must be provided "with material worthy of its vast action." Most people will perhaps be disposed to think that the convenience of a kitchen-fire is more to be desired than the splendour of a conflagration. Household suffrage will prove a costly engine if it has to be fed, like a new Moloch, with an institution or two every year.

The want of a definite policy on the part of the Conservative leaders supplied Mr. TREVELYAN with an obvious opportunity for some telling remarks. Mr. GLADSTONE has recently been credited with the observation that a Minister is not bound to disclose his views on any question till the moment for action arrives, and that no Minister could hold office who did not frequently take refuge in silence. This may be true to a certain extent, but it is obvious that a Ministry cannot be accepted altogether on trust; and some indication of the general principles on which those who aspire to govern the country would deal with pressing questions of the day may reasonably be expected. It is impossible to suppose that Mr. DISRAELI and Mr. HARDY can hope to win a sufficient number of seats to give them a majority by the kind of vague declamation in which they have lately been indulging. Practical people—and, on the whole, Englishmen are practical—say to themselves, Here are a number of subjects which, if you went into office, would immediately demand your attention; what would you do in regard to them? Would you let them alone, or would you treat them in this way or in that way? It would be out of the question, of course, that an answer to these inquiries should be given in detail by statesmen not in office; but Lord DERBY lately found no difficulty in supplying a general answer which proved to be highly acceptable to many Liberals as well as to Conservatives. At the same time negative or destructive criticism is a legitimate function of the Opposition; and Mr. TREVELYAN'S sympathy with the present Government perhaps blinds him to the usefulness of faultfinding. His defence of Mr. CHILDERS'S reforms deserves attention; but he overlooks the main objection to these changes, which is, not that they were necessarily bad in themselves, but that they were carried out with reckless and inconsiderate haste. It is not unnatural that Mr. TREVELYAN should prefer Lord RUSSELL as Foreign Secretary to Lord MALMESBURY; but his admiration for Lord RUSSELL as a model Minister is a curious apology for the foreign policy of the present Government, which Lord RUSSELL has strongly condemned. There is one point on which all reasonable and honest politicians will agree with Mr. TREVELYAN, and that is, as to the folly and immorality of substituting a Conservative for a Liberal Government in the hope that the former might prove more squeezable, and that concessions to democracy might be extorted from its weakness. Such a policy would certainly do more to lower political morality than to advance political progress. On the whole, Mr. TREVELYAN'S speech is a characteristic illustration of the difficulties which beset the Liberal party. He professes to be extremely anxious for united action, and insists that the Government must be supported; but it immediately appears that the union is to be on his own terms, and that he is prepared to support the Government only if they adopt his views and go in for a roaring fire under the Parliamentary boiler.

HOLIDAYS.

THE body of gentlemen who are kind enough to talk for our amusement at Westminster, and of whom we are ungrateful enough to complain that they sometimes confine their exertions too exclusively to talking, appear for once to have done a really popular thing. At the instance of Sir John Lubbock they have for a day thrown open the doors of the vast prison-house which we call London. A dreary prison it is; where most of the inmates are condemned to hard labour for life, with very insufficient food and lodging, and a singularly short supply of air. They seemed on Monday last thoroughly to enjoy the brief period of relaxation allowed to them. They came forth with all the indelible marks which a long period of confinement imprints upon the human body. They were sallow, grimy, and generally dismal in appearance, in spite of almost pathetic efforts to do honour to their day of liberty. They had a certain awkwardness in discovering methods of enjoyment, like that of a man who is dazzled by unaccustomed light. Possibly persons of refinement might be not altogether gratified by their company. Here and there the inseparable association which exists in the British mind between holidays and public-houses might be too strongly marked, and the pleasures most heartily enjoyed might have a certain dash of coarseness. And yet a man must be worse than a brute not to take pleasure in the knowledge that so many of his fellow-creatures were having a good time." Let us hope that they returned to their bondage a little less discontented with things in general, and with some gleam of sunshine resting on the dingy monotony of their everyday life.

And yet we can imagine a philosopher asking whether, on the whole, this need of holiday-making is altogether a good thing. Evidently the desire to shorten the hours of work tends to spread rapidly amongst us, and whilst there is so much that is unhealthy in the labours to which we are doomed, it is, within due limits, a very desirable tendency. But when we have reached the millennium will the necessity for relaxation be permanent? Some people assure us that the enjoyment which is now taken, for example, in mountains and natural scenery generally is due to the presence within us of some remnants of the ancestral savage. The wild man found his pleasurable activities in hunting and fishing. The instincts thus generated are still strong in his descendants. Every now and then, in accordance with a well-known law, there turns up a child of civilized parents who reverts to the primeval type. His outward circumstances determine that he shall be an hereditary legislator; but strip him of his modern vestments, and you find a mere repetition of the North American Indian. If he were permitted to yield to his natural propensities, he would retire to a prairie and pass his time in pursuing buffaloes and adorning himself with scalps. Fenced in by modern proprieties, his growth is stunted like that of a forest tree in a flower-pot, and he finds vent for his propensities in shooting pigeons and betting on the Derby. Though in a less pronounced form, we all of us have some share of these savage proclivities. The clergyman or lawyer caught, as is said to be the case with the half-civilized Australian, throw off his clothes, smear himself with paint, and stroll into the woods to support himself on grubs. Still he comes as near to such a proceeding as custom will allow. He makes as much revolt as he dares against the decencies which have been cramping his faculties and vexing his soul. He astonishes the intelligent foreigner in remote villages by the roughness of his attire and the voracity of his appetite. The old wild blood stirs and tingles within him. He scrambles over mountains, or follows grouse, or simply idles away his time in an attempt to reduce his brain as nearly as possible to the lowest pitch of activity consistent with the working of his lower organs. Would it not, then, be a convenience if we could get rid of those irregular propensities, which have become a mere anachronism? When an animal succeeds in rising to a new rank in creation, the organs which are no longer necessary tend to become rudimentary. The teeth which could once tear raw meat and crush bones become modest grinding machinery for the mastication of cooked food; the claws with which his extremities were furnished sink into mere shields for the protection of delicate nerves; and the brain asserts its superiority over the stomach, which no longer makes such imperious demands as of old. Should not a similar process be observed in the human being? Would it not be better if, as Shakspeare puts it, our natures could be subdued like the dyer's hand, to what it works in? More than one writer has lately tried to describe the ideal state of things to which the race is tending. We should like to see a portrait drawn by a duly qualified observer of the future being—we can hardly say man—who is to be to us what we are to the monkey. Such a creature, however much he might be in advance of us, would undoubtedly strike us at present as a disgusting monstrosity; and yet we ought to aim at his speedy realization. Should we not, on the same principle, endeavour to bring about a harmony between the faculties of the organism and the medium in which it is placed? London is rapidly spreading over the country, and fields, it must be supposed, will soon become merely raw material for the manufacture of food. It would only be a proper preparation for the coming day if we endeavoured to acclimatize ourselves to the atmosphere in which we shall all have to live. If we are to be cockneys, let us try to suppress the longing tastes for which our position is no longer appropriate. Men should convert themselves. All those Arcadian longings for fresh fields may be very picturesque according to our present view, but they are becoming very inconvenient as the opportunities for gratifying them narrow. We should endeavour to raise a new generation adapted for a new position. The smoke of London should be as congenial as sea-breezes to its lungs; the streets should be its natural playground, instead of the mountains; and it should feel as much out of place when wandering beyond the gaslights as a chamois transplanted to the wilds of the Regent's Park. The love of the country, in short, of which we are inclined to boast, is really a proof that we are only a slight improvement on the savage; and our backslidings, though they might be pardoned, should not be encouraged. We have indeed made very fair progress in securing this object. A very considerable proportion of the English race knows of the existence of the country only by tradition; every successive census shows that the proportion is increasing; and it certainly will not be denied that the generation which thus exists has at any rate the negative qualification of being thoroughly unfitted to the old-fashioned style of existence.

There are, we must confess, some difficulties in the way of carrying out this theory. Especially we do not feel quite clear as to its philosophical basis. We should doubt, for example, whether the modern love of nature is due to the survival of savage instincts. So far as we are able to analyse it, we are inclined to suspect that a taste for scenery grows with the development of certain intellectual propensities, and is not due simply to the fact that a few centuries ago our fathers had to pick up their living in the wilderness. So far as we can judge, that would be almost as good a reason for hating scenery as for loving it. It would be as plausible to say, that a love of society was generated in the days when the sight of a fellow-creature was a rare luxury, just as a love of solitude is being generated now that we are all treading on each other's toes. But, however this may be, we are at any rate of the opinion, erroneous as it appears to the followers of M. Comte, that philosophers do not yet so thoroughly understand all the ins and outs of human nature that they should be allowed to clip it to their favourite pattern. Indeed, instincts which fight against the prevailing state rather deserve encouragement, as, but for them, we might still have been sea-anemones. Discontent with our present position affords the necessary leverage for every social improvement; and some of those vague instincts which are undoubtedly inconvenient at the time may not be relics of expiring tendencies, but the first rudimentary symptoms of a new order of society. Let us by all means get rid of the savage; but we must not forget that we have succeeded in manufacturing a new type of the savage within our borders. The weapons which he is inclined to use have changed, and petroleum has taken the place of bows and arrows. He does not, like his predecessors, condemn his victims to be tortured at the stake; but he has certain visions of the guillotine which would be quite as effective an instrument. Moreover, he shows no symptoms of a tendency to be improved off the face of the earth, but on the contrary is remarkable for his singular power of rapid multiplication. It is of the utmost importance that he should be humanized by the development of the highest tastes which he possesses. Even if the best amusements in which he indulges are marked by a certain coarseness inseparable from his training, they afford the means of directing some of his energies into a new channel. And, to say the truth, though the holiday-making on Monday last was not all of the most unexceptionable kind, it showed symptoms of a capacity for improvement which ought to be encouraging to the benevolent. The cockney, indeed, never shows himself more awkward than when he is endeavouring to amuse himself. Whether the climate or the social conditions are to be blamed, he does not take to pleasure with the facility of the Continental races. A crowd of French or German artisans behave themselves with the comparative ease of people amongst whom the tradition of social enjoyment has not died out. They have a recognized code of manners, and understand the terms upon which they meet, and the best mode of extracting the greatest possible amount of enjoyment out of a spare afternoon. The Englishman always strikes us as more or less at a loss what to do with himself. He has a great notion that he must be happy if he is in a large crowd, and is treading with sufficient emphasis upon his neighbour's toes. He has a tendency to become boisterous, and to indulge in horseplay whenever he slips his collar for a moment. He thinks that he has not been thoroughly enjoying himself unless he has made himself very hot, and tired, and thirsty, and his aim is apparently to work himself into such a state of excitement as will enable him to keep just on the outside of a police-court. And yet, in spite of his roughness, he is a thoroughly good-tempered animal at the bottom. He deludes himself with touching tenderness into the belief that he has had a charming holiday when he has been jammed for several hours with a noisy crowd, or packed like a herring in a barrel into an excursion train or on board a penny steamboat. He asks for nothing better than to have more rational amusements provided for him, and accepts with the utmost good nature the feeblest attempts to supply his wants in that direction. The sight of such crowds as turned out upon Monday may suggest to the benevolent the value of a kind of charitable activity which is not open to the ordinary objection of demoralizing the recipients. In almost every attempt to alleviate the hardships of poverty, the political economist feels it necessary to quench the zeal of philanthropists by uncomfortable suggestions as to the probable working of their well-meant endeavours. But no such objection lies against teaching the masses to amuse themselves. Something has been done of late years; the Volunteer movement, for example, has made the

of a good deal of energy that was running to waste, and has provided a great many men with a fresh occupation for their spare hours; and it is possible that in various ways we have become a more amiable people than we were a few years ago. Still very much remains to be done; and now that the policy of giving additional time for recreation is generally admitted, there is more room for the invention of new pleasures, and especially of pleasures which are not of the ostentatiously imposing kind. The theory of employing idle hours requires a good deal of study, and much might be said upon it; but in one way or other there is plainly ample room for activity in reducing it to practice.

ITALY AT WORK.

THERE is probably no European country about which English opinion is so strangely ignorant or unjust as about Italy. Partly, no doubt, this arises from the natural reaction after the burst of sympathy with which we recognized the rise of Italian freedom. To people who had been watching the daring policy of Cavour or the romantic exploits of Garibaldi, there was something of an anti-climax in finding as the upshot of the great tragedy a few cautious statesmen quietly biding their hour, and a Parliament which wasted half its time in silly declamation. But in a far greater degree the injustice is owing to a radical misconception of the Italian character itself. In the ordinary English mind there is a very simple conception of Italy as the land of bandits and painters. The Englishman who goes a shade further in general knowledge adds to this a few sentimental impressions about Italian poetry and Italian song. It is a little provoking to persons duly furnished with their Murray and this compendious stock of common notions to find this traditional Italy nowhere. The brigand has been hunted down like a wolf. The monk has vanished from the cloister. Police are beginning to make the very lazzaroni move on. The stiletto of drama and fiction only lingers in much the same sorts of haunts as those which befriended the knife of our own Ratcliff Highway. But what is far worse is the discovery that in the land of poetry and song there is hardly a tolerable painter or a living composer of distinguished merit. Even in literature the vehement outburst of thirty years ago has been followed by as violent a reaction. Manzoni still lives, but the school which once promised to spring up around him has died down into a scanty crop of novelists only worthy of the Family Herald. There are still poets indeed by the score, but there is absolutely no poetry. It is easy, after jotting down a few discoveries of this sort, for the English sympathiser to add to them a few little vignettes of loungers at their caffè, or "jeunesse dorée" idling in the sunshine, and to pronounce with a peremptory decision that Italy is dead. Not only is this untrue, but it is the very reverse of truth. Italy is not only not dead, but it is just beginning to show signs of a more intense life than it has known since the age of Dante. But then it is by no means a life of poetry or the picturesque.

So far indeed is Italy from being the "land of singing and of dancing slaves," or freemen, which Pope and our usual impressions paint it, that the most striking characteristic of the Italian temper in all ages has been its faculty of combining, as no other race has ever combined, the practical element with the poetic, the most vivid imagination with the coolest and firmest grasp of fact. The Florence which produced Dante produced the shrewdest money-dealers of the middle ages. Savonarola walked down the same streets as Macchiavelli. Leonardo vibrated all his life between the restless search after spiritual beauty and the hard and abstract study of physical science. Michael Angelo was almost as great an engineer as he was an artist. Even in the eighteenth century the speculations of Vico were balanced by the researches of Volta, and Napoleon Buonaparte, who was simply a great Italian spoilt, combined the fevered extravagances of a political dreamer with the cool exactness of a mathematician. If at the present moment the idealistic or imaginative element in the Italian nature seems to have retired into the background, it is simply because the circumstances of the time call the practical and positive elements to the front. In politics, for instance, it would be absurd to say that the work of Mazzini or Garibaldi is over, or that their influence on the finer and nobler minds of Italy has ceased; the truth is simply that the difficulties and problems which Italy has to meet, now that it is "made," are of a wholly different order from those which it had to meet when great patriots and enthusiasts were making it. The new nation finds that its first business is to set its house in order. It has got to make amends for the industrial and administrative inaction of centuries. There are railroads to be cut, canals to be opened, harbours to be made. In the South even the simplest elements of social civilization have still to be supplied; there was till the other day hardly a school through the whole kingdom of Naples, and hardly a road in all Sicily that was better than a mule track. A fleet and army had to be created, not merely for purposes of national defence, but as schools of national unity. The whole fabric of national education had to be built up from the very foundation. The mere civil administration of the country had to be organized under the pressure of haste and necessity, and with the encumbrance of providing for a host of functionaries bequeathed by the wretched despotisms of the past. And all this work of internal reform, it must be remembered, had to be carried on amidst constant peril from without, amidst the menace and interference of France, the thunders of the Vatican, the intrigues of the Bourbons, and the embarrassments arising from the brigandage of the South and the disordered state of Italian finance. That the work as a whole is done, or even half done, we are not for one moment pretending. But there is not one of the great fields of labour which we have mentioned where work has not been resolutely begun; and it is worth while noticing the temper in which Italy has made its political beginning. It is something that a country which had no political traditions to fall back upon is creating political traditions of as sober and practical a sort as our own. Whatever instability may have attended its earlier Cabinets, the last six years have seen the same Italian Ministry in power; and, in spite of the sneers of English lookers-on at the "vague rhetoric" of Italian Parliaments, the influence of Signora Lanza and Sella is founded, not on their power of rhetoric at all, but upon the general conviction that they are practical and energetic men of business.

It is not, however, upon the temper of its Parliaments or statesmen that we are insisting so much as on the temper of the nation itself, as we may see it in its literature or in its journals. For there is an Italian literature, and a very busy one, although not of an emotional or imaginative order. The philosophical, historical, and scientific energy of the eighteenth century has revived in the metaphysical school of Naples, in the illustrious group of historians headed by Villari at Florence, and in the solar researches of Secchi at Rome. Philology numbers some of its keenest students in Italy, and the drift of national interest is seen in the abundance of publications on political economy and on administrative and municipal subjects. It is still clearer in the general tone and topics of the newspapers. Italian journalism has a vast deal yet to learn, especially in elementary matters such as the collection and publication of actual news; but in the direct and practical way in which it treats the social and political questions of the day it is far ahead of the journalism of France. The Avvenire or the Perseveranza often contains articles which might have appeared in the best London newspaper. There is evident in most of the current political discussion of Italy a wish to learn, without any of the old tendency to merely copy which distinguished their constitutional beginnings. The mimicry of French institutions which sowed Italy with "prefects" and "sub-prefects" is rapidly going out of fashion; but it is noteworthy that, while every Italian is convinced that local self-government must be restored, the tendency of public opinion is to prepare for the change by a careful study of local and municipal institutions elsewhere. So, too, in a careful review of the present defects of Parliamentary life in Italy, the Perseveranza lately directed attention to a peculiarity of English politics whose value is as yet hardly recognized by Englishmen themselves. After pointing out, as the two chief faults of Italian legislators, their excessive love of talking and the want of a more direct communication between them and their constituents, it suggested as a simple remedy the adoption of the English habit of "vacation speeches." By this means, it very wisely contended, the work of actual legislation would be facilitated, members could still express their sentiments, and the masses of the population would receive a constant and practical education in current politics. In much the same way a rival newspaper, at the time when the relations of the Church to the State were exciting public interest, actually took the trouble to translate and publish for its readers the whole of the Report of our Lower House of Convocation on the question of the election and nomination of bishops. The attention with which Italy regards English opinion is seen in the fact that few articles on Italian subjects appear in the leading London journals without being translated and republished in those of Florence or Rome. Even the diatribes which the Times periodically produces on the debt and financial embarrassments of Italy are brought before Italian readers, in spite of their ignorance and injustice. A large part of the debt of Italy has been incurred in the construction and purchase of railroads by the State, and the experience of Prussia has shown that no investment of money is likely to be more remunerative. Of the rest, not a little is owing to the sudden pressure of questions like education; the necessity, for instance, of providing in a few years schools for the whole of Southern Italy, where not a school existed before. That the army is a costly burden Italian statesmen know as well as the Times; what they perhaps know better is that the danger of foreign intervention has by no means passed away, and that, while compelled to maintain an enormous force in the presence of this menace to their very national existence, they have done their best to apply it to a yet more useful purpose by converting it into a great school and making it one of the most efficient means of public instruction.

It is possible that a fairer attempt to understand and do justice to the work of Italy might give more weight to English opinion, not merely on important political questions such as these, but on minor topics, such as those which are suggested by the rumours which reach us from Venice. We are fully aware of the difficulties which the Government in this particular instance has to meet. There is a natural desire to provide employment on public works for a population a quarter of whom are dependent on public charity. There is, besides, the wish to gratify the long-cherished hopes of the Venetian people, and to restore not only liberty, but wealth and commerce, to the "Queen of the Seas." We have quite as strong a sympathy with the bronzed children of the lagoons as with the frescoes of Tintoret, nor have we much patience with the æsthetic selfishness which would treat a great city simply as an art museum, without thought of the hundred thousand men and women who pour over the bridge of the Rialto. Even if the revival of commerce vexes our eyes with a few red brick stores along the Grand Canal, we should still look with satisfaction on the prospect of Venice again becoming, through the Peninsular and Oriental boats, the starting-place of travellers for the East. But it would surely be possible to find a means of employing the surplus labour of Venice without inflicting irremediable injury on some of the most precious monuments in the world. It is difficult to regard with patience the ruin which is being wrought, under the name of restoration, on what is most valuable in Venice. Mr. Ruskin somewhere or other tells us how he saw the great pictures in the roof of the Sala del Consiglio stretched on a floor and a man hard at work on them with a mop and a bucket of white paint. We had ourselves the chance of seeing the famous painting of Paulo Veronese from the church of St. Sebastian subjected to quite as merciless a flaying at the hands of the Accademia. There is only a single Titian in Venice which has been allowed to remain as Titian left it, and that it so remains is owing, not to Italian mercies, but to the exertions of an English gentleman. But "restoration" is playing far more terrible tricks with San Marc's than even with Titians and Tintoretta. Any guide will scramble up and tear down for a gaping tourist a handful of twelfth-century mosaic, while money is being squandered on the crude substitutes of Salvati. The front of San Marc's, as that gentleman and the Venetian architects have left it, is as utterly spoilt as it is possible for a front to be; and the Baptistery is now undergoing the same process of mutilation with probably much the same result. It is now announced that the famous pavement within is to be "restored" and "levelled." That it needs protection any one who has witnessed the wreck of some of its finest portions may very fairly admit; but that one of the most perfect combinations of colour which the old mosaic succeeded in producing should be ruthlessly destroyed to make way for the tawdry art of Salvati is simply unbearable. To "level" the floor of San Marc's is to destroy at a single blow one of the most poetic of Venetian impressions. There are few people even of the Cook's Tourist class who have not felt the strange harmony of that rolling floor with the fortunes of the "Mistress of the Soas." Even this, however, is a small matter compared with the project attributed to the Syndic of "restoring" the front of the Ducal Palace. To restore here means simply to destroy. Constructionally, as a glance over it would prove, the exterior of the Ducal Palace is as sound as any building in Venice. But even were some repair necessary, to hand over to an army of stone-cutters the precious carvings of its capitals and spandrels would be as ruthless an act as handing over the Raffaels of the Uffizi to an army of sign-painters. There are many cases where the only artistic mode of dealing with an old building when it sinks into decay is just to prop it up and keep it standing as long as we can—where, we mean, the result of any larger reconstruction is simply the destruction of all that makes the building worth having. And this is eminently so with the monuments of Venice. We can no more "restore" the carvings of the Renaissance than we can restore the frescoes of Giorgione which the winds of the Adriatic have swept off the front of the Fondaco di Tedeschi. The glory of a twelfth-century mosaic may be destroyed, but it can never be replaced. We shall need a new Tintoret to repaint the blurred canvas of the old one. What we can do is to protect what remains from ruthless injury, and of protection Venice gives us little enough. But we have said more perhaps than we intended on a subject which, after all, requires only a little of the Italian common sense for its fair consideration, and we can only trust that such consideration will be secured to it by our temperate expression of the unanimous opinion of Englishmen.

SERVANTS.

A PRUSSIAN field officer who has been recounting his experiences during the late war in France appears to have been especially struck by the remarkable fidelity and devotion of a number of old family servants who happened to come under his observation. He could not help admiring the thoroughness with which they identified themselves with the families they served, and their readiness to make any sacrifices in order to protect the interests of their masters. Sir Walter Scott has drawn the same type of character in several of his novels; and it is not improbable that some living examples of it may yet exist in the more secluded parts of Scotland, or even of England. Indeed, notwithstanding the Prussian officer's surprise on meeting with the phenomenon in France, it may be presumed that it is not unknown in his own country. It is to be feared, however, that the type is everywhere gradually disappearing. It was the product of peculiar social conditions which are passing away, and which cannot be restored. Disinterestedness and fidelity will still no doubt continue to be displayed in domestic as in other service, but not in the old form. That kind of blind, unquestioning, unreasoning devotion of the servant to his master, the humble attachment of a lower animal to a superior being, necessarily clashes with the spirit of personal independence which is characteristic of the present state of society. And, on the other hand, the kindly familiarity and frank intimacy which used to subsist between the master and his retainers is checked by the rising pretensions of the latter. On the old footing master and servant were brought closely together in one way, just because in another way they were so far apart. Their relative social rank was fixed and immutable; the inferior never for a moment thought of measuring himself in any respect with his master, while the master had no fear of being too condescending, or of encouraging encroachments on the part of his attendants. It may be admitted that this was not the highest kind of human relationship, but at least one wholesome effect of it was that it enabled master and servant to go about their respective duties without being perpetually haunted by doubts as to whether they were each asserting their rights sufficiently and getting all that was due to them. The master had no reason to be on his guard lest the servant should take liberties, while the servant did not feel himself under the necessity of continually seeking an opportunity to vindicate his dignity as a man and a brother. In the course of time the conditions of domestic service will probably be established on some logical and natural footing, but it is evident that they are at present in a transition state which is eminently uncomfortable for all concerned. Service has ceased to be a family tie in the old sense, but it has not yet shaken down into an ordinary commercial engagement; and indeed there are obvious reasons why, without something like a revolution in our social habits, it can hardly be assimilated altogether to the hiring of a clerk or workman, with fixed hours and definite duties. At the root of the difficulty is the servant's want of self-respect. English servants of all grades seem to have got it into their heads that there is something degrading in domestic service, and are tempted to despise themselves for being what they are. No good work can be expected from people who begin by being ashamed of their occupation. "Liberty and equality" has at least done something for France in this respect. One has only to compare a French and an English waiter, for example, to be struck by the difference. It is not so much that the Frenchman has a natural aptitude for whisking a napkin and carrying plates and dishes, but that, inspired by the principles of '89, he respects himself and his work. He feels entitled to hold up his head as a citizen, and whether he is a waiter or a rentier is only a matter of detail. He is a man first of all; and after that he is a waiter, and wears a long apron and jacket, just as another man is a Marshal or Minister, and wears a cocked hat and gold lace. The consequence is, that instead of feeling in any way degraded by his work, he takes a pride and interest in it, and is anxious to do it as well as he can. An English waiter, on the contrary, always looks as if he were heartily ashamed of himself, as no doubt he is, for being reduced to perform such functions, and the only way in which he can keep up his spirits is (besides tipping) by doing his work as badly as possible, and letting everybody see how much he is above it. And a similar unhappy feeling seems to infect the whole range of domestic service. This is probably the secret of the exasperation of women servants with the detested cap which they regard as a humiliating badge of servitude.

It would appear that there is an increasing difficulty in getting good men-servants, and that a large proportion of the young women who would ten or twenty years ago have gone into domestic service now prefer to be seamstresses, or machinists, or to seek situations in warehouses or manufactories. It can hardly be said that domestic service is thus deserted on account of its hardships. On the contrary, it is the lightest and most highly paid description of manual labour. A cook in a middle-class family with her 15*l.* or 20*l.* a year and "all found," has, as a rule, much lighter work and better pay than a shop-girl who may perhaps have a pound or two more in actual wages, but who has to provide food and lodgings at her own expense, and who finds when she has done this that there is an extremely small margin for savings or luxuries, and that indeed it is only with difficulty that a margin can be got at all. And the same may be said of men-servants, in receipt of wages and other advantages representing an income of between 80*l.* and 100*l.* a year, who, if they had not gone into service, would probably have been, as their brothers and cousins are, labourers or mechanics, and who would then have thought themselves fortunate if they could safely count on an income of half as much. As far as we can judge, there are two reasons why domestic service is unpopular. One is the false shame with which servants are apt to regard their occupation, and the other is the sense of restraint which accompanies residence with a family. Servants would be more contented, and there would be less difficulty in procuring them, if, on the one hand, they could be made to feel that there was nothing whatever of a humiliating character in their work, and, on the other hand, if means could be found of allowing greater freedom of action within those limits which are indispensable to domestic discipline. It may be doubted whether the agitation which has been set on foot by the women-servants at Dundee will have any immediate practical effect; indeed the only result as yet has been to form an Association which is suspiciously like a speculation in a new registry office; but the discussions which have taken place will at least serve to show what are the secret grievances of this class. The substance of the demands embodied in the rules of the Association is that servants are to be allowed to dress as they please, and that they are to have three hours daily at their absolute disposal, a weekly half-holiday commencing at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and a whole Sunday once a fortnight. While laying down these conditions, the Association is good enough to say that "it is not to be understood that necessary operations in the house which cannot reasonably be left undone shall not be performed." No indication, however, is given of what is to be considered a necessary operation, or of the circumstances under which it may be held that it cannot reasonably be left undone. It appears that in Scotland, as in the North of England, domestic servants are engaged by the year; and it is proposed that engagements at a month's notice on either side shall in future be the rule. This is already the practice in London, and there can be no doubt that there are strong considerations of convenience in its favour. It is equally unpleasant for a mistress to find herself burdened for a year with a bad servant, and for a servant to be tied for that period to a place which she dislikes. On the other hand, however, the year's service tends to dispose mistress and servant to make the best of each other, and custom strengthens the connexion while it smooths down points of difference. When they have lived together for a year, and have got used to each other's ways, the chances are that they will not be inclined to part except for some strong reason. The month's notice has probably a good deal to do with the nomadic temperament of London servants, who, after successive changes, often find themselves unable to settle anywhere. They are either perpetually seeking some ideal situation which they have pictured to themselves, and which they are never destined to discover; or they have acquired a craving for novelty, for new scenes and new faces, and the excitement of a fresh neighbourhood, which almost amounts to a disease.

The rules of the Dundee Association were formally adopted at a meeting which was held a few days ago, but not without long and ardent debate. The Chairwoman, who seems to have been rather a sensible "canny" person, while claiming greater freedom of dress for her order, ventured to speak a good word for the obnoxious cap or "flag." She had always worn one, she said, and liked it; and she saw no more reason why they should pluck off their caps than why they should discard their aprons. Her remarks excited a storm of dissent. The Secretary retorted that mistresses wore aprons and not caps, and the Treasurer declared that this was a free country, where badges of servitude were out of place. The show of hands was altogether against the Chairwoman. The other point which was most insisted on was that servants should have more freedom of movement, and more time to themselves. Sunday festivities were strongly denounced. The servants explained that they did not insist upon a strict Mosaic observance of the day; they had no objection that hot dinners should be cooked; but they protested against Sunday being chosen for large dinner-parties. They were very bitter against the ministers who sat drinking toddy late at night, and kept the servants up to wait on them. Whether the clergy of Dundee are unusually prone to this indulgence, or whether their conduct in this respect is thought to be worse than that of the laity only on account of their professional character and the contrast between their precepts and their practice, we cannot pretend to say; but the servants certainly give them a very bad name. "Worse than working-men," said one woman, amid sympathetic applause. The Secretary urged that servants should have a right to "go to the post-office" when they chose, without asking leave; and it was made abundantly clear that "going to the post-office" was not to be construed in its narrow literal significance, but must be held to include personal interviews and visits if they should be found to be more pleasant or convenient than postal communication. The Treasurer, with bitter satire, observed that it might perhaps please some if they said "Please, mem, could we get out for ten minutes, mem?" and the Chairwoman again shocked the feelings of the meeting by remarking that she did not see anything very dreadful in having to do that. She had been in service since she was twelve years old, and had never had a bad mistress yet. She even went so far as to give utterance to such shocking sentiments as these:—"I can tell you that if we are to be servants, we must be servants; if one goes to serve, she must serve." The discussion then diverged to the subject of "sneaks," on which some strong remarks were made, and of mistresses who refuse to give characters. One servant said she had the misfortune once to be with "a titled lady" near Edinburgh, who "did not know what a moral character was." It was probably in consequence of this unhappy ignorance that the titled lady failed to appreciate the high moral qualities of her domestic and refused to give her a character.

It appears that the proceedings of the servants at Dundee have excited general interest in kitchen circles throughout the country, and the Secretary has received letters from a great many sympathetic correspondents in England as well as Scotland. A correspondent at Twickenham, who confesses to being "rather over middle-aged," vents her indignation at the preference now shown to "bits of girls," and gives "Three cheers for Dundee." A London servant writes on behalf of "the slave sisters" of the metropolis, intimating that "we Southerners have been long waiting for this chance," and that they are resolved to demand more "freedom of time and money." An amiable, but apparently rather weak-minded, householder of Finsbury deprecates strikes, and suggests that the Legislature should interfere to settle all questions in dispute between servants and their masters or mistresses. This would certainly be a noble field of activity for a Government department, which would of course go from house to house, and hold solemn inquiries as to the quality of the kitchen beer, the style of dress adopted by the inmates, the privileges of followers, the amount of time usually required to post letters to an aged grandmother, and the frequency with which leave of absence should be allowed for that purpose. If Lord Townshend or Mr. Charley has nothing on hand just now, he might try to draft a Bill on this subject. Pending the intervention of an organized moral force, as the Positivists call it, mistresses and servants may perhaps discover that their relations with each other are pretty much in their own hands, and that their comfort depends on mutual consideration and forbearance.

THE NONCONFORMISTS' MEMORIAL.

AFTER ten years of preparation the Independents have at last succeeded in laying the foundation of their long expected Memorial Hall. It may be remembered that in the year 1862 the Independents and Baptists throughout the country worked themselves up to a white heat of indignation while celebrating what Mr. Remington Mills calls "the grand event connected with the Act of Uniformity." This event was the liberation of the English laity from the tyranny of the Puritan pastors. The Restoration found Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, and others holding the position and the pay of parish priests in the national Church, while each of them was abusing his position to carry out, in spite of the wish of the nation, the dogmatical views and discipline of his own particular sect. Nearly all the ejected preachers, however they differed from each other in their disciplinary idea of the true Scriptural "platform of the Church," were Calvinists in doctrine. They were bound therefore to regard the majority of their parishioners as standing outside the covenant of grace. Whatever quarrel we may have with the Act of Uniformity in the nineteenth century, we must not forget that it was a kind of re-proclamation of the Gospel to the mass of Englishmen in the seventeenth century. It provided that no man should henceforth be the pastor of an English parish unless he was prepared to administer baptism to every person born in his parish, or, in theological language, to assert the right of every Englishman to be treated as the child of Almighty God; the Act of Uniformity was the assertion politically that the Church and the nation must be regarded as co-extensive. Under the Puritan usurpation of the parochial cures, as we might prove from Evelyn's Diary and other journals of the time, the very best, wisest, and holiest persons in a parish were often treated as the most distant from the fold of Christ. If an Anabaptist held the cure, English parents had to endure the tyrannical refusal of their pastor to baptize their little children. If an Independent held it, like the fanatical Henry Burton of St. Matthew's, Friday Street, he divided his flock into the Church and the No-Church, and formed a Pharusian Ecclesiola in Ecclesia. The Act of Uniformity restored to the English laity their rights as christened men; it protected them against the possibility of such abuses in the future.

But how is it that the Independents are building this Memorial Hall? The majority of the men who were ejected by the Act were neither Independents nor Anabaptists. They were Presbyterians. They had no objection on principle to the establishment of a Church; they would have delighted in the establishment of a Presbyterian Kirk like the Scottish; to secure this had indeed been the end of their Solemn League and Covenant. There was scarcely one of them who would not have been driven wild by hearing the speeches made by their quasi-representatives at the laying of the foundation-stone of their own Memorial Hall. These Presbyterians founded meeting-houses in which a regular succession of ministers gradually changed the doctrine from Calvinism to Unitarianism. The true historical descendants of the majority of the ejected preachers, the fit and right builders of a Memorial Hall to the Nonconformists of 1662, are the modern Unitarians. The gentlemen who on the 10th of May sat in solemn stillness for five minutes between Mr. Binney's prayer and Dr. Halley's address, in order to be photographed and leave posterity a picture of the great event, are in no sense the successors of the ejected preachers. They are but the partial successors of a very inconsiderable section of the ejected preachers. The modern Congregationalists have neither the historical succession nor the disciplinary succession, nor even (as Mr. Spurgeon could tell them) have their leading teachers a real doctrinal succession to the men they pretend to represent. Even the modern self-called "English Presbyterian Church," which is now planting chapels in the watering-places, and in all towns where there are wealthy people, and in all the more prosperous quarters of London, is a new sect, and has as little historical connexion with the ejected of 1662 as the Congregationalists. The real "English Presbyterians," that is, the modern Unitarians, claim the succession; no fewer than three sermons of the most eloquent and thoughtful of their preachers, Mr. James Martineau, now lying before us, open with the assertion of their claim. But these successors are generally careful to tell us that they do not hold themselves pledged to a war against the Establishment as such; whereas the waging of this war was plainly the chief reason for holding the Biconformity in 1862, and is as plainly the chief reason for building the Congregational Memorial Hall in 1872.

Dr. Halley was probably put forward to deliver the address at the ceremony of the 10th of May because he has written a kind of history of the Puritans. His book, which has Lancashire for its centre, and so gains a great deal of pleasing local colour, is certainly preferable to the ill-tempered and fractious works of earlier Dissenting historians, not excluding Dr. Robert Vaughan. But it is as impossible for him as it was for Calamy, or Neal, or any of their numerous popularizers, to understand the true character of the Act of Uniformity, because he is compelled to regard it from his own sectional, and not from its truly national, point of view. The English nation wanted and demanded protection from the possible recurrence of Puritan tyranny. This was the real cause of the Act. It was a layman's Act for laymen, and not a clergyman's Act against rival preachers. Still less was it the Act, as the orators of the platform conveniently assume, of the unclean and Popishly-affected King Charles II. The Scottish correspondents in England had to confess to their fellows at home that there were very few in England who were real Presbyterians—what allies the ministers had were confined to the House of Lords, the wealthy citizens, and the Court. The King and Court did all in their power to delay the ejection of the Nonconformists; the Roman party, from their desire to share in toleration, throw the weight of their influence into the Presbyterian scale. It was the House of Commons which was determined, almost ferociously, upon the passing of an Act which should shut the parish churches for ever against the re-intrusion of the sort of ministers from whom they had suffered so much. Every member in his passionate eagerness, according to Lord Clarendon, wanted to add some vindictive clause to the measure "which should make it more grievous to somebody whom he did not love." The Bishops of the time, who now receive the greatest amount of abuse for the Act, had the least to do with its savagely protective character. This was entirely the work of that representative English laity whom modern Nonconformists paint as a mass of grieving, helpless, shepherd-bereaved flocks.

The Act of Uniformity, instead of narrowing the terms of communion, as Hume asserts, really restored them to their original breadth and largeness. It substituted facts for notions, and made it possible for the national Church to embrace, at least implicitly, the entire nation. The modern Congregationalists follow Hume in calling the cures from which the preachers of the three Puritan sects were ejected by its operation "their livings" and "their churches." But the Act was the determined assertion of the nation that the livings did not belong to the clergymen, but to the Church and the nation, and that no man should be allowed to retain them who used them for the carrying out of his own theoretical notions of discipline and doctrine. Many of the two thousand—we will not now quarrel with the number, although the Nonconformist reckoning has never yet been satisfactorily justified (the ecclesiastical arithmetic of the Dissenters is always a little lawless)—were simply ejected to make room for the original rectors and vicars, who were still living. Many more continued firm in their nonconformity from the persuasion that their influence with the Court and the rich would prove stronger than the temper of the nation, and that the world would not readily lose their ministrations. We do not wish to cast the least slur upon the piety of the ejected; but if any one will bear the pains to read some of the endless sermons "in dumpy quarto" which these men had been preaching before the Parliament and the City for the fifteen preceding years, he will see that it was impossible for such men to conform without losing every title to the respect of their fellow-countrymen, and every vestige of self-respect. It had been the business of their lives to conform the nation and the Church to them, and they had failed in it; it was impossible for men who had lived and preached like inflexible Popes to cry pecceati in a day, and modestly conform themselves to the Church and nation. Many of the wiser and more modest of them did in time, it must be remembered, leave the ranks of the two thousand, and accept orders and functions in the national Church. Tillotson, who became Primate, and Kidder, who became Bishop of Bath and Wells, were of this number. It was held to be a pious duty to blacken their reputation.

As we do not wish to underrate their virtue, neither do we wish to underrate their sufferings. But since history is bound to be just, and not to be gushing, we must protest against the reiterated assertions of the modern Independents about the unexampled poverty and unexampled persecution of the ejected Presbyterians whom they suppose to be their historical predecessors. A reputation for being persecuted often brings a man a great company of admirers and a crowd of comforts. We might prove from the extant diaries of some of the ejected that they did not live in that Elijah-like solitude and deprivation which the orators of the Dis-enting platform attribute to them. Some of them undoubtedly did suffer greatly. But, as Hallam has aptly said, it has never been the characteristic of English Dissenters to suffer in silence; every suffering is almost certain to be diligently recorded. Indeed Baxter has even left us whole pages, in his most instructive and amusing autobiography, about his bodily pains. It is not likely, however, that many of the Dissenting orators have read Baxter; it is easier to talk about him in a large and vague way. Baxter is one of their leading figures as a confessor. Matthew Henry visited Baxter in his imprisonment. He says that he found him "in pretty comfortable circumstances, though a prisoner, in a private house near the prison, attended by his own man and maid." Baxter tells us himself that he "had a fair garden"; that his "wife was never so cheerful a companion"; that he "kept house as comfortably as at home." He adds, "I had the sight of more friends in a day than I had at home in half a year." The least loss of liberty is suffering, especially where the prisoner feels that he has a message from God to deliver amongst men; and the sufferer has a right to our sympathy and our indignation. But we must not forget that the notion of Baxter's sufferings which presents itself to the inflamed imagination of the Dissenting hearer who has never read a word of pure history, is something quite unlike the photograph which Baxter himself has left us. The ejected ministers are sometimes compared in modern Nonconformist rhetoric to the quakers, and spoken of as having been treated as the scum of the nation, and the abominable of all things; we hear that they preferred the world's frowns to its smiles, and poverty and contempt to high place and honour. It is questionable whether the abilities of many of them were so great that they would have risen to high place or left much mark on the nation if they had conformed. The chief of them by their nonconformity became the idols of courtiers, nobles, merchant princes, and gentry who adhered to the party, and by whom they were supported with a generous liberality. It was the accusation of the other Puritan sects against the Independents that they always adhered to the rich, and that their churches were made up of moneyed members. Many of them became the household chaplains of great families. Dr. Manton's meeting-house was attended by the Countess of Exeter, Lord Wharton, Lady Baker, Sir William Waller, and others of like standing. Many of them, had they conformed, would, as quiet parish priests, have been less important persons, and would have had a smaller share of the honours and the pleasures of this life. Marriage to a rich widow is by no means an unfrequent episode in the lives of Puritan confessors.

The greatest sufferers for religion in the seventeenth century were those whom the ejected Presbyterians and Independents and Baptists had themselves in their day of power so bitterly persecuted—the sect of the Quakers. The founder of Quakerism, George Fox, indignantly protested in their own age against the claims to confessorship set up by some of the ejected Nonconformists. "The flying Baptists," he wrote in 1662, "could not bear persecution themselves, and yet they persecuted us when they had the power." In his epistle to Charles II. he said, "Friend, who art the chief ruler in these dominions, three thousand one hundred and seventy-three persons, of the people of God in scorn called Quakers, have suffered under the changeable powers before thee." In another epistle to the King, twelve years later, 1674, he tells him that God brought him into England, and set him up "King of England, over the heads of our old persecutors." He gives incidental pictures of some of the ejected Presbyterians (as, for instance, that of John Fox, ejected from Mansfield), which place them in a very ugly and unheroic light. In 1667 the plain-speaking patriarch of the Quakers came into a conflict with Pocock, who had been one of the "Triers" under the Commonwealth. "He, and his Presbyterian priests" (Fox called every one a priest who received any stipend) "and people met, and they had candles and tobacco-pipes, and bread and cheese and cold meat on the table, and they agreed beforehand that if the officers should come in upon them, then they would leave their preaching and praying, and would fall to their cold meat. 'Oh,' said I to him, 'is not this a shame to you, who persecuted and imprisoned us, and spoiled our goods because we would not follow you and be of your religion, and now ye do not stand to your own religion yourselves? Did you ever find our meetings stuff with bread and cheese and tobacco-pipes?' 'Why,' said the old man, 'we must be wise as serpents.' 'Then,' said I, 'this is the serpent's wisdom indeed.' 'And who,' said I, 'would ever have thought that you Presbyterians and Independents, who persecuted and imprisoned others, and spoiled their goods, and whipped such as would not follow your religion, should now lynch yourselves and not stand to and own your own religion, but cover it with tobacco-pipes, flagons of drink, cold meat, and bread and cheese!' But this, and such like deceitful practices, I understood afterwards, were too common amongst them in times of persecution." Grand things were spoken the other day of the statues of preachers which ought to adorn the Nonconformists' Memorial. If the promoters intend it to be a complete memorial, they should offer prizes to sculptors for the best bas-reliefs of Baxter in comfortable imprisonment, and of the apparition of George Fox in the midst of the Presbyterian Assembly in Herefordshire.

THE QUARTERLY PLAYING AT COMMUNISM.

THE current number of the Quarterly Review throws off with an article upon the present state of English architecture, composed on the easy plan of picking out all the shortcomings of a confessedly complex system and of a transitional period, of condemning by rule every work of recent design on which there have been two opinions, and then of marshalling the whole in one arraignment and in contrast to an equally one-sided presentation of a past period of ideal excellence. With the writer's multitudinous conclusions we do not care to meddle, for an analysis of the strange confusion of accredited criticisms freshly dished up as novelties, and of original sophisms which sum up the bulk of the essay, would far exceed our available limits. There is, however, one suggestion in the article of so extravagant and whimsical a nature that we feel bound to attempt to present it in the light of practical sense. The writer, taking a survey of London, discovers that it is for the most part built on the leasehold system, and spreads over the comparatively large estates of persons who are of course unable themselves to live in more than one out of the many houses of which they are possessed. We had ourselves, some years since, called attention to the same fact as one of the ultimate causes of the great superficial extent of the capital; and we pointed out that, as has taken place on Lord Westminster's estate, the owners would, as the leases fell in, have to build upwards. The Reviewer also observes, and on this head we are in perfect agreement with him, that these "groups of streets" are "most regularly planned and lined with houses very similar to one another in their feeble architectural outlines." The language of this and of several cognate passages is obviously intended to apply to the houses of gentlemen, such as those in Belgrave and in Tyburn, in Win-pole Street and in Great Russell Street. The writer has also his complaint, though not so clearly and sharply moulded, against the builder-raised dwellings of the urban working classes. What we are concerned with is the remedy which he ventures in all simplicity to propose, and which is sufficiently indicated in the following quotations:—

It is a remarkable instance of the "Chinese" endurance of Englishmen that the people of London have not unanimously struck against this system. They [we conclude the freeholders] have so small an interest in the houses that they [the tenants obviously] might with proper independence and moderation undo the system, by legislative means if necessary, of a custom which is in every way so injurious to all, and particularly to those classes that are now the objects of chief national and social care. Leaseholders, then, like copyholders, should in urban districts be enfranchised, and the freeholders compelled to receive the value of the existing leases. The political effect, as well as the social and material, would be most beneficial.

So says the Land and Labour League when it recommends the parks and woodlands of our rural districts, the stately expanse of the New Forest, and the breezy sweeps of the South Downs, to be compulsorily cut up in quadrangular allotments suitable for spade cultivation; but it has not quite yet succeeded in gaining over the Quarterly as the mouthpiece of its policy of confiscation. There is, however, not the slightest difference in principle between the two cases; or rather that of the country is economically the weaker one, for the advocates of an agrarian law have the colourable pretence that as much help towards national life in the way of food is not got out of the soil as would be obtained if they had their way.

But, shelter being as needful for social life as eating, and land being the means of providing for both wants, the reason alleged in the Conservative organ why the Duke of Portland, or Mr. Berners, or the Duke of Bedford is to be by Act of Parliament forced to part with his inheritance is that he has actually estopped his own personal use of the land by converting it wholly to the second—or specially urban—necessity of life. It is only the quarter in which we find this outburst of crude radicalism which induces us to notice it. We do not say that the large landowners of London might not often make a good thing of selling their houses, or that the occupiers might not find their benefit in buying them. By all means let legislation cheapen and simplify the transaction so long as it is left purely voluntary on both sides, and the tenant is given no more right of expropriating his landlord than the landlord of swallowing up the tenant. The peculiar absurdity of the proposition, apart from its political and social heresies, appears in the reasons which are given in its behalf. The writer contends that a main cause of the shortcomings which he finds in our housebuilding, both on its artistic and on its comfortable side, is to be found in the want of personal interest which people in general must feel in houses which are not their out-and-out property, and which those of them who belong to the working classes must in particular feel in houses which they have not built with their own hands. These arguments, so far as they are worth anything, might be applicable to the extension of the very system which the Reviewer deprecates—that of the yet more diffuse expansion of London over what may still be green fields—supposing that a hallot Parliament could be found unjust and insane enough to enact that any man who ventured to turn his land into town should only be allowed to do so by way of selling off the freehold site of every future house to its intending occupier. But the silliness of the plan, so far as it is recommended for the improvement of existing London, is so transparent that we feel almost humiliated in having to expose it. The houses have been built on the leasehold system, and they are bad in the critic's eyes. "Enfranchise" them—by which euphemistic phrase he means force a sale—and they will all become good. By a miracle, or how? Perhaps the amiable theoriser may have only revealed the half of his plan, and will further suggest a second Act of Parliament "compelling" every purchaser to pull down his house and to reconstruct it on the idyllic system cheerily set forth by the writer in the following terms:—

Workmen would build for themselves, and, interchangeably, for one another; and those who are not workmen, seeing the superiority of the work done by the bricklayer or mason, smith or wright, for himself, or for his fellow-workman, over the ordinary task or day work of the drudging mechanic, would dispense with architects, surveyors, builders, and all the class of middlemen, and would see their houses built by the working men, who being constantly on the spot, are always interested and well informed, and with whom they can freely and directly confer. Art and its employer would go hand in hand, equal, mutually respectful, and confiding, and give no place or opportunity for unions or strikes, or international societies.

Of course these "interested" and "well informed" workmen, free from the evil eye of a mercenary clerk of the works, would never look at a bad brick, or daub untempered mortar on, or use green wood for the roof, or risk an untested iron rod, or run a joint so near the fireplace as to ensure a conflagration; while their "dispensing" employers would have no difficulty in knowing where they could procure all needful materials of the first quality and at the lowest prices, and would feel a pride in knocking off a week now and then from their doctoring, or their engrossing, or their retail trade, to make the measurements and take out the quantities which those enemies of mankind—architects and surveyors—were, in the dark ages of pre-*Quarterly*ism, supposed to look after in the interests of their outraged clients. It is pleasant enough to have to listen to diatribes against the regeneration of human society, between plover's eggs and cream, from the gushing young lady whom fate has assigned to one for dinner companion, but the joke becomes excessive when the projects appear in the solid type of a leading organ of opinion. Any enactment compelling the sale of London houses to the householder who desired to purchase would simply result in making improvement on a large scale impossible. Supposing every third or fourth house in Grosvenor Place or Horseford Street had, according to the Reviewer's nightmare, been wrested from Lord Westminster, where would have been the possibility of that vast rebuilding of the whole quarter which hinged on the fact of the entire district belonging to one freeholder? How would the chances of obtaining sites for churches and other public objects, already difficult enough, be increased by having to deal with as many freeholders as there were houses on the ground? As things are, nearly every new church in London is a monument of the liberality, often signal, of the estate owner. Besides, where is the power of forcing a sale to begin or end? It is part of the Reviewer's grievance that what may in a loose way be called the property in the house is divided between different men—the freeholder, the long leaseholder, the under leaseholder, and the tenant—"water rates and insurance charges" being specified as the crowning hardship. Is the long leaseholder to be empowered to cut his block of houses off from the Portman or the Bedford estate, only to find himself dissected by the two or three dozen householders of the second order who hold under him? and when one of these gentry is just planning some extensive improvements in the house which he dreams he may at last call his own, is he to be liable to hear from the gentleman to whom he has let it for the season that he had determined on a permanent possession? Supposing again that the long leases are about to fall in, and the landowner is expecting the day when he may rearrange his land on a better principle, are the representatives of the moribund interests of the original builder to be allowed to step in and carry off the spolia opima? The most discontented Irish Tory could not imagine a more cruel revenge upon Mr. Gladstone for all which he has done or undone than to desire that on him might devolve the framing of the London Land Bill.

The idea that workmen—whom, by the way, the Reviewer seems to think, are all employed in some branch of the building trade—if left to build houses for themselves, on their own lands and by their own hands, with neither supervision nor help, would make them either more beautiful (which is the Reviewer's first object) or more comfortable, solid, healthy, and decent than our existing artisans' dwellings, is of course too romantic to call for serious refutation. It is notorious all over England that the cottages are so bad as those which are cheaply run up, either to live in or to let, by persons of the labouring grade. It is in them that the most virulent typhus rages and the foulest immorality follows the closest huddling of sexes. Not only would inclination and experience fail, but, above all, capital—properly speaking—would be lacking; and what money those workmen had would be eked out by the cheapest and thinnest workmanship, spread over the fewest rooms; while we may be sure that all the accessories most needful to health, but not the most elegant in description, would be scamped or neglected to the gain of the doctor and the undertaker, unless indeed our workmen should be compelled to physic and bury each other "interchangeably" without the noxious help of any "middlemen." The materials, such as they were, must be paid for at once, for our rose-water revolutionist would have abolished those contractors on whom the poor unless than the rich man can now depend. It is a pity that he is not consistent, and does not equally prescribe saw-mills, brick-fields, and slate quarries. Why should not an "interested and well-informed" workman cut his own trees, make his own bricks, and dig his own slates? This would be much more amusing, particularly if his normal craft happened to be tailoring or shoemaking; and should his wife and children have in the meantime to sleep under the hedge, it would only be one to three that the weather might be tolerably fine. The best that could happen—if happen is a word which it is lawful to use in such a conjuncture—would be that our workmen should be well-informed enough to go to somebody who would lend him the needful money on the security of the coming house, at not too exorbitant a rate, and that mankind would wheel back to their old state of things. After all, what will become of the small shopkeepers, the poorer order of clerks, and the other members of the lower middle class, with no better income than our workmen? Are they also to build their own houses, or to camp out in tents? Builders being by this hypothesis extinguished, it would be quite impossible for them out of their scanty earnings to secure the "well-informed" services of an "interchangeable" workman. The Reviewer jumbles up his crotchets with speculations on the "stake in the country" argument for enabling workmen to obtain freehold residences. On this policy we have nothing to say at present. It is only introduced into the article as a peg on which to hang an impossible theory of rehabilitating the universal artist workman upon the ruins of important and intricate existing interests.

We should not have wasted our time in analysing such crude and feeble fumbblings after Communism had it not been for the place in which they appear. The Quarterly has long and deservedly been the accredited mouthpiece of Conservatism, and as one main raison d'être of Conservatism is the defence of property, not only those persons who are Conservatives in the technical and partisan sense, but every Liberal who does not derive his inspirations from the "Hole in the Wall," must desire that the authentic utterances of Conservatism should be words of common sense and reasonable economics. It is accordingly in these days of extravagant babble a misfortune to something more than the Conservative party, that its most dignified organ should condescend to put its mint mark on proposals which are either nonsense or confiscation.

THE REJECTION OF THE SWISS BUNDESREVISION.

OUR readers know by this time that the proposed changes in the Swiss Federal Constitution have been rejected, not only by the vote of the Cantons, but by a majority, though a small one, of the popular vote. And at last the matter seems to have awakened some attention in England. The Times appears to have silenced the wonderful Special Correspondent who gave us such choice amusement a little time back. Instead of his simple outpourings we have had two leading articles on the subject, one before and one after the result of the voting was known, which were, to say the least, an advance on the Special Correspondent. The Pall Mall Gazette too took the opportunity for an article on written Constitutions in general, which however laboured under the drawback that the leading article went on the assumption that the proposal had been carried, while a telegram in another part of the paper announced that it had been thrown out. In fact, before the final and accurate version came, a telegram had appeared in the English papers which made out that the popular vote was in favour of the changes. But, as the same telegram announced that the Cantonal vote was against them, the measure was equally lost either way. The exact figures were not known at Bern till several days after the voting. The voting took place on Sunday, and the exact result did not appear in the Bernese papers till Thursday, too late for us to take any notice of the matter last week. These results give the popular vote as 257,748 Noes to 252,536 Ayes, a wonderfully narrow division in so large a body of voters. The Cantonal vote gives 13 Noes to 9 Ayes. The Cantonal and the popular vote have been taken together. That is to say, for the measure to be carried, it must have had both a majority of the whole aggregate of votes and also a majority of votes in more than half of the several Cantons. In other words, for a constitutional change to be adopted, it must approve itself at once to a majority of the Swiss nation as a nation, and also to a majority of the several independent and sovereign States of which the Swiss nation is made up. It is plain that a proposal might, as at one time we thought had happened to this present proposal, obtain a popular majority but be rejected by the vote of the Cantons. This might happen if a measure acceptable to the large Cantons were disliked by the small. On the other hand, a majority acceptable to the small Cantons might gain a majority of the Cantons, but be rejected by the popular vote, if the great Cantons were unanimous against it. In the present case the votes given on both sides in the eight Cantons of Zurich, Bern, Luzern, Freiburg, St. Gallen, Aargau, Thurgau, and Vaud (the eight Cantons in which more than 20,000 votes have been given) amount to 336,478 out of 810,284. It is clear that these eight could always command a majority if the popular vote were not checked by the separate sovereignty of the States as represented by the Cantonal vote. But in this case we need not betake ourselves to such reckonings. The greater Cantons have been anything but unanimous, and the proposed changes have failed to secure a majority either of the Cantonal or of the popular vote.

The result of the figures before us comes generally to this. The Protestant German-speaking Cantons have been outvoted by a union between the Catholic German-speaking Cantons and the Romance-speaking Cantons, irrespective of religion. The Romance-speaking Cantons are unanimous against the changes; one Catholic German Canton votes Aye—namely, Solothurn; one Protestant German half-Canton, Appenzell-auser-rhoden, votes No. The Ayes are Zurich, Bern, Glarus, Solothurn, Basel, Schaffhausen, St. Gallen, Aargau, Thurgau. The Noes are Luzern, Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, Freiburg, Appenzell, Graubunden, Ticino, Vaud, Wallis, Neuchâtel, and Geneva. The division of three Cantons—namely, Unterwalden, Basel, and Appenzell—into half-Cantons has this time given no trouble, as in all three cases the two halves voted together. The majorities are very various. In Uri, for instance, there are 153 Ayes to 4,100 Noes; and in Schaffhausen 6,211 Ayes to 435 Noes; while in St. Gallen, a Canton much divided in religion, the numbers come so near as 22,503 Ayes to 22,482 Noes. Among the larger Cantons, the most decisive majority on either side is in Vaud, where we have 51,691 Noes to 3,319 Ayes. The minorities against the changes in Zurich and Bern, and the minority for them in Luzern, are all much larger than this. Luzern has 17,890 Noes to 9,385 Ayes; Zurich has 47,532 Ayes to 11,420 Noes; and Bern 50,427 Ayes to 22,442 Noes, this large minority being doubtless mainly owing to the Romance-speaking Catholic district beyond the Jura, the old Bishopric of Basel. Except Schaffhausen, no Canton has so overwhelming a majority for the changes as the three Forest Cantons and Vaud—an odd alliance.

We have already explained more than once the principle on which the division goes; the small Cantons feared the destruction of their Cantonal liberties by the transfer of large powers from the Cantons to the central authority. This comes out in the vote of Appenzell-auser-rhoden—German, Protestant, manufacturing, but small—which votes along with its Catholic and pastoral fellows. The Catholic Cantons also, besides that inherent conservatism nowhere so strong as in small democratic bodies, feared the results of the change would be dangerous to their religion.

The Romance-speaking Cantons, both Catholic and Protestant, feared to be swamped by an overwhelming German majority, and to have their local customs swept away before an uniform German system of law. Before all these combined influences the scheme has broken down. We cannot say that we regret its failure. The mistake, as it seems to us, lay in putting the whole measure before the people in a single vote. The last time a change in the Constitution was proposed it was submitted to the vote clause by clause, and though most of the clauses were thrown out, one was carried. This seems to us the fair way of acting. The scheme which has just been rejected contained some admirable provisions; but it contained others which, to our mind, and, as it has now been shown, to the mind of a majority of the Swiss people, were of more than doubtful advantage. It was surely unreasonable to tie these together, so that many men must have had to choose between voting against a thing which they thought right and voting for a thing which they thought wrong. It was surely hard that a man could not vote for an improvement of Federal judicature and for removing the restrictions on the Niedergelassenen, without at the same time voting for Initiative, Veto, and Referendum, or for the general transfer of power from the Cantons to the Confederation. The motive for employing the way of voting in globo was doubtless the hope that those who approved of any part of the scheme would thus be led to vote for the whole. But surely, when the choice comes to this, the safest and the most reasonable vote is the negative. By that vote things stay as they are; the objectionable proposals are got rid of, at least for a time, while no hindrance is put in the way of bringing forward the good ones again either alone or in better company. How many of the actual voters who gave the vote of May 12 were led to do so by this train of thought we have no means of knowing. But at all events it seems to us the reasonable course; for a scheme of this sort is not like a measure on a single subject, which, if we think its general effect will be good, we may fairly support even though we disapprove of some particular details. In this case a vast mass of changes on all kinds of subjects, military, ecclesiastical, judicial, financial, educational, and municipal—changes which had no kind of reference to one another, and among which one would think that almost every man must have approved of some and disapproved of others—were all lumped together in a single vote, and there was no choice but to accept all or to reject all. The rejection of the whole scheme, its good features as well as its bad, seems to us to be the natural consequence, and indeed the fitting penalty, of laying the question before the final authority in this unfair shape.

At all events there is no need to take up the line of the Times, and to make a lamentation about "a coalition of the most furious Democrats with the most bigoted Ultramontanes." This sentence next follows:—

Nowhere in Europe are notions of absurd Conservatism and exclusiveness more tenderly cherished than in the smallest and most backward Swiss Cantons, and especially in those in which popular Sovereignty is exercised in the most direct and primitive manner.

This is undoubtedly true; still, though the Times may find some difficulty in understanding the fact, the democrats of these extreme and immemorial democracies are exactly those to whom the epithet "furious" is most utterly inappropriate. There is something amusing indeed in the inconsistency of the Times's whole argument. "Extreme Republicanism" may be a good or a bad thing, but the advocates of the rejected scheme of Bundesrevision are at all events the last people who ought to sneer at it. The Times does not scruple to argue in this fashion:—

These two Councils have been at work upon the Revised Constitution since last September. It was only after mature separate deliberation and joint consultation, after a great deal of mutual concession and compromise, that they had been brought to a satisfactory understanding, and mustered a legal majority of both Houses in favour of the long-discussed project; but when all had been done, when the "sense" of the country had pronounced on the subject, it became necessary to refer the matter to a Plébiscite. The whole unthinking mass of the people was called on to express an opinion on the most complicated political and social subjects, and, after thus setting up a certain number of chosen men to deliberate upon them, it did not hesitate to destroy at one stroke the result of their long deliberations.

Our readers know, though those of the Times perhaps do not, that the two Councils have not been at work since last September, seeing that their labours only began in November and ended in March, to say nothing of a respectable Christmas holiday in the meanwhile. But this is no great matter. The thing to be noticed is the grotesque fact that this talk about the "unthinking mass of the people" comes from an admirer of the lately rejected scheme. It comes from one who regrets that a change was not made by which "the whole unthinking mass of the people" would have been "called upon to express an opinion on the most complicated political and social subjects," not only on the rare occasions of a Bundesrevision, but as a matter of course by way of appeal from the ordinary resolutions of the Assembly. As the Times regrets the rejection of the scheme, we are bound to suppose that the Times approves of Initiative, Veto, and Referendum, in some shape or other. Yet the objection to any of those devices surely is that, by them, "after setting up a certain number of chosen men to deliberate upon" "the most complicated political and social subjects," "the whole unthinking mass of the people will be called to express an opinion" on their acts, and may perhaps "not hesitate to destroy at one stroke the result of their long deliberations."

The inconsistency may of course be explained if we may venture to think that the Times looks on Veto and Referendum as good things when they work as the Times wishes, and as bad things if they work as the Times does not wish them. Or it may be explained by supposing that the Times took upon itself to talk big about the matter without knowing that such things as Initiative, Veto, and Referendum had ever been spoken about at all. But at any rate it is queer to go on talking about "small and ignorant Cantons," "the illiberal prejudices of the ignorant multitude," "deep-rooted ignorance and blind animosity," "the almost irresistible ascendancy of the priest," in the face of the great fact that all the Romance-speaking Cantons, Protestant as well as Catholic, have rejected the proposed scheme. From the Olympian height of the Times, Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden, and Protestant Appenzell-ausser-rhoden to boot, may doubtless seem small and ignorant Cantons, though the almost irresistible influence of the priests at Trogen and Herisau is a somewhat grotesque idea. And, to go to the other end of the Confederation, we should not have thought that M. Fazy, who has been throughout the stoutest opponent of the revision, was a man specially open to priestly influences. But the Times has its fling at Geneva as well as at Ticino; it does not say a word about Vaud. Now the enormous majority against the revision in that Canton is the most striking fact in the whole business. The standard of the Times may perhaps be higher than ours; but we have certainly not been used to look on Vaud as a specially ignorant or a specially priest-ridden Canton, nor yet, from a Swiss point of view, as particularly small.

The Pall Mall Gazette, which made the rejection, or, as it fancied it to have been, the acceptance, of the revised Constitution, the text for a discourse on written Constitutions in general, undoubtedly made as good a discourse as could be made when the leading fact was directly opposite to what the writer fancied it to be. But there was one omission; the Pall Mall Gazette forgot that in a Federal state the Constitution must be written, while in a state of any other kind, whether kingdom or commonwealth, it need not be. A Federal Constitution is a treaty between a number of independent States, which agree to give up a certain portion of their inherent sovereign powers to a common authority acting on behalf of all. The terms of such a treaty must, like those of any other treaty, be recorded in some permanent form. We see the distinction among ourselves. The relation between the three parts of the United Kingdom, though not a Federal relation, comes nearer to being so than anything else about us. Now, while we are satisfied to leave many points in the relations between the Crown, its Ministers, and the two Houses of Parliament to be settled by unwritten tradition, the terms of union between England and Scotland, and between Great Britain and Ireland, were, like the terms of union among the Swiss Cantons, necessarily recorded in formal documents. And it is funny to read about the Constitution of the United States, that "on one great point—the relations between the Federal Government and the State Governments—the Constitution was silent, or at most intentionally ambiguous." Now the whole of a Federal Constitution is, in its own nature, a statement of "the relations between the Federal Government and the State Governments." Its one object is to fix what powers shall remain in the States and what powers shall be granted to the Confederation. What the Pall Mall Gazette means is that the Constitution did not say in so many words whether a State might secede from the Confederation or not. But on the relations between the Federal Government and the State Governments, so long as they remained Federal Government and State Governments, the Constitution was neither silent nor intentionally ambiguous. Every one of its provisions was, in the nature of the case, devoted to the object of fixing those relations and to no other.

GERMAN CATHOLICISM AND THE VATICAN.

WE have spoken already of the political hearings of the quarrel between the Prussian and Roman Courts about the appointment of Cardinal Hohenlohe. But the speeches of Prince Bismarck and Herr Windhorst reported in last Saturday's Times, to say nothing of a very suggestive and apparently semi-official paragraph which has been going the round of the North-German newspapers, would alone suffice to prove that the recent act of the Vatican is no isolated expression of a novel policy or sentiment, and has a more than temporary significance. It may or may not be the case that the German Chancellor had deliberately calculated on the reception his offer was likely to meet with, and intended that the Court of Rome should be hoist with its own petard. But it is perfectly true, as his organs in the press have insisted, that if it is unusual to nominate an ecclesiastic to such an office, none but ecclesiastical business can henceforth be transacted with a Court which has ceased to exercise any civil sovereignty, and for such negotiations it might be supposed that a Cardinal would be exceptionally fitted, at least in the eyes of the Pope; while the particular Cardinal selected, whatever might have been his previous attitude towards the dogma of infallibility, voted for it in Council when the time for the final decision had arrived. Nor is there anything forced or unnatural on the face of it in the explanation given by Prince Bismarck himself in the German Parliament, in reply to the angry and not very logical complaints of the Ultramontane member for Meppen. Certainly there is no evidence of a design on his part "to put down all Churches under the iron heel of a secular and military Government." Be this as it may, however, the event was and is felt on both sides to have an importance independent of its direct antecedents or results, as revealing what may be called the normal moral relations of Catholic Germany to the Papacy. We say of Catholic Germany, for there can be little doubt that had the proposed ambassador been, like Count Arnim, a Protestant, no objection would have been raised by the Court of Rome. Whatever may have been the intentions or object of the Prussian Government in selecting Cardinal Hohenlohe, it is unquestionably because he is supposed to represent Liberal Catholicism in Germany that the Pope has refused to receive him. That this is the real root of bitterness in the whole affair is implied in Prince Bismarck's pointed allusion to "a certain ceremony enacted centuries ago at Canossa"; and still more clearly in his statement that, "after the prerogative lately assumed by the Pope, no Government which is not prepared to see the secular power annulled and placed under spiritual jurisdiction will consent to conclude a Concordat." And that some further step is intended to be taken in the matter may be inferred from his emphatic announcement that "the Prussian Cabinet are determined to adopt measures which shall henceforth render it impossible for Prussians who are priests of the Roman Catholic Church to assert with impunity that they will be guided by Canon law rather than by Prussian law"; a menace evidently directed against prelates like the Archbishops of Cologne and Munich who have publicly excommunicated various personages, both lay and clerical, for rejecting the Vatican decrees. Considering how large a proportion of Germany is still Roman Catholic, and how conspicuously German Catholics form the moral and intellectual aristocracy of their Church in Europe, the attitude of fixed "estrangement," to adopt the language of one of Prince Bismarck's organs, ostentatiously assumed by the Roman Curia towards them might seem at first sight inexplicable, if not suicidal. The explanation, however, is to be sought in the fact that it is a fixed attitude, and one that has been deliberately persisted in for many centuries. It is indeed only the natural and historical sequel, allowing for change of time and circumstances, of the too famous "ceremony at Canossa."

That the traditional policy of Rome towards her "much enduring" spiritual children north of the Alps should have provoked a corresponding sentiment of hostility on their part was of course only to be expected. There is abundant evidence of this in the tone, as well as in many of the detailed statements, of "Janus." And we have no doubt that the enthusiasm and the tough vitality of the Old Catholic movement in Germany, under circumstances of grave difficulty and discouragement, are due quite as much to the long arrears of inherited disaffection, which has not hitherto found so convenient an outlet, as to the antagonism evoked by the new dogma itself. Or rather perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the energetic protest against the dogma arises chiefly from its being regarded as the coping-stone to a vast edifice of spiritual despotism which has long been in course of erection, and which presses with continually increasing weight on the necks of the misera contribuens plebs who are crushed beneath it. A work recently published by Dr. Sepp, one of the most distinguished lay professors of Munich, and a member of the Bavarian Chamber of Deputies, throws much light on the present state of feeling in Germany. His very title, Deutschland und der Vatikan, is indicative of the general line of thought. But the sections on "Contempt of the Germans in the Church," "the Empiro and the new Ecclesiastical Constitution," and "the Characteristics of the Jesuits," are among the most outspoken and explicit. Professor Sepp, as we have previously had occasion to mention, has expressed himself no less strongly in the same sense in the Bavarian Parliament, and his protest derives additional force from the fact that, till lately, he was regarded as a decided Ultramontanist. To him, as to many others, the Vatican Council has been as a touchstone, by which the true nature of opinions accepted without being distinctly grasped has been definitely revealed. It must be startling to his former allies to hear him speak of the Encyclical and Syllabus paving the way for a "Western Caliphate," and of Rome as presenting the main hindrance to Christian peace and unity. But he is too well read in history to date these influences from any event of yesterday, however important. We are told that the German nation, like the fabled Tannhäuser, has long since been repudiated by the Holy Father, notwithstanding its purity of conscience and good will; "he repels us with curses, and, not content with our kissing his slippers, sets his foot on our necks, condemns all our achievements, and enjoins blind obedience of intellect." The Italians, like Jacob, have long since stolen the birthright of the German people, who are treated like a stepson in their father's house, fit for nothing but to serve the ends of Roman policy or pride. The Church has become Italianized, and the Papacy an Italian institution; but whereas the Romance nations are content with blind submission, "the Germans inquire after grounds of belief, and insist on knowledge," and as they refuse to become "Italian Christians," are looked on as pariahs, without any rights in the Church. The Romans have no notion of taking equal rank with other nations in the Church, but demand supremacy, and frequently seek it by fraud; and hence, under the mask of a dogma, Rome is seeking to establish her favourite system of terrorism, and Germany, at the very moment it is aspiring to political unity, is menaced with a new schism. It is only by "extorting respect" and resolutely carrying out peaceful reforms that she can preserve her unity. The Pope remarked last year, on occasion of his Jubilee, that he did not understand German; and "that must be true enough, for of the good Germans Rome understands nothing." It is necessary to revive national Councils to restrain the excesses of Papal despotism, for the people are sick of religious strife; and meanwhile it would be well if the German bishops would make peace with the State, which is also a divine institution, before it is too late.

This revival of national synods, according to Professor Sepp, is a matter of pressing importance for German Catholics, who are resolved to abandon neither their nationality nor their faith. When the Pope is spoken of by an English Ultramontane divine as "the third Incarnation of Christ," and when a French prelate bids us reverence him as "Christ upon earth," while the Roman Civiltà naively sums up the result of the Vatican definition by saying, "Quando il Papa medita, è Dio che pensa in lui," the doctrinal question may fairly be said to form part of the order of the day. And there can be no doubt that the final verdict of both nation and Government will be against the new dogma. The "German beasts" against whom Rome is fulminating her heaviest anathemas do not indeed desire to separate from the Pope or set up an anti-pope, but they wish, when a vacancy occurs, to see the right man in the chair of Peter, and he must be, not an absolutist, but a constitutional ruler, whose rights would then be as little disputed as the rights of the constitutional sovereign of England. "Without Hildebrand there would be no Luther. And, moreover, the constitution of the Church is of divine origin, but has been superseded by the dominant influence of Rome, so that all Church rights are completely confiscated." At the Council of Constance, side by side with the bishops, sat deputies from fifteen Universities, and three hundred doctors, both of canon and civil law; and at the older Council of Frankfort, under the eye of Charlemagne, sat representatives of the Empire as well as of the Church. It is necessary to revert to the precedents of the earlier ages, before the whole Church system had been revolutionized by the Falso Decretals. A national synod must be summoned to give the first impulse to the independent organization of the Catholic Church in Germany; and it must be no mere phantom synod. Not only must the clergy, both secular and religious, as well as the bishops, be represented, but the Government also, "for the laity, too, belong to the Church." If the Vatican Council has done its utmost to sharpen the divisions of Christians, and circumscribe more jealously than ever the limits of Catholicism, "we yet anticipate with confidence that its lamentable decisions will have a directly opposite result." On one point Professor Sepp is very emphatic, and his views have been endorsed, with a fulness and precision too remarkable to be quite accidental, by some leading speakers in the recent debate on the Jesuits in the German Parliament. Herr Fischer, the Liberal Catholic member for Augsburg, has at least borrowed his telling quotation from King Louis I. of Bavaria, who described the Order as "protectors, with all the virtues and faults of a royal body-guard." Their merits as missionaries and educators, and their zealous devotion to the care of the sick during the last war, are freely admitted; but "all that," it is added, "will not save them." The author briefly recalls their career from the first—their perpetual conflicts with the civil power, and the systematic use of their influence as royal tutors and confessors to promote the cause of absolutism; their inculcation of blind obedience and "sacrifice of the intellect," in place of inward development of mind and character; their substitution of artificial for natural virtues; and, above all, their dominant influence over women, and through women over the government of the Church, which exactly carries out Mephistopheles' advice to Faust—"Vor allem aber lern' die Frauen führen." Dr. Micheliis pathetically observes, "They have now been among us (in Germany) for twenty years, and already we experience under their tyrannical control a bankruptcy of honour and character, so that the moral authority of our Bishops seems hopelessly lost." Next year, we are significantly reminded, will be the centenary of the abolition of the Order by Pius VI.—or, to adopt Dr. Moufang's charming but rather unhistorical euphemism, of "the famous Bull which Clement XIV. was weak enough to allow himself to be talked over into issuing;" and Professor Sepp intimates, not obscurely, that the occasion would be a suitable one for "casting this Jonah out of the European State ship." There is evidently a large and growing number of German Catholics, as well as Protestants, who share his feelings on the subject.

Such are some of the salient points of a book expressly submitted, as the title-page bears witness, to "the earnest consideration of statesmen and the people, as well as of the Church authorities," and written by a man whose name will give weight to his words both in the political and intellectual world of Germany. He is a friend and colleague of Döllinger's, though they have not always fought on the same side, and he has been long known for his zealous attachment to his Church, while at the same time his position naturally leads him to look at religious questions from the point of view of a layman and a politician. No fresh evidence of course was needed to prove the existence of a great and widening gulf between Rome and Catholic Germany. But the pointed rejection of the good offices of a German Cardinal who is known to be a patriot as well as a churchman, and the angry debate on the Jesuits follow very closely on Professor Sepp's elaborate exposure of the impossibility of reconciling either patriotism or historical science with the modern pretensions of the Papacy and the policy of its haughty "protectors." Sir George Bowyer can see nothing on the German side but a deep-laid conspiracy against Christianity and the Church; but to an unprejudiced looker-on there will seem at least as much force in Professor Sepp's report, that "Rome, however little she may think it, is helping Catholicism, is simply playing into the hands of Protestantism."

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

III.

THE Academy in the present state of English art defies classification. In Italian Galleries it is comparatively easy for the visitor to know where he is; in the Florentine Pitti and Uffizi Galleries, for instance, every situation depicted is sure to fall somewhere between the Expulsion from Paradise and the Calumny of Apelles, or between the Annunciation and the Bath of Diana. But the present Royal Academy Exhibition opens with miscellaneous as follows:—(1) "Beatrice, Daughter of H. M. Dunphy, Esq.;" (2) "Trying the Costume"; (3) "The Viscountess Powerscourt"; (4) "Oh, there's naebody comin' tae marry me"; (5) "Pay for Peeping," &c., &c. And yet this multiplicity of subject-matter does not ensure equal diversity of manner. In fact, the barriers are now thrown down which formerly separated sacred and profane art, historic and domestic art, high and low art. Thus Mr. Frith in two pictures—"Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn deer-shooting in Windsor Forest" (470), and "An Incident in the Life of Lady Mary Wortley Montague" (197)—treats history as a branch of genre painting. Other semi-historic works, by Academicians and outsiders, recall Wilkie rather than Delacroix. Again, when we come to Mr. Riviere's "Daniel," we are less reminded of religious themes than of sensational scenes in Zoological Gardens. Furthermore, in the present day few artists have such strong convictions as to stick persistently to any one line of thought or tone of sentiment; painters fly incontinently from grave to gay; they hold the mirror up to society as it is, not as it ought to be, and fancy that nature receives sufficient justice when they portray pleasing trivialities or perplexing contradictions. Nature in the highest sense of the word, as synonymous with perfect truth and absolute beauty, seldom enters the studios of our modern artists. Thus the Academy does not so much conform to law as accommodate itself to accident. The exhibition in fact may be compared to a miscellaneous concert given for a charity, especially for such charity as is said to begin at home. The old favourites, with voices a little the worse for wear, sing stock songs, the programme is a hodge-podge, all tastes are gratified, all appetites appeased. The performance may possibly prove a little tedious, but the receipts at the door yield a handsome surplus. After this sort are the miscellaneous exhibitions in Burlington House. Art long ago lost its unity, and these annual gatherings are now surrendered to distracting diversity. The time is long since past when the Church, the State, the ruling house, or even any one merchant family as that of the Medici, could exert a paramount or appreciable power over the season's show. Looking round the Academy, no such power is present; the influence chiefly felt is that of trade as centred in Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, or Glasgow. The danger seems to be that under the sway of the counting-house and the shop the old landmarks will be swept away, and that art may henceforth drift downward in the course of a wealth-winning democracy. If criticism has a use, it is to cry back to principles which past experience has made sure.

"Columbus at Porto Santo" (255), by Mr. Elmore, R.A., is a striking instance of how imagination may impinge on history, how fancy may play around facts, so that the picture produced is not so much a chronicle as a creation; in fact, an artist may often with advantage paint, just as Scott, Irving, and Bulwer penned, what may be termed the romance of history. Columbus, with finely-arched brow made for speculation and forecast of the future, stands with his wife upon the shore. They gaze intently on a barbarous image which the waves have cast on the beach from some undiscovered continent. The two figures, studiously balanced, tell with brilliant force against the clear sky, and throw off the blue sea into illimitable distance. The picture is as carefully painted as it has been cautiously thought out. Mr. Lucy, known in historic walls, also retraces the story of the discoverer of the New World. "Columbus at the Monastery of La Rabida" (1020) is a work serious in thought and solid in execution. Mr. Lucy is one of the very few painters who still abide by the old traditions. Sir George Harvey too, the venerable President of the Scottish Academy, is true to the practice which prevails across the Tweed; like Wilkie, he is pleased to pass from genre into history; like other members of the Edinburgh Academy, his canvases gain the deep liquorice tone of age by use of asphaltum or paints equally rotten and brown. Yet a very respectable specimen of historic genre is "Shakespeare before Sir Thomas Lucy on a Charge of Deer-stealing" (177). Some may object that the poet of Avon looks neither dramatist nor deer-poacher; the head lacks genius, the figure force. On the other hand, Sir Thomas Lucy, before whom Shakespeare is arraigned, has some solemnity; the cabinet, too, against the wainscoted wall, is fairly well painted. But as we have already indicated, the manner is scarcely large enough for history, nor finished enough for first-rate genre. However, it will easily be understood why Sir George Harvey is a favourite with engravers; he tells a story well, he composes with a sure purpose.

We need scarcely say that intermediate styles between history and genre exist and are admissible; just as the biography of individuals has less of state and solemnity than the history of empires, so may domestic scenes, though they date back centuries or more, depart from academic formality. Yet no distinction is needed to hit the precise line of demarcation. And it is hardly conceivable of anything more infelicitous than Mr. Frith's approach to a pretty enough incident—"Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn deer-shooting in Windsor Forest" (470). The treatment is black, wooden, common. But the same artist finds himself quite at home when he enters the domestic circle of Lady Mary Wortley Montague (197). The incident is eminently pictorial. Lady Bute, here a child with playthings, saw her grandfather, the Duke of Kingston, once only. Her mother was dressing, "when there entered an elderly stranger, of dignified appearance and still handsome." "Lady Mary, instantly starting up from the toilet-table, dishevelled as she was, fell on her knees to ask his blessing." The situation is striking; the grandfather, the Duke of Kingston, standing; the daughter, Lady Mary Wortley Montague, kneeling; the granddaughter, Lady Bute, with a doll, furnish materials which even in less dexterous hands would tell by contrast of age, attitude, and action. The picture is well painted; the artist, as heretofore, finds space for grey and quiet passages, which mitigate what otherwise might be garish and assailing. But Mr. Frith's triumph this year, strange to say, is not in a cleverness which some have mistaken for impertinence, but in a tenderness and refinement for which few gave him credit. "The Miniature" (157), and "The Love-Letter" (469), apparently portraits of the same lady, do much to atone for bygone. A painter who in quietude can arrest attention, who by a single figure, a fancy portrait, can move more deeply the better sort of people than he has been accustomed to do by crowds on the race-course, in the railway station, or at the gambling-table, must have in him latent powers which may yet take the world by surprise. The prodigious success of the works to which we have referred did much in past years to lower the taste of the public. Mr. Frith, let us hope, now gives foretaste of better things; talent, even genius, he possesses—the only question is as to its right direction. Mr. Topham, belonging to a younger generation, made his entrance into Burlington House with conspicuous abilities which only needed chastening; but instead of a curb, he has given himself rein, and now plunges headlong into ungovernable extravagance. "The Fall of Rienzi" (674) is indeed a fall; and whether after so dire an overthrow an artist may be able to recover truth and sobriety is more than doubtful.

The Old Testament furnishes the Exhibition with fewer subjects than might have been anticipated, considering that no other volume has yielded to the painter stores more rich and varied. The work in this department which has been most talked of is "Daniel" (539), by Mr. Rivière, an artist who last year favoured us, not with a prophet amid lions, but with Circe amid swine. Each work we have heard extolled to such a superlative degree that we can only suppose the painter equally master of a lion and a pig. We incline, however, to think he is most at home with the less noble beast. The creatures before us are more and less than lions; they are endowed with emotions bordering on the human, and yet they have the sinuosity of the snake, the treachery of the reptile. This confusion of species, this mingling of humanity with the brute creation, has in modern art been already carried too far by Kaulbach in "Reinecke Fuchs," and by Landseer in "Comus" and "The Midsummer Night's Dream." The dignity of each creature resides in its distinctive individuality. And if we turn from modern to ancient art, we find that when nature has been departed from, it is only for the sake of some abstraction or generalization which brings out all the more strongly the leading idea of lion, sphinx, griffin, or dragon, as the case may be. When in the art of the catacombs "Daniel in the Lion's Den" entered the series of divine types and antitypes, a simplicity bordering on severity was maintained; on either side is a lion, and in the midst stands Daniel, with hands stretched out in the form of a cross, in attitude of prayer. A Father of the Church expressly says that Daniel overcame the wild beasts by the stretching out of his hands; that is, by the power of prayer. We do not lay much stress on the fact that Mr. Rivière, on the contrary, represents the Prophet with hands bound behind his back, for the new reading is not without significance; Daniel, deprived of physical power of self-defence, relies solely on divine aid. The figure, it must be admitted, is finely conceived. Taken as a whole, however, the picture, as we have before intimated, is no more a religious work than Landseer's "Van Amburgh, the Lion Tamer." Mr. Rivière is wide as the poles asunder from the old master, and the modern style to which he commits himself is incompatible with sacred art. More in accordance with traditional usage is a little picture by Mr. Simeon Solomon, "Judith and her Attendant going to the Assyrian Camp" (665). Also in the same category may be mentioned "Abraham and Isaac on the Way to Sacrifice" (916). The artist, Mr. Gale, who gives himself to what may be termed sacred topography, Syrian scenery, and Eastern colour, has, with an ingenious conceit which some may commend, thrown the arms of Isaac, bearing the wood of sacrifice, into the figure of the cross. It is not by such trivialities that the sacred fire of religious art can be kept alive.

Modern art is not without compensation for what she may have lost. The keen, cold, but shrewd eye which she turns upon life, whether of past or present days, gives a character which seldom pertained to the schools of intuition or spiritualism. Mr. Crowe, an artist gifted with cynical insight, which detects the skeleton hid away in every cupboard, has not for years manifested his peculiar faculty so sharply and strongly. He seems indeed to have profited by the forced exile in London of M. Gérôme and other French painters. His chief contribution, "Howard Succouring the Galley Slaves at Venice" (909), has the power of mimesis in parvo. Here is the galley silent, there are the slaves on board, and in the midst of the misery-stricken crowd moves Howard the philanthropist. The difficulties over which the painter has triumphed are all but insuperable. If we could imagine Titian brought to labour within the limits of Mimesis, some notion might be formed of the drudgery to which talent is put in this supremely clever, yet ineffective, composition. The picture fails of a result proportioned to the time expended, partly because of the microscopic minuteness of its multitudinous parts; the composition is frittered away because the artist does not know what to surrender. Mr. Hodgson, who bids fair before long to win his way into the Academy, is another painter who appears in unusual force; for dry humour and caustic satire "Army Reorganization in Morocco" (127) is eminently noteworthy. This dull scene was actually enacted under the eye of the painter; "reorganization," as here depicted to the life, on the African coast confesses to disorder and disorganization. A turbaned Pasha, with his awarthy servant bearing at reverent distance an umbrella as large as a folded tent, reviews with morose rigidity an awkward squad drawn up against a wall. This hastily improvised company is just that dirty offscouring which is apt to be got together in outlying tributaries of the Turkish Empire; not two are dressed alike; each man comes to drill in whatever he happens to have on, and one fellow wearing a bandage round his tooth-aching jaws looks less the warrior than the old woman. In delineation of character and artistic treatment the picture shows consummate power; a brilliant passage of sunlight, wherein a mosque glitters, a palm-tree waves, and doves float, is skilfully thrown in to relieve and enliven a subject otherwise sombre and dolorous. Mr. Hodgson's manner is frequently dry to a fault. Under a like disadvantage Mr. Marks often shows himself; his characters, though funny, are colourless; yet no one tells a story with keener point or more racy humour—witness "Waiting for the Procession" (279). The difficulty here encountered is exceptional; "the procession," itself invisible—that is, lying beyond the limits of the picture—has to be made present to the mind's eye through the eager gaze of crowded spectators in the street. Expectation is reflected in every countenance; the King comes, but is not seen, and the interval of waiting is filled up by the garrulous gossip of the townsfolk. The manner of Mr. Marks is Chaucerlike; indeed we might almost fancy these good country people had come together to look at the Canterbury pilgrims, and to join perchance as stragglers in the procession. The painter states his case clearly, circumstantially, yet curtly; his hand is as steady as his intellect is shrewd. The three painters we have just named—Mr. Crowe, Mr. Hodgson, and Mr. Marks—are committed to a manner which has the rare merit of spurning popularity. They are never guilty of sentimentality, of vain show, of flattering falsehood; they are plainly outspoken, and what the world does not like it may leave. Dean Swift may be taken as their terse exemplar; with the elegant thought and diffuse diction of Addison they have little in common.

DALILA.

AMONG many qualities which we admire in certain modern French dramatists, the most worthy of applause and imitation is their piety. If it had been in other respects possible for an English writer to have conceived such a play as Dalila, we must own with regret that he would have omitted to consider the character of its heroine from the religious side. It is to be observed that Dalila is—to put it plainly—a super-extraordinary kind of courtesan. She is noble, beautiful, and accomplished, and wears splendid clothes, and inhabits a gorgeous palace; but still she is no more than a particularly distinguished member of the demi-monde. She is illustrious by her charms and graces, and still more by her wickedness; for it is acutely observed by the friend of her victim, who strives to free him from her toils, that she never goes to church, and one ought always to distrust a woman who does not go to church. Man, says in effect this writer, can do pretty well with honour, but woman cannot get on without religion. She may be all that you desire at the park, the race-course, the ball, the opera, but before you commit your happiness to her keeping, observe how she behaves at church. André has been informed that the next in the series of Dalila's victims is about to be promoted to the place from which he is to be dismissed, and he is not unnaturally reluctant to believe this humiliating piece of news. He does not, indeed, appear to regard the appointment of a successor to himself as in the abstract incredible, but he is certain that his magnificent tyrant could never stoop so low as to pick up a tenor singer from the Opera; and besides, she would surely have given him warning before dismissing him. His friend, he says, does not know Dalila—"âme orangeuse, troublée, mais loyale." She may be capable of a crime, but not of a degradation, or of a base deceit. The friend answers that he does know Dalila—a statement which, as we learn afterwards, is made on the best possible foundation. She is capable, he says, of everything, like every other woman who acknowledges no principle but passion. Has she ever been seen to set her foot in a church? Having enjoyed full opportunity of studying the habits of this "espèce venimeuse" of the genus woman, he is able to answer his own question in the negative; and as the result of his own experience, he warns his friend to distrust women who never go to church. When a first-class Anonima is tempted to let herself down to the level of an actress, she needs religious principle to sustain her, and herein Leonora is deficient—"Ta maîtresse est un esprit fort; c'est une palanque." Perhaps if we translated this play, not into English but into American, we should say that Leonora was a disciple of the modern gospel of Free Love, although it may be that even the most extreme devotees of that new system of morality draw the line at play-actors. We of course remember how Leonora, Princess Falconieri, was introduced to us in the first act. André had irreverently spoken of her to his friend Carnioli as "your Princess," and he is rebuked as follows:—"Ce n'est pas ma princesse; c'est la veuve la plus noble et la plus vertueuse comme la mieux tournée de ce globe." Yet Carnioli mentions afterwards that she had been temporarily his princess, and even before he reveals this fact her virtue is to our eyes less conspicuous than her elegance. Between the first act and the third she has lived with André, or rather he has lived with her, and perhaps they have been so much occupied with each other's society that she has omitted to attend regularly at church, and thus, her religious principles being undermined, she has become capable, when she wants another lover, of seeking him among the singers at the Opera. As Carnioli emphatically says:—"Toute femme qui n'est pas à Dieu est à Vénus." It is to be hoped that our strong-minded ladies will call M. Octave Feuillet to proper account for his new and offensive method of distinguishing between the sexes. Religion, according to him, was designed, not to diminish, but to regulate, the pleasures of women. It forbids them to have more than one lover at one time, or at least it limits the area of selection, if not the number of a woman's lovers; and an illustrious princess connected with several royal houses cannot be considered to have her passions under due control if she allows herself to be attracted by a young and handsome singer of the Opera. Women at any rate cannot guide their own lives without religion; but for men the rule of honour is sufficient. It is not explained whether this rule permits a prince to entertain a temporary passion for a singer or dancer, or is potent enough to prevent him from doing so.

It is a pity that the eccentricities of this play could only be enjoyed on the single occasion when it was played for the benefit of Madame Fargueil. It has perhaps fitly made way for Rabagas, as the Empire which produced it has given place to a Republic. It is the creature of a period when a little religion of the best quality was an essential ingredient in the composition of a lady of the highest fashion. Stern Protestantism might find an incongruity between these two ideas, just as we feel a difficulty in understanding how the great work of the musician Sertorius, Le Chant du Cubeaire, could be suitably performed at his daughter's wedding. But then perhaps the author would say of our criticism, as he does of the singing of the prima donna of André's opera, that it is "comme un Anglais." It is doubtless our own want of sensibility that prevents our perceiving that the religion of this play, like onion in a well-dressed salad, imparts flavour to the whole without being anywhere disagreeably predominant. The musician Sertorius and his daughter Marthe are seated at their open window on a summer's evening when the old man's pupil, André, enters, bringing them tickets for the first performance of his opera, which is to take place that night. Sertorius allows himself to be persuaded that, in preparation for such a solemnity, he ought to shave, and having retired for that purpose, the young people occupy themselves as usual upon such occasions. The business begins with her sewing a button on his glove, and he rapidly becomes sentimental, pious, and, if we may venture so to say, maudlin. He has heard the chimes of a village clock as he came upstairs, and they remind him of his innocent childhood and of his excellent first preceptor, who spoke to him of all that he himself loved—"du bien et du beau, de l'art et de Dieu." He would regain the peace and purity of those early years, and he can only find them—we all know where. The young lady seems about to signify that his hope may possibly obtain fruition, when her father enters, and further explanation is prevented. But that which was not spoken was understood. Marthe and her father depart for the theatre, while André remains behind in a delicious dream, which is dissipated by the entrance of his friend Carnioli. This munificent patron of musical genius is clearly of opinion that marriage is inconsistent with its adequate development, so he determines, in the interest at once of his friend and of art, to introduce André that very night at the Opera to the fascinating Princess Falconieri, of whose charms he is, as we learn afterwards, well able to estimate the power. The Princess is so good as to express her willingness to ensnare and devour this new prey. As André's opera proceeds, she joins in the general applause, and throws to him her bouquet, to which her handkerchief is—of course accidentally—attached. The young composer, who is certainly not afflicted with either modesty or constancy, calls after midnight at the splendid mansion of the Princess, and is shown upstairs. Here, again, perhaps we understand, as the prima donna sang, "comme un Anglais." We see a splendid and stately princess consorting in a saloon at the Opera with Prince Kalisch and Marquise Narni, and, above all, with "Lady Wilson;" and yet we ought to be able to discover, as this young musician discovers, that this near connexion of royalty may be visited after midnight. The reception of André by Leonora is a very great scene indeed. The lady's behaviour is, we will not say so proper, for that is a thing of course, but so elevated and ethereal, that we are under the belief that she must have lately had a particularly violent fit of church-going. He falls upon his knee, and with respectful passion kisses her hand. Then he performs upon the organ, while she slowly paces a balcony and listens. We learn afterwards that Marthe and her father are, unfortunately for them, so placed as to watch their proceedings from over the way, and of course in their eyes it is necessarily wrong. But to the world the Princess may boldly say, as a King once said, "Evil be to him that evil thinks." She is a rich widow, able to please herself, and she chooses to hear music in her drawing-room after midnight. Setting conventionality aside, Marthe herself could not have behaved more properly, and as the curtain falls, an ignorant Englishman might suppose that the Princess meant to marry the young musician, who would thenceforth cultivate his art as well as he might under the difficulties of matrimony. At this stage of the play virtue and vice are very much alike, particularly vice; and it is only in the next act that we get principles defined, and understand that André was going downhill while apparently walking upon level ground. There is of course nothing inconsistent with honour in living with a princess, nor apparently is it incompatible with religion that a princess should live with a composer of operas. But when it comes to jilting the composer for a singer, we clearly see that this is vice. It is, in fact, the sort of conduct that is to be expected from a woman who does not go to church.

The experiment which Carnioli makes in the interest of art has the worst possible result. André does not take to composing, but he takes very much to smoking, and what is familiarly called mooning, and the Princess has already found his successor in her affections. He refuses to believe that she will leave him until she has actually left, and then he starts in pursuit with pistols, intending to shoot his rival, or the Princess, or both. Carnioli follows to prevent, if possible, this folly, and is thus able to assist at the final tableau of the play. A shabby and rickety one-horse fly comes on the stage, and is met by André in the "stand and deliver" manner with his pistols. The fly stops, and from it emerges the old man Sertorius, who informs all present that his daughter is dead, and he is carrying her body home for burial in Germany. If he has got the body inside the fly, it must make a pretty tight fit, which is perhaps the reason why he does not produce it to enhance the pathos of the situation. The old man re-enters the fly and drives away, and at the same moment Leonora and her new lover are seen on the water in a boat, while he adds insult to injury by singing an air from André's own successful opera. André, overwhelmed by the emotions suitable to these afflicting circumstances, dies, and Carnioli falls upon his knees beside him, exclaiming "Pray for me!" which nobody among the spectators seems to find in the least degree ridiculous. It is a pity that the author has left his religious views imperfectly explained. Looking at the position "comme un Anglais" we might object that, if the prayers of André could be supposed to have any effect, he would want them all for himself. As the Scotch proverb goes, he would need to keep his breath to cool his own porridge. Thus the curtain falls upon a play in which, as we remember, there occurs only a single joke. The Princess's waiting-maid says that she should like a place as governess in a great English family, where she could marry the heir. This joke is omitted in deference to the susceptibilities of the aristocratic audience at the St. James's Theatre, but we really think that they would not feel it deeply. It is better to laugh at oneself than not to laugh at all.

NEWMARKET SECOND SPRING MEETING.

SOME resolutions of considerable importance, as affecting the position of trainers and limiting the number of horses in training at Newmarket, were carried at the last meeting of the Jockey Club. The first announces that "every trainer who wishes to train horses on the lands belonging to, or in the occupation of, the Jockey Club, must apply annually to the Stewards for a licence, and, on making such application, must specify the horses then under his charge, and the names of their owners." The second reserves the right of the Jockey Club to revoke such licences at pleasure, on sufficient reasons being shown for the necessity of such a step. The third explains that the payment of the Heath tax does not confer on the payer any legal right "inconsistent with the absolute control the Club now has over all persons using or going on to their grounds." The fifth raises the Heath tax from two to four guineas per horse per annum, and defines what use of the Club grounds involves liability to such tax. And a supplementary resolution forbids any trainer to engage any lad or stable servant "without previously referring to his last employer, and receiving a satisfactory reply. Any trainer infringing this rule shall not be allowed to train horses at Newmarket, or at other meetings where the Newmarket rules are enforced." There is a proviso, however, to this last, introduced at the suggestion of Admiral Rous, that "any boy prevented from obtaining employment by this rule shall have the right of appeal to the Stewards for an inquiry." These resolutions—setting aside the last—deal with two points, and are intended as preventives against two evils; first, the unrestricted liberty at present enjoyed by any one who chooses to call himself an owner or a trainer of racehorses, and which permits him to have the same privileges as the heads of the largest racing establishments; and, secondly, the superabundance of horses with which Newmarket is already afflicted. To take the latter evil first, it must really be remembered, though many people seem to have forgotten it, that Newmarket Heath, though of considerable extent, is not illimitable, and that there has been of late years a growing disposition to overtax its resources. There are about eight hundred horses in training there at present, and without affecting to draw too hard and fast a line, we may perhaps say that it would be much better for the Heath if their numbers were reduced to five hundred. We think also that such reduction would operate favourably on racing itself. So long as racing lays claim to be considered a national sport, it is desirable that various parts of the country should have a share in it, and that a healthy rivalry should exist among the trainers of different districts. The case of cricket is somewhat analogous. If, instead of the North of England fighting against the South, and the strength of one county being pitted against the strength of another, all the crack cricketers were to domicile themselves in London, half the spirit would be taken out of the game, and the old time-honoured matches would lose half their significance. And we cannot but think that the recent rush to Newmarket of one large string of horses after another, as if there was no other ground in the country fit to train racehorses upon, has had a depressing effect upon the sport, compromises being frequently inevitable, one stable often not caring to oppose another, and owners more generally taking the prudent but unenterprising course of withdrawing their horses when success seemed doubtful, rather than boldly throwing down the gauntlet even in the face of acknowledged superiority. We are glad therefore that the authorities have resolved to take such steps as will probably effect a considerable reduction in the number of horses trained at Newmarket. Equally salutary are the resolutions dealing with trainers' licences. It will no longer be possible for mere hangers-on of the Turf to pay the Heath tax for two or three wretched platers, simply in order to secure for themselves the privileges attaching to trainers, and to pursue systematically and uninterruptedly the practice of touting, to their own profit and that of their employers. The new powers given to the Stewards will enable them to withdraw from any trainer, or to refuse to any applicant, the desired licence, not only if they are dissatisfied with the trainer himself, but also if they are not satisfied with the character of the owner or owners whose horses are proposed to be trained. Thus a blow will be struck at a class of owners who do little credit to the Turf, as well as at trainers of doubtful antecedents. And the increase of the Heath tax from two to four guineas per annum may probably induce even the large trainers to draft off some of their less promising charges. On the whole, we regard these resolutions as the most important step towards Turf reform that the Jockey Club has made for many years.

The two-year-old racing was the mainstay of the Second Spring Meeting, for the Rous Stakes, established only last year in honour of Admiral Rous, and which then attracted such celebrities as Cymbal, Vulcan, Chopette, Countryman, and Tibthorpe, fell through, though kept open to the last possible moment—a rather poor compliment to the gallant Admiral. The Derby Trial Plate, also, of which we shall have more to say presently, was more interesting as being likely to decide the question whether Chopette could stay over a mile and a-half than for any other reason. Taking the two-year-old races in the order in which they were run, we find that eighteen out of the twenty entered contested the Plate over the last half of the Abingdon Mile, the shortest and easiest of the two-year-old courses at Newmarket, being little over three furlongs. The result was a complete upset of the running at the First Spring Meeting, when Juliana ran away from a large field over the last half of the Rowley Mile. On that occasion, however, the start was so ridiculously bad that many of the jockeys never attempted to take any part in the race, which would probably have been decided null and void had the Stewards the power of overruling the starter's decision. But, as the law stands, there is no more appeal from the starter than from the judge; the decision of the former is as absolute about the commencement as is the decision of the latter about the finish of a race. This is curious, because, while the judge is fettered with no restrictions, the starter is prohibited, by the 45th rule of racing, from making a running start; yet the decision whether this rule is observed or neglected is left to the starter himself, and to him only. He is judge, jury, and witnesses, all in one, and in his own case too. To return to the race of which we were speaking, Juliana was quite unable to repeat her success, and Oxford Mixture won in a canter from Blue Light—probably the best, as she was the best-looking, of the whole eighteen. The winner is a wiry daughter of Oxford, and, as subsequent running shows, is clearly possessed of a fair share of that speed for which the stock of Oxford are so well known. From being entered for sale for 100 sovereigns in the last race of the First Spring Meeting, it is natural to suppose that her owner did not entertain a very high opinion of her merits; and her easy victory in the race under notice would not say much for the quality of the field. We are disposed to think, however, that it was a lucky thing for her owner that no one claimed her at her selling price three weeks ago; nor is she likely to figure in a selling plate again for some time to come. The succeeding two-year-old event was carried off by Fex, one of M. Lefevre's immense string, but Ironsides stuck tolerably close to him, and the latter's form at Chester was so bad as to prevent much credit from attaching to the winner. Soon after came the Newmarket Two-Year-Old Plate, the race of the week, in which the most important stakes were fairly represented. Baron Rothschild ran Faraday, a chestnut colt by Lecturer out of Queen of the Vale, whose appearance augurs well for the stock of that celebrated little horse. Mr. Savile ran two—Victoria, who showed a good turn of speed, but failed to stay home, and Donna Julia; Mr. Walker was represented by Glowworm, by Young Melbourne out of the speedy Twilight; and among the others we particularly noticed the Dean of Westminster, by Knowsley out of Iulia, one of the highest priced yearlings of 1871. In all there were eighteen runners, and when Victoria retired from the lead half way down the Abingdon Hill, Faraday appeared to be winning easily. But he was unable to stall off the challenge of Glowworm, who got the best of him at the ascent, and, drawing away, won easily by two lengths. A length from the second came Mr. Naylor's Preceptress filly, and Victoria was fourth. The following day Blue Light beat the Preceptress filly just as far and just as easily, and, comparing this running with the signal defeat of Blue Light by Oxford Mixture, the form of the Two-Year-Old Plate would not appear to be more than moderate. This is more clearly shown by the running in the Exning Two-Year-Old Plate on the last day, when Cœur de Lion beat Oxford Mixture cleverly, a large field being behind the pair. Now at Chester the Leopard (by Sundeeleh out of Madame Clicquot) beat Cœur de Lion in a canter in the Mostyn Stakes, and again in the Radminton Stakes. The Leopard himself also was beaten in the Beaufort Biennial Stakes by Lord Wilton's Mineral filly, and on the whole the two-year-old form at Chester reads a good deal better than any shown last week at Newmarket. Nothing, however, need be said in disparagement of Glowworm, who won both his engagements in excellent style; nor must mention be omitted of His Grace, another of Baron Rothschild's two-year-olds, who disposed of Visor very easily over the Rous course.

We come now to the Derby Trial Plate for which Lord Gough and President ran as well as Chopette and Ravenshoe; but the interest of the race, as well as the race itself, was entirely confined to the latter pair. Chopette was receiving 15 lbs. from Ravenshoe, and there could not have been a more favourable opportunity for her to show whether she could stay or not, nor would her victory over so moderate an antagonist have been matter for much exultation. In the Craven meeting Favonius gave Ravenshoe 17 lbs. and beat him with any conceivable amount of weight in hand; and it was really only a question whether Chopette could gullup at a fair pace for a mile and a half, in which case she could not possibly have lost. Ravenshoe, indeed, could not go fast enough to force the running—the right policy to adopt against a suspected non-stayer; and Chopette, hard-held and pulling her rider almost out of the saddle, came along without any very unnecessary exercise of her well-known speed. Up to within two hundred yards from the finish it seemed that Chopette, had she been let out, could have increased her pace in a moment in such a way as to leave her gigantic antagonist as far behind as she pleased; but almost immediately afterwards she left off pulling, and then all was over. She had not an effort left, and a donkey could have passed her then. All doubts about her ability to stay must, we should think, be settled for once and for all after this defeat, and it will be a matter of regret if so brilliant a performer is exposed to further annoying reverses by being allowed to run out of her proper distance. The immediate and most remarkable result of this race was to exalt Drummond to the front rank of Derby favourites. We should certainly not have expected this. What are the facts? Drummond runs Chopette to half a length over the Rowley Mile; and then Chopette herself is beaten over a mile and a-half course, by a similar distance, by a horse who was never within a stone of Derby form. That does not enhance Drummond's merits; nor, even if he had beaten Chopette at the Craven Meeting, would a successful trial with a notorious non-stayer be a sufficient test for a Derby candidate. It is very likely that Drummond may be known to be much superior to his stable companion Ravenshoe; but his superiority must be something prodigious to give him a fair chance of winning the Derby. Anyhow, the logical inference from the running in the Derby Trial Plate would be, it appears to us, that Drummond's reputation, so suddenly increased by his running with Chopette in the Craven Meeting, is diminished by the same mare's utter failure last week. There may be, of course, other and sufficient reasons for promoting him to a place among the favourites; but we have only to do with those which result naturally from public running.

REVIEWS.

LIFE OF SIR HENRY LAWRENCE.*

FEW biographers have been better qualified for their task than the late Herbert Edwardes. Himself a good scholar, a practised linguist, and an accomplished draughtsman, he achieved success both in civil and military administration. He was for some years in close and confidential relationship to Henry Lawrence when this statesman was first Resident at Lahore and then Chief of the Board of Administration. By familiar intercourse he could say how the deceased read and remembered, thought, wrote, planned, and acted. Documents, public and private, have been ungrudgingly entrusted to his care. It was known to Indian officers that for some years Edwardes had been employed in digesting and arranging the copious materials accumulated, in a long and diversified career, by his master and guide. Unfortunately the life and labours of the biographer were terminated by a serious illness, the result of toil, exposure, and climate, in December 1868. But the incomplete volume fell into the hands of one who in many respects was highly competent to finish the work. We shall presently speak of the manner in which this several liability has been discharged. Here it is only necessary to state that the first volume is entirely the workmanship of Sir Herbert Edwardes; and that Mr. Morivale's real labours commence shortly before the date when Lawrence was summoned from the comparative seclusion of his post at Khatmandoo to confer with Lord Hardinge on the duties devolving on the British Government after the British army had defeated and overthrown the Sikh power in four pitched battles.

* Life of Sir Henry Lawrence. By the late Major-General Sir Herbert Benjamin Edwardes, K.C.B., K.C.S.I., and Herman Merivale, Esq., C.B. & Co. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1872.

Nearly a century ago a millowner in Coleraine, in the county of Derry, died and left six children, as we are told, though seven are distinctly enumerated. Three emigrated to America, where all trace of them was lost. Two were daughters; another son entered the navy as a surgeon; Alexander, the father of Henry and John Lawrence, went to India as a volunteer in the Queen's service, spent a quarter of a century in that country, served in both the sieges of Seringapatam, narrowly missed being at Waterloo, and finally ended his days on a very moderate pension, bestowed partly by the Company and partly by the Crown, and as titular Governor of Upnor Castle, on the Medway, in Kent. He appears to have been a man of considerable force of character; fond of his profession; liberal, if not lavish; and one who, with patronage or opportunity, might have achieved something of that position which it was left for his sons to make. In the year 1798 Alexander Lawrence married the daughter of the Rev. G. Knox, collaterally descended from the great Scotch Reformer, and imbued apparently with some of his strong religious feelings. From this union sprang seven sons and five daughters, and Henry Lawrence, the fifth child and the fourth son, was born at Mathura, the southernmost station in Ceylon, on the 28th of June, 1806. The father, who had clearly given more to the army than he ever received from it, when looking out for professions for his sons, turned to the Court of Directors; members of which, in spite of occasional nepotism, have nobly distributed patronage in their time, and have been the means of introducing statesmen and captains to fortune and fame. No fewer than five sons of Alexander Lawrence received appointments in divers branches of the Indian services; and Henry, after passing some time under his uncle at Foyle College, Derry, followed his brother George to Addiscombe, in the year 1820. From the anecdotes given by Sir Herbert Edwardes of those early days, Henry Lawrence seems to have been of a thoughtful disposition; truthful, fearless, quick of temper, slightly rough, resolute in action, and a merciless enemy of anything cowardly or mean. In due time he passed through the College, and was gazetted as a cadet of artillery in May 1822. Some of his early friends seem to be of opinion that there was nothing in Lawrence's school or college days which gave augury of eminence; and, amongst others, one contemporary is quoted as saying that in these days of competition Lawrence would have been ignominiously "rejected by the examiners for cadetships in the Indian army." From this dogma we must entirely dissent, and indeed the very pages of the biography sufficiently refute it. Competition was an essential part of the examination at Addiscombe. The cadets entered unclassified, and issued in three grades—engineers, artillery, and line. It is certain that Henry Lawrence, like Sir John Kaye, fought his way up to the second division; that he was "best in mathematics"; had a decided taste for surveying, and ran a "neck and neck" race with one of his contemporaries, who admits his own defeat. That the training may have been imperfect, and that the powers of young Lawrence were not sufficiently tested or carefully improved, is very likely; and modern competition is open to the obvious criticism that it exalts or forces some qualities and ignores others. But there are some critics who are never weary of repeating that competition would have plucked Nelson and excluded Clive. Lord Lawrence is much more likely to be right when he records his opinion, some time in 1845 or 1846, that his brother was a "fellow of power and mark." Whether it is the nominee or the young prodigy counting his marks by hundreds in five or six subjects, who shall turn out a man fit to rule an Empire or save a State, is of course a matter of uncertainty; but we see no reason to doubt that Lawrence could have easily adapted himself to the exigencies of a sharper competition had he been born later, and that he only required a more effective training to make him a ripe scholar, as well as the fluent writer which he afterwards became.

In February 1823 Henry Lawrence landed at Calcutta, and, like other young soldiers of his branch of the service, was sent to Dum Dum, eight miles from the metropolis, then connected with it by one of the very few metalled roads in the Lower Provinces. There, amidst what Lord Macaulay called the "strange vegetation of the palm and the cocoa tree," and in sight of extensive rice fields and tanks, he spent a year or two in playing chess, studying history, acquiring the languages, and firing six-pounders on the magnificent wide plain to the north-east of the cantonment, which was reserved for the essays of artilleryists. Unlike many soldiers and civilians in days when natives and the heads of large Calcutta houses were easy and accommodating, he never got deeply into debt; and he was one of a knot of cadets, many of whom were afterwards distinguished, who derived good advice and countenance from the chaplain of the station, now Sir George Crawford, of St. Hill, Lincolnshire. Writing from recollection, probably, St. Hill states that the chaplain took a "very active interest in the young officers," which almost deserves its title, so prettily was it shaded with wood and enlivened with water." Modern explorers were sceptical as to these advantages, and do not hesitate to aver their conviction that this enchanting structure, though two-storied and not a mere bungalow, was damp and unwholesome; that the only enlivenment contributed by the water was that of croaking frogs and vicious mosquitoes; and that the place was in 1843 tried by Lord Ellenborough as a residence for the deposed Amirs of Scinde, and eventually discredited as prejudicial to Europeans and natives alike. However, the life in cantonment, with chess and discussions, and possible snipe-shooting, was soon to end. In 1824 the Burmese war broke out, and the young artillery officer was ordered down to Calcutta, and with howitzers and 6-pounders, ammunition and tumbrils, was shipped to Chittagong. Active life began from this time, and except for intervals of furlough, or leave on medical certificate, Lawrence spent the next five-and-thirty years in useful and honoured service, ranging from the swamps of Burmah to the Khyber Pass. The main attack on the Burmese Empire of that day was naturally made by sea. But the arrogant Burmese had actually invaded the southern part of Chittagong, routed a detachment, and captured a frontier post. It became necessary to dislodge them, and for this purpose a division under General Morrison was sent down in the commencement of 1825, to march from Chittagong into Arracan, along the coast. How they got down, through thick jungles, over tidal creeks, along the sea beach, and by roads improvised for the march, would puzzle those who doubt the possibility of an autumn manoeuvre in an English county after the middle of September. But it is well told in the journals and the letters, and is further elucidated by the remarks of the biographer. We must hasten on, merely remarking that Lawrence was struck down with the Arracan fever, which decimated troops and cleared mess-tables, at the commencement of the rains. Still he managed to return to his post after a leave of absence of three months, and saw the conclusion of the campaign; but the malaria had done its work, and the effects of the jungles were felt by Lawrence, and were even seen in his form and features, for many a subsequent day. Indeed it is stated that he never entirely repaired the waste and detriment of those unhealthy swamps. For the benefit of his health he was ordered home to England, and via Singapore and Macao reached England about May 1827. In August of that year he met the lady who was well worthy to be his wife, and those who do not wish that the course of genuine love should run too smoothly will be gratified to learn that, without avowing his passion, he returned to India with his brother John, who was going out as a young civilian on the Bengal establishment. The ship reached India in February 1830, and in the next two years Henry Lawrence passed in the languages, gained one object of his ambition in being transferred to the Horse Artillery, and through the influence of his brother George was appointed to the Revenue Survey. We have not space to quote the description (p. 120, Vol. I.) of the surveyor's work. But it is in Sir Herbert Edwardes's best manner, and will explain to English readers how the young subaltern gained that intimate knowledge of tenures and customs which, either self-acquired or derived from others, is indispensable to a statesman when called to legislate and act for the people.

In May 1835 his father died. On the 21st of August, 1837, Henry Lawrence married Honoria Marshall, a distant cousin and a niece of Admiral Heath. The marriage, it is tolerably clear, was promoted by Lawrence's eldest sister, Letitia; and Miss Marshall went out to Calcutta to marry her future husband. The ceremony was performed by Archdeacon Dealtry, subsequently Bishop of Madras, and the union was productive of that happiness which may be reasonably expected from mutual dependence and well-tested affection. It used to be said at mess-tables in India that some good soldiers and civilians were ruined by marriage, and we have even heard a Governor-General speak of a dashing swordsman as one whom matrimony had spoiled. No such comments are called forth by the career of Lawrence as a married man. Mrs. Lawrence entered thoroughly into the pursuits of her husband; improved or polished the articles which in the intervals of business he threw off for the Delhi Gazette or the Calcutta Review; corrected his proofs, shared his discomforts, alleviated his sorrows, checks, and disappointments; and brought one more example to confute the theories of men who imagine that Indian marriages merely unite May and January, a blooming beauty and a rich and yellow Nabob. Mrs. Lawrence's letters are marked by a delicacy, by an eye for natural beauty, picturesque scenery, and native customs, and by powers of description which almost rival Miss Eden; while in earnestness and elevation of thought they are far superior. But a wife and a mother stand on a higher platform than a sister, and the "George" of Miss Eden had not much in common with the Henry of the volumes before us.

The next few years of Lawrence's life were passed in surveying the district of Gorukpore, then only partially cleared and cultivated, and the adjoining district of Allahabad; and it was about this period that he found himself engaged in a curious controversy with an adventurous staff officer who had the temerity to compare a certain Sir John Adams to the Duke of Wellington. Lawrence was rather like the Highland laird who fancied that David Dunn had drawn a comparison between the Duke of Argyll and the Earl of Argyll. An angry correspondence followed, and, in spite of his strong religious feelings and his wife's remonstrances, he was led to challenge his opponent. Fortunately the brother officers of both parties anticipated the condemnation which duelling has since received, and decided that neither disputant had any occasion to put his honour and courage to such a test.

In 1838 all India was alive with the expedition to Cabul, and Lawrence, with his battery, joined the army of the Indus. By the discernment of Mr. (now Sir) F. Currie he was appointed assistant to George Clerk, the eminent Political Agent on the frontier. The events of the ill-chosen, ill-commanded expedition to Cabul; of the massacre of our forces; of the captivity of our officers and their wives and children; of the skilful strategy and adequate retribution of Nott and Pollock, are so well known that we omit any criticism of the valuable contribution made to the history of the time in this biography. There is, however, a very remarkable letter from Akbar Khan to his brother Afzul, the father of Abdul Rahman who is now an exile from his country, in which the writer gloats over the death of Macnaghten and the expected annihilation of the English. If genuine, which there seems no reason to doubt, it is much more worthy of publication than a half-serious squib which about this period Lawrence sent to the Delhi Gazette, in which he pictured himself and Sir C. Metcalfe, under assumed names, as reconquering the territory of Afghanistan and introducing our own system into the annexed tract. Leaving his wife at what was then the frontier station of Ferozpora, Lawrence in December 1841 went to aid Mackeson. This distinguished officer, assassinated in 1853 on the frontier by a fanatic of the stamp of Shere Ali who struck down Lord Mayo, was then in charge of our relations with the Sikh Government. The whole of the Punjab, with an army trained and disciplined by French soldiers of the First Empire, then intervened between the prisoners at Cabul and the beleaguered garrison of Jellalabad on the one side, and English cantonments and arsenals on the other. The Sikh soldiery were mutinous. The Sikh authorities were lukewarm. It was owing to the extraordinary influence, the winning manners, and the diplomatic capacity of (George Clerk, aided by such lieutenants as Lawrence and Mackeson, that our generals procured the loan of Sikh guns and the support of Sikh levies, and were ultimately enabled to force the defile of the Khyber Pass, and to effect a junction with the garrison of Sir Robert Sale. How Lawrence, as political officer with the force, organized a commissariat, collected supplies, reasoned with Aritabile, a Neapolitan born and a man of extreme vigour, and even ferocity, in ruling a discontented soldiery and wild tribes; how he exerted himself to drag guns over difficult places; how his energy triumphed over acute physical suffering; how he acted as artilleryman, pioneer, captain of cavalry, and diplomatist by turns, is all graphically told in this volume. At one time there seems to have been a question whether he should not take the place of his brother George, who had been allowed by Akbar Khan to meet General Pollock, and to propose an evacuation of the country and the surrender of the prisoners. We have no doubt that, though this exchange might have involved a hopeless captivity in Bokhara, the two brothers, if they remembered their classics at Addiscombe, would each have been ready to act on Horace's "Non aliter tamen dimovit," &c. However, no such sacrifice was demanded, and in the end of 1842 the two brothers were reunited, and the husband rejoined his wife at Ferozpora.

With the close of the Cabul campaign Lawrence was eventually appointed to the district of Kythul, after two false moves. His biographer seems to think that he had a substantial claim to succeed Sir George Clerk as Agent to the Governor-General on the frontier. Undoubtedly his services with the force, his familiarity with Sikh politics and intrigues, and his high character might well have recommended him for the situation. But just at that epoch "Politicals" were in singular disfavour. They were popularly believed to pass their time in ravishing the inmates of harems, insulting Nawabs, and plucking venerable Moulavis by the beard; and even at head-quarters they were considered mainly responsible for the disasters at Cabul. So it is no matter for wonder that the post of Agent was bestowed on the colonel of a regiment who had commanded the rear at the battle of Tezeen, and who, though a man of military ability, had little or no diplomatic experience. Colonel Richmond succeeded George Clerk, and Lawrence was sent to reduce the lapsed State of Kythul from chaos into order. The pages in which this settlement is described furnish an instructive comment on the somewhat wild theories that natives prefer the rule of their own potentates and officials to that of the white-faced stranger, or that a native chief can manage a small principality far better than we can, whether as regards the collection of the revenue or the contentment of the people. It was at this time, too, that he drew up a paper which, nominally intended as a defence of Macnaghten, is in reality a prophecy of the mutiny, and of the measures adequate to repress it. Lord Lawrence might well term this "the best thing his brother Henry ever wrote." Had it turned up, like a fragment of the lost books of Livy or Tacitus, of uncertain date, critics would have sworn that it must have been written after 1857. The first volume here ends with Lawrence's arrival at Khattmandoo. In the last chapter there is a capital sketch of the rise of the Goorkha power, and a very excellent letter from the late Mr. Thomason, Lieutenant-Governor of Agra, on the duties of a Resident at native Courts. And here we take leave of Sir Herbert Edwards and his unfinished task.

(To be continued.)

ORDNANCE SURVEY OF THE PENINSULA OF SINAI.

THE volume of text with illustrations and the Atlas of maps which have just appeared complete this sumptuous work; the other part of which, three handsome volumes of photographs, preceded these by more than two years. It would be impossible in the limits at our disposal to enter upon a minute analysis of the bearing of this important work upon the many difficult questions connected with the topography of the Exodus of the Chosen People; we shall therefore content ourselves with briefly sketching the principal features of the text and Atlas, and indicating their relation to the topography, geology, history, and archaeology of the Sinaitic peninsula.

Before doing this, it will be well to recall the circumstances under which the survey was undertaken and carried out. It owes its origin to the energy of the late Rev. Pierce Butler, who, after receiving promises of support from numerous friends, obtained permission from Sir John Pakington, then Secretary of State for War, to have the work done under the auspices of Sir Henry James, and with the aid of his staff of assistants, on condition that the expenses should be wholly defrayed by the subscribers. In 1858, when on the point of embarking for Egypt to make the necessary arrangements, Mr. Butler died after a very short illness. His friends, however, and chief among them the Rev. G. Williams, the well-known author of the Holy City, pressed on the undertaking, were it possible, with even more zeal, as a tribute to his memory; and the surveying party, under the joint command of Captain H. S. Palmer and Captain Wilson, the latter of whom had executed the survey of Jerusalem, left England in the autumn of 1858. They were accompanied by the Rev. F. W. Holland, who was well acquainted with the country; by Mr. Wynt, a volunteer who undertook the department of natural history; and by Mr. (now Professor) E. H. Palmer, whose duty it was to investigate the nomenclature and traditions of the country, to examine the various inscriptions, and especially those mysterious "graffiti" which have been the subject of so much dispute. For this most important task, his knowledge, not only of the colloquial dialects, but also of the mental idiosyncrasies of the Arabs, rendered him peculiarly fit. The party returned home in the early summer of 1859, and the volume in which their labours have resulted consists of reports from the various members, together with an article on the Egyptian remains by Dr. Birch; notes of the natural history by Dr. Hooker, Mr. Crotch, and Mr. Wilson; and a preface by the Rev. G. Williams. The Sinaitic inscriptions are not included in the present volume, as Professor Palmer has not yet been able to complete the translation of the very large number which he transcribed. He has, however, fully satisfied himself that these inscriptions, as had already been maintained by Lepsius and Haer, are nothing more than the graffiti of idle wayfarers in the earlier centuries of this era, so that antiquarian enthusiasm misled the author of Sinai Photographed, as it did Mr. Pickwick, and these pretended memorials of the Exodus sink down to the level of a somewhat ancient instance of "Bill Stumps his mark."

With regard to the topographical work of the surveying party, it is almost needless to say that it was done in that thorough style which distinguishes the department presided over by Sir Henry James. The district between Suez and Jebel Musá, including all the main routes to that mountain and Serbal, was most carefully surveyed, models being constructed of the two mountains, and maps on the scale of six inches to a mile; while the principal topographical features of a district about twice the size of Kent, forming a broad strip roughly parallel to the western coast of the peninsula, were secured, and are mapped on the scale of half an inch to a mile; besides which a line of route stretching from the north-eastern extremity of this was carried as far as 'Ain Haderah, and has since been extended to Jebel el 'Ejneh (on the south-eastern escarpment of the Tih). This last is one of the rival claimants for the distinction of being the Mountain of the Law, and all the others were included in the above-named district.

We have before us two earlier maps of the peninsula—Husseyger's and one published by Mr. Holland in 1858; but although the latter is a considerable improvement on the other, a very short comparison of it with that produced by the Survey shows how great the alteration has been. Hardly a contour can be traced or a valley followed without finding a variation between the maps; thus showing how useful this expedition was in view of a right understanding of so intricate a mountain region. Many blanks, indeed, still remain in the Survey maps, but they are only in the less important districts, and are in all cases enclosed in a network of carefully surveyed valleys; so that, if it ever be deemed worth while, the work can readily be completed.

The following are the principal results of the survey as it immediately affects Biblical topography. Of the various sites proposed for the Mountain of the Law one only, Jebel Serbal, on the southern side of Wady Feiran, may be considered as having been a formidable rival to the traditional site by the convent of St. Catharine. The advocates of the former peak supposed that they found the camping-place of the hosts of Israel "before the Mount" either in the Wady 'Aleyat or in a supposed level space between that valley and Wady 'Ajeleh, "two rough and stony valleys that run down into Wady Feiran from the extremities of the northern front of Serbal;" and they obtained a corroboration of their theory from the former name, which they supposed to contain the Arabic word for a calf, and thus to preserve the memory of the idolatrous worship. The survey has shown that Wady 'Aleyat is so broken and strewn with boulders that there are but few places in the valley where even a small number of tents could be pitched; while the supposed level space is "a tumbled and chaotic mass of mountains, rising at their highest point to an elevation of 2,500 feet above Feiran"; also that the name 'Aleyat could not possibly contain the supposed root, but means quickness, because "it is the quickest way to Tor." Another point of great interest is brought out by the survey. It has often been felt as a difficulty that the Israelites could have supported their large flocks and herds in so barren a district as the Sinaitic peninsula was supposed to be. It is clearly shown that even now there are not a few oases in this apparent waste, and that the whole region must in former days have been far more fertile than it at present is. The destruction of forests by the Egyptian miners, possibly also the consumption of fuel by the Israelites themselves, would suffice to change the whole character of the region, by altering the rainfall, and accelerating denudation, as is now the case in some parts of the Italian Alps.

"Ordnance Survey of the Peninsula of Sinai. Published by Authority of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury. Ordnance Survey Office, Southampton. 1869.

The Rev. F. W. Holland contributes an article on the geology of the district, accompanied by a map. From this and his description, it will be seen that the nucleus of the peninsula consists of a mass of crystalline rock rudely resembling a goat's or an ass's head. This is called syenite by Mr. Holland; by which term we conclude that he means hornblende granite. Placed like a frontlet between the ears or horns is an irregular strip of metamorphic rock, which crosses over and curves round the tip of the one on the left, the trough in which lies Wady Feiran. Between these crystalline rocks and the curving outline of the great plateau of the Tih—deposits of the cretaceous age—is a red sandstone, very like that of Cheshire, called by geologists the Nubian Sandstone. This, from included fossils, has now been determined to be of Carboniferous age. The cretaceous rocks of the Tih form a great inland escarpment bounding the Arabat valley on the west and the Gulf of Suez on the north-east, descending to its shore at one place only. This and the older rocks of the south are doubtless girdled by Tertiary strata, but these are only exposed in two places on the shore of the Suez gulf, and they form the peninsula of Râs Muhâmmad. Finally, almost the whole peninsula is fringed by a zone of drift sand and raised beach, which often reaches an elevation of thirty or forty feet above the present sea level.

We see, then, that in Palæozoic times these crystalline peaks of the "Mountains in Arabia" formed an island in the sea, around whose shores the Nubian sandstones were accumulated from the decomposition of its hornblende rocks. A deeper subsidence produced the Tih limestones, and then during a long period of upheaval and occasional depression the channel that separates the Tih escarpment from the Sinai massif was cut out, the nummulitic limestones and other Tertiary deposits were deposited on the shores of the peninsula, and, finally, by a comparatively late upheaval, the fringe of beach was itself exposed to the action of the waves.

Not one of the least important parts of the volume is Captain Wilson's chapter on the primeval archaeology of the district. Groups of stone houses, occasionally twenty or thirty in number, are not uncommon on the crests or slopes of hills; these curiously resemble the bothan or beehive houses so well known to Celtic antiquaries. They are nearly circular in form, the walls rising almost perpendicularly for a couple of feet, after which the dome-like roof commences; each course of stone slightly overlapping on the inside the one below it, and the top being closed in by a large flat stone. A small door about twenty inches square gives admission. A very large proportion of these huts have subsequently been used as tombs, by closing the doors and removing the roof stones. The date of these interments is uncertain, for the Bedawin frequently bury in them (as in the tombs of the monks) at the present day. Stone circles are also found in some parts of the peninsula. Captain Wilson examined several of these, and believes that they were for sepulchral purposes, and erected by the builders of the beehive huts. In the centre of each circle he found a cist similar in size and form to those common in Britain. The bodies were buried doubled up, lying on the left side; but the bones were so friable that they fell to pieces on being touched. In one Captain Wilson found marine shells of Red Sea species, and Messrs. Bauerman and Lord discovered in one which they opened in 1868 similar shells pierced for stringing, a bracelet of copper, and well worked lance or arrow heads of flint. Cup and other sculpturings have been noticed in the peninsula. Captain Wilson thinks it possible that these relics may be Amulekite. We have not space to do more than mention the descriptions of the old turquoise and copper mines, with Dr. Birch's notice of the various Egyptian tablets, which range at intervals from the third to the twentieth dynasty, and are therefore in many cases much anterior to the Exodus, or the elaborate account by Captain Wilson of the monastic and post-monastic remains; and we must content ourselves in conclusion with a brief sketch of the bearing of the topographical surveys, aided by Professor Palmer's philological researches, upon the Biblical history. Much of this has already been well and pleasantly told by the latter in the first volume of the Desert of the Exodus, but the materials upon which the conclusions there announced are grounded are here set forth at length.

Among these is the settlement of the dispute about the true site of the Mountain of the Law. Serbâi, as we have mentioned above, is shown to be incompatible with the requirements of the Bible history; and as to the support which its name was supposed to lend the theory, Professor Palmer observes that the derivation from the Hebrew Sar Ba'al—Prince Ba'al—is philologically impossible and absurd; that the word "signifies a 'shirt' or 'coat of mail,' and the allusion is to the gushing of the waters, during a storm, over the smooth round rocks upon the summit, which clothe it, as it were, with a shirt or coat of mail of glittering fluid." After quoting passages from Arab poets to prove this, he mentions that Mr. Holland had once seen it after heavy winter rain covered with a sheet of ice that glittered like a breastplate. In the plain of Er Rahah, facing the Râs Susâfêh, a wall of cliffs some two thousand feet in height which forms the northern boundary of the Sinai massif, is an extent of open ground of at least twelve thousand acres, on which even three millions of persons could easily stand, and ample space in the valleys within a radius of six miles of the Râs Susâfêh "for the whole multitude to have encamped; for it does not seem necessary to suppose that each tent was pitched directly in front of the Mount during the long sojourn of the Israelites at Sinai." This peak also fulfils all the other requirements of the narrative. Rephidim is by all the members of the expedition, except Mr. Holland, placed, as held by Lepsius and Stanley, at the traditional site in Feiran. Strategic considerations, in addition to topographical arguments, in the opinion of Captain Wilson, renders this a more probable site than the narrow pass of El Watiyeh. In the following conclusions the members of the expedition are unanimous; that the passage of the Red Sea was at or near Suez; the camp after crossing at Ayun Musa; Marsh at Wady 'Amârah or 'Ain Hawwârah; Elim at Wady Gharandel or Wady Useit; the encampment of the sea at the mouth of Wady Taiyibeh; the wilderness of Sin at the plain of El Markhâ; and Dophkah and Alush in the Wady Feiran.

The Arab traditions collected by Professor Palmer, though in some cases showing signs of independent sources, are on the whole only distorted versions of the Bible story, with a large admixture of the marvellous, which to an Occidental mind often causes them to do more than border on the ludicrous. As in the case of the Sinaitic inscriptions, it is well worth while having them investigated, though the result is one much more negative than positive. The lists of names are very valuable.

With this we must close our brief notice of a remarkable work which reflects the highest credit upon all the persons engaged in it. Though not pretending to be exhaustive—for that the funds and time at the disposal of the expedition forbade—it is thorough as far as it goes; it has accomplished the survey of the most important districts of the peninsula, a task which not only required great zeal, energy, and endurance, but also unusual skill and attainments on the part of all engaged upon it.

VERY FAR WEST INDEED.*

THERE are few colonies which have less fulfilled the promise of their spring than British Columbia. Its population is decreasing; no new mines have been discovered of sufficient importance to supply the place of those which are already exhausted; and the country itself is sterile, and absolutely unfitted for the agricultural settler. The rich land at its river mouths is covered with heavy timber and brushwood which would hardly repay clearing; and the few valleys of the upper country are lost in a rocky wilderness, diversified by nothing but torrents and pine forests. The real wealth of the colony lies in its minerals, its timber, and its fisheries. Its woods have the great advantage of being close to the seaboard; its fisheries seem inexhaustible; while the mountains of the Fraser River are riddled with veins of copper, lead, and iron. On the other hand, these treasures are to a great extent rendered useless by the physical obstacles which the formation of the country offers to the construction of roads or any means of communication. Only mules can traverse the cañons or gorges of the Cascade Mountains, and even mules will sometimes lose their footing in the almost perpendicular descents, and be hurled some thousands of feet down the precipice. Such a country, however, whatever difficulties it may throw in the way of the regular colonist, offers just such a field of adventure as a young Englishman of Mr. Johnson's sort would desire. In its perils by land and by sea, its fights with bears, its skirmishes with Indians, its hunger and thirst in the deep forest, the strange ups and downs of its race for gold, the author of this little book, if we are to judge him from the book itself, is thoroughly at home. And in a very modest and unpretending way he makes his readers as much at home with these elements of "Far Western" life as himself. Some of his stories have a rather "tall" and back-woodman sort of air, and we think we recognize an old friend in the anecdote of a steam-boat race on the Fraser River, where Mr. Johnson figures as captain of one of the rival boats, and at the moment of "agony" plumps an Indian squarely down on the safety-valve. But for the most part the tales bear an air of truthfulness which inclines us to accept the book as a pretty true representation of life in British Columbia in the early days of the colony, before its bright gold had grown dim and it had died down into a sober and well-conducted possession of the British Crown. In those days it actually belonged to a smaller and less known

* Very Far West Indeed! a Few Rough Experiences on the North-West Pacific Coast. By R. E. Johnson. London: Sampson, Low & Co. 1872.

Power, and we could pardon the Yankee who, on seeing a flag with the mystic initials "H. B. O." waving over the scantily populated settlement, "calculated," after much expectation, that they "meant 'Here Before Christ,' for this 'tarnal location don't 'pear to've bin much overrun with strangers since that period." But the forts of the Hudson's Bay Company were already growing into townships, and the peltry had given way to gold-mining. With the strange society which gold drew to the Cariboo country we have of course to make frequent acquaintance, but the physical characteristics of the country produce classes which are unknown in the easier and more accessible gold-fields of Australia or California:—

There are three grades of men employed; choppers, who are the pioneers, cut down the trees in the line of road, and fill up ravines with crib-work built of logs, or build log bridges over the streams; graders, who follow the choppers, with pick and shovel, grub out the stumps of the trees, and dig away or fill up the soil; and the blasters, who are a special class, generally Cornish or Welshmen, who assault the rocks, where they are in the way, with drill and sledge hammer, and quickly demolish them afterwards with gunpowder. But the first two classes are made up of all sorts of men, from the escaped convict, or ticket-of-leave man, to the son of the wealthy English commoner, or New York merchant.

Among the "Far West" miners, however, as among their rivals in other climes, there is the same strange contrast of utter carelessness with a rough sense of justice, and of dishonesty with a prodigal generosity. Mr. Johnson tells a striking story of a miner who had employed a man to let him down the shaft, and in "striking" at last the long-wished-for gold vein, saw the face of his assistant glaring down on him "with a darned ugly look." "Jes' haul me up, will yer?" shouted the miner, but the only reply was a quiet "We'll see about that presently." It was plainly the fellow's purpose to leave his partner quietly to die and then make the most of the plunder; and it was in vain that the miner entreated him to finish him with a revolver, if murder was his end. At last the prisoner bethought himself of the pump as a means of escape, and, driving his pick through the belt into the timbers, he managed to climb up by the elevators and reach the top. A group of "boys" were soon gathered to execute the justice of Judge Lynch, and the scoundrel was pursued and captured:—

Then we took him straight back to the cabin on Jack o' Clubs. I told my story and showed the boys the belt fastened to the foot o' the shaft, and the man couldn't deny it. So we tuck him off inter the woods, and foun' a limb on a spruce-tree that looked convenient, read a chapter out o' the little Bible in the cabin to him (he hadn't taken that, you bet), an' sent him off to his long reckoning. I guess there was a heavy balance agin him.

In such a state of society the ups and downs of life were of course innumerable. Existence was, in fact, impossible to a man who could not enjoy the one as much as the other. If Mr. Johnson's story be a true one, his opportunities of seeing life on its most various sides have been more extensive than those of most men. Now he is crossing the great ranges of the Fraser River, and "speculating" among the snowy valleys of the Cariboo country; now he is an outcast in the streets of Victoria; then he is glad of a job at portage among the rapids or of a spell of desk work as a clerk in a store; once his old English skill in boating saves him from starvation. Then again he is attacked by savages on the coast, and in peril from "grizzlies" in the mountains. But throughout all he is a "rustler." "Rustling," he tells us, is an Americanism which denotes the process of fighting against odds for a living:—

Of course there are many stages of rustling; to begin with the lowest, there is the poor devil who labours for a bare subsistence, as I had done in the preceeding winter, and who thinks himself lucky enough if he keeps clear of the pangs of hunger, and gets hold of a softer plank than usual to stretch his weary bones upon; then there is the middle-class rustler, who starts a store or whisky saloon upon credit (thinking it mighty hard if it don't pay), and whom one finds ever and anon displaying his energies in some fresh field of labour, transformed perhaps from an eating-house keeper to a scientific lecturer, or from a Methodist preacher to a gambling-house proprietor. Micawber would have been a great rustler of this type in America. Above all rises the aristocratic rustler, the merchant of many bankruptcies, the politician of undefined principles, save in "lobby" business, the man who always lives at the great hotel, is dressed in the height of transatlantic fashion, patronises newspaper editors (by whom he is alluded to as "our enterprising and highly-gifted resident Mr. So and So"), or heads an exploration at the expense of the Government, and the essence of whose being consists in his keeping what our cousins call "a stiff upper lip."

Society is reduced to a simple scramble for life in such a state of things as this, and all the moral and social distinctions of ordinary times fade utterly away. What Bishop Hills is doing we do not know, but we can hardly anticipate a great crop of promising Christians from the diggers of Columbia. Still society has a picturesque and variety which does something to atone for the lack of more decorous sources of enjoyment. The emigrant finds himself lost in a human Babel of Yankees, Irishmen, Mexicans, Chinamen, and Indians. The Indian on this Northern coast is far from being the miserable savage who elsewhere is fading away before the fire-water of the European. In stature, as in colour, he approaches nearer to the European type than any others of his race, and he is often, unfortunately for stray settlers, a brave and bloodthirsty cannibal. The Chinaman, here as elsewhere, is the economist of the colony, using up over again deserted diggings, and stooping to any kind of employment till he rises from the position of camp "washerwoman" to that of banker and capitalist. But the Yankee, of course, gives the tone to this motley group. He is there liquoring at the bar, "speculating" up-country, abusing rival editors in his newspaper, driving cranky boats recklessly up the Fraser, and cramming, on an emergency, the passengers' bacon into the furnace; but always the same—shrewd, daring, ready witted, and unscrupulous. Mr. Johnson notes, as prevalent under American influences in Columbia, the "same curious union of temperance at home with tipping abroad which is so common in the United States:—"You hardly ever see an American or Canadian drink beer or wine with his dinner. All their libations of that sort are taken at the 'bar,' probably out of respect to the ladies; for it is considered a heinous offence against public morals that a lady should be anything but a teetotaler." It is odd that in all English efforts after temperance the tendency should be in the exactly opposite direction, and that Sir Wilfrid Lawson should be hard upon the "bar," but indulgent to the dinner-table.

We have often wondered why our tourists and mountain-climbers do not take a wider range in their wanderings; for in spite of their contempt for geography, it is impossible that even an Alpine Club man can believe that there is no other country but Switzerland, or no other mountains but the Jungfrau or the Matterhorn. The scenery of the Gulf of Georgia looks certainly attractive enough:—

Perfectly land-locked for a length of some two hundred miles, with an average breadth of fifty or sixty, its blue surface is dotted with innumerable islands rising majestically out of the water, and covered with primeval forests, in which here and there appear lovely spaces of natural pasturage.

All along the shores of the mainland the horizon is shut in by snow-capped mountains, above which, to the southward, towers the lordly cone of Mount Baker, an extinct volcano some thirteen thousand feet high. On the Vancouver Island side are mountains again, though not so high, forming the requisite contrast to their brethren opposite by the variety of their tints.

Here, too, are richer signs of savage life than there are inland; the waters are specked with the white sails of canoes, and the banks are dotted with Indian villages; their occupants swarming round them in blankets of many hues; giving the picture the little dash of bright colour which the artist loves.

In striking contrast to scenes like these is the stern sublimity of the mountains through which the Fraser River hews its way, many of them rising to a height of from eight to ten thousand feet, utterly rugged and inaccessible, and crowned with perpetual snow. It is amongst the gloomy pine forests and snow fields of this stern region, and at the foot of its mighty waterfalls, that the miner has to find the track which leads him to the gold-fields of Cariboo, along broken paths and down hill-sides which are little better than precipices. There are moments when even the gold-seeker forgets his thirst for gold as he stands face to face with this grandeur of nature. Mr. Johnson seems to have experienced such a moment as he made his way from the little valley where he made his one successful strike:—

For several days we plodded on in this wise, making but slow progress on account of the terrible roughness of the country and the loads we had to carry. We were far away from the haunts of white men, and were alone with Nature in its grand primeval beauty. The river began to spread itself into a large stream, marked in its course by piles of bleached drift-wood, in a valley whose width was correspondingly increased. Natural meadows extended for a few miles on either bank till they met the sides of the mountain ridges, clothed with huge fir and spruce-trees sloping mistily upwards in the purple distance, till the vegetation gradually decreased in size and density, and ultimately became lost in the regions of eternal snow, where naught disturbed the sameness of the great horizon of blinding whiteness save a few jagged black peaks too steep for the feeblest substance to light upon; and far away to the eastward, in the clear mountain air, could be seen the stupendous and fantastic summits of the Rocky Mountains; these were in the shape of castles, needle-points, men's faces, and every other curious conceivable thing, and in a brilliant sunrise, or a glowing sunset, the scene was utterly beyond words to describe, or the artist's pencil to paint, in its immeasurable grandeur.

As the valley widened the air grew warmer, the vegetation changed its character, and sterility gave way to plenty. The climate was two months in advance of that in the inhospitable region of Cariboo that we had quitted. The snow had long since melted from the flats; trees, shrubs, and wild flowers bloomed in the warm sun, while numberless berries of all kinds grew on every bush. Game was abundant, and fish plentiful in the rivers. At night we heard the cry of the moose, the growl of the bear, and the scream of the coyote; and in the daytime grouse and partridges whirled across us at almost every step. It would have been a summer paradise for the hunter, or the lover of wild nature, had access to it been a less arduous task.

The Fraser itself is a noble river, but one which requires some nerve to navigate it. There is one place where its current, after a course of twelve hundred miles, during which it has received many streams of a magnitude almost equal to its own, has to flow through a channel in the rocks of only one hundred and sixty feet in width. "The sides of this place, graphically called Hell's Gate, are nearly perpendicular, and the high-water mark in summer, when the snows have melted, is no less than one hundred feet above low-water mark in the winter." Shooting rapids on such a river as this is of course a matter of no ordinary difficulty; there are side currents, eddies, under tows, and whirlpools, which try the nerve of the most practised tracker. In many parts, to take the eye off the water for a single instant is to ensure a spill, and once in the water, skill and swimming power go for very little. There is a terrible story in this little book, where Mr. Johnson sees a crew of six men caught with their canoe in a whirlpool up the Fraser, and sucked in without the possibility of a rescue. Such a river, however, affords a capital playground for the Yankee skipper, and the race of two steamboats up its current is told in Mr. Johnson's most audacious style. At the crisis of the struggle half a dozen aspirants crowded down into the narrow space before the furnaces, passing the heavy sticks of cordwood from one to the other as quick as light. The heat soon caused them to strip to the buff, while the black and red got smeared over them, and the streams of perspiration poured down and streaked them like so many painted savages. That furnace scene might well have suggested a picture for Dante's Inferno.

Still our opponent crept closer, and our captain's determination grew stronger.

"Say, Gineon!" addressing the mate, "what's all that bakin and them hams stowed away? I see a lot come aboard, the brand was a Diamond O."

"What, Ophelmer's?"

"Yes. 'Guess Jews ain't got no right to hav pork. Pass it along to the firemen, sharp!"

"All right, cap."

Several sacks of bacon were thrown into the flames, making them roar like a strong east wind. Up went the steam gauge till it showed 160 lbs. to the square inch, just forty more than was allowed by the Government certificate, framed and glazed in the cabin.

We are sorry to say that the Captain's pluck was rewarded neither by victory nor the "kingdom come" which his trembling passengers expected. A snag ran through the bottom of his boat and he was compelled to yield to fortune. Of adventures like these Mr. Johnson's book is full enough. But it would be unfair to regard it as a mere detail of adventures. There is a good deal of practical information as to the mines and the country itself scattered up and down its pages. And the emigrant who has a natural taste for "bars and injins," or whose sense of daring is tickled by the rapids of the Fraser, will find in Very Far West indeed a great many useful hints as to where and how to settle in British Columbia.

MOLESWORTH'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.*

THE first volume of Mr. Molesworth's History, which began with the year 1830, was chiefly taken up with an account of the passing of the Reform Act. The second volume, which has just been published, starts with the accession of Queen Victoria, and brings us down to 1853, on the eve of the Crimean war. The period is an interesting one, and, though close upon the present day, is, we suspect, known to most people only in a vague, confused way. Even grown-up persons who have lived through it, and who took an intelligent interest in events as they were being transacted, would probably be surprised, if they were subjected to a close examination, to find how loose and inaccurate are their recollections of the past. There is nothing which seems to be so easily forgotten, or which is so apt, if remembered at all, to be remembered in an imperfect and distorted manner, as contemporary history. It is written in the newspapers, but the newspapers are read hastily from day to day, and when once read are done with. Few readers have either time, inclination, or capacity to systematize the heterogeneous mass of information which is every morning poured out upon them from the unfailing tap. What is asserted one day is contradicted, corrected, or qualified the next; the contradiction, or correction, has in its turn to pass through a variety of versions; and in the end it is pretty much a matter of accident which version is generally accepted. The probability is that, after a week or two, the whole affair will be forgotten, and that some fresher topic will have taken its place. It is enough for most people to know the news of the day; the news of yesterday has already passed into the region of archaeological research. As for the young folk, they have hardly any means of knowing what happened before they began to take a personal interest in affairs. They may know all about the Conquest, or the Wars of the Roses, or the Commonwealth, or the Revolution of 1688; but after the reign of George III. the history of their country is pretty much a blank to them. Under these circumstances, we had every disposition to welcome Mr. Molesworth's History. A work of this kind is very much wanted, and if composed with ordinary care and intelligence, it could hardly fail to be interesting to read, and valuable for reference. As a chronological record, Mr. Irving's Annals of Our Time leaves nothing to be desired; but there is still room for a systematic history. Miss Martineau's volumes are out of date; Alison is prejudiced and careless. We are sorry we cannot say that Mr. Molesworth has supplied the void. He acknowledges that the further he proceeds with his History the more difficulty he finds in avoiding being drawn into details which are neither interesting nor instructive; but the fault of his book seems to us to be rather a deficiency than a superabundance of detail. Mr. Irving gives us detail, the brief news of each day. Mr. Molesworth boils everything down into a weak wash of general observations, mixed with leathery scraps of "Hansard." Everything in his pages is dead and dull. There is neither proportion nor perspective, only a flat monotony of faint and feeble outlines. He has no idea what to leave out, or what to put in. He is apparently incapable of distinguishing between events which are characteristic of the age and mere details of legislation. His History is extremely imperfect if it is to be regarded as a chronological summary, while on the other hand it has none of the breadth and unity of true historical writing.

Mr. Molesworth has discovered that from the passing of the Reform Act of 1832 the history of England is the history of the gradual prevalence of truth and justice by means of free discussion, and also that the life of the country is fully reflected in the Parliamentary debates. That dreary chronicle has evidently been too much for our historian. He has burrowed in it, and occasionally struggles to the surface with a little spadeful of extracts. But of the rich, varied, busy life of the nation outside the dismal round of Parliamentary controversy he has hardly any conception. Nobody would now seriously dispute the assertion that the Reform Act of 1832 was a valuable and necessary measure, and that it has been followed by beneficial results; but it was after all only a formal recognition of the development of social and political forces which had been for some time at work; and a moderate acquaintance with English history would suggest that "the gradual prevalence of truth and justice" may be dated somewhat further back than the passing of the Reform Act. A very interesting chapter might have been written on the working of the new Poor Law, but Mr. Molesworth treats it only in the most cursory manner. He observes that there were constant complaints of the hardships of the new Poor Law, and proposals for its modification; but "whenever these complaints came to be closely investigated, it was found that there had been great exaggeration; and, on the other hand, when the proposed remedies were properly examined, that so far from tending to improve the condition of the industrious labourers, they were calculated to make them worse." Mr. Molesworth might have made his History both more interesting and more instructive if, instead of general remarks of this kind, he had given some details to illustrate the nature of the complaints and the proposed remedies, as well as of the measures actually adopted. The roots of the movement struck deep into the social condition of the country. While the squires resented a change which they feared would be destructive of their influence over the lower classes, the latter were by no means prepared to surrender the material benefits which had been the reward of submissive dependence. They wanted to be independent, and to be taken care of too. The Courtenay riots, which occurred about this time, are a remarkable illustration of popular credulity and fanaticism, and Mr. Molesworth has lifted his eyes from the debates to take note of this extraordinary delusion. Just before the general election of 1835 the people of Canterbury were startled by the appearance of an eccentric stranger in their midst. He put up first at the "Fountain," the principal inn, but soon removed to the "Rose," in the centre of the town. When he came out into the balcony of the "Rose" to harangue the public he had no difficulty in collecting an audience. His lofty stature and imposing demeanour were rendered more conspicuous by a flowing beard—those were the days, it must be remembered, of shaven cheeks—and a gorgeous uniform of crimson velvet, with gold facings. He carried a sabre at his side, and he was very fond of drawing and flourishing it in order to give point to his speeches, which were violent and mystical, and related chiefly to the new Poor Law. He placarded the walls of Canterbury with addresses, and he also started a paper entitled the Lion, to advocate his views. He gave himself out as "Sir William Courtenay, of Powderham Castle, Knight of Malta, King of Jerusalem, King of the Gipsies," &c. Nobody knew whence he came, or what was his real name and position; but he found people who were quite willing to support him as a candidate for the borough. His furious invectives against the authorities delighted the mob; and some of the opponents of the sitting members—who were both Whigs—were not indisposed to make mischief by encouraging the hero of the populace. If household suffrage had been then established he would probably have been elected; and, even as it was, though he failed at the poll, he had a considerable number of votes. His defeat rather increased than diminished his popularity. His portrait was printed on pocket-handkerchiefs and painted on tea-trays; and shopkeepers who wanted to push their wares thought it worth while to call them after him. He rode about Kent in his brilliant uniform, sword in hand, attended by two gentlemen of education and respectability who had attached themselves to him as equerries or aides-de-camp. A grand ball was given in his honour at Canterbury, and he made a point of being present at all important public assemblies in the district, and of addressing the people whenever he had an opportunity. When a report was circulated that "Sir William Courtenay" was an impostor, and that he was in reality a bankrupt brewer of the name of Thom, the mob at once set it down as a malicious invention of the gentry in order to discredit him, and to supply an excuse for getting him put out of the way. He was locked up in a lunatic asylum for some months; but was released on his father's intercession, and under the impression that he was a harmless madman. He hastened back to the neighbourhood of Canterbury, and found that his adherents were still true to him. His long beard had been shaved off, his uniform taken from him, and he now presented himself dressed as a dusty miller. But his pretensions were more startling than ever. He went among the peasantry boasting of his distinguished birth, and of the great possessions which were unjustly withheld from him. He even persuaded them that he was a second Messiah, and promised them the plunder of Canterbury, against which he offered to lead them. He collected a band of about a hundred ignorant, fanatical, and reckless men, and when a constable attempted to oppose their march, Thom shot him dead. A panic seized the district, and two companies of soldiers from Canterbury were called out to quell the insurrection. The officer in command of the troops stepped forward to parley with the ringleader, and Thom fired at and killed him. The mob then charged the soldiers, who, not anticipating resistance, had not loaded their muskets, and who would have been put to rout, such was the desperate fury of the onslaught, if the rear rank had not had time to load and to discharge a volley among the peasants. Thom and several of his followers were killed on the spot; some of the others were tried for murder and sentenced to death, but, in consideration of the delusion under which they had acted, the sentences were not carried out.

* The History of England from the Year 1830. By Wm. Nassau Molesworth, M.A., Viscount of Spotsland, Mouchale. Vol. II. London: Chapman & Hall.

Notes and Correspondence relating to Political Occurrences in June and July 1835. By the Hon. Edward John Littleton, First Lord Hatherton. First published from the Original Manuscripts. By Henry Reeve, Esq. London: Longmans & Co.

The great political event of the period embraced in Mr. Molesworth's present volume is undoubtedly the repeal of the Corn-laws. Looking back upon it now, when the principles of Free-trade have been so firmly established and so universally accepted in this country, it may perhaps seem strange that the measure should have been so fiercely and so long contested, and that those who advocated it should have been regarded as dangerous revolutionists. It is easy to be wise after the event, but it is only fair to remember that there were Liberals as well as Conservatives among the opponents of Free-trade; that Lord John Russell and Sir R. Peel were converted nearly about the same time; and that the novelty of the experiment, the overthrow of old traditions which it involved, and the violence of some of the arguments by which it was supported, rendered the alarm which was felt by no means so unreasonable as it may now appear. Mr. Molesworth has exercised his ingenuity to discover how it happened that the Manchester cotton-spinners assumed the lead in the agitation for Free-trade; but there can be no doubt that the reasons why they took one side of the question and the agriculturists the other were pretty much the same. The agriculturists were afraid that the abolition of Protection would be ruinous to their interests; and the manufacturers had no difficulty in appreciating the justice and wisdom of a policy one of the first effects of which would be to bestow a pecuniary benefit on themselves. The repeal of the Corn-laws meant of course cheap bread for operatives in the cotton-mills. Mr. Molesworth is disposed to attribute the successful issue of the movement to the League; but it may be doubted whether the bitterness and violence of some of the agents of that body did not tend to increase the alarm with which their proposals were regarded, and to strengthen the opposition by enlisting moderate men on its side. It is certain at least that bad harvests and the Irish famine precipitated a measure which otherwise might not have been carried for some years to come. At the same time, there can be no question as to the remarkable energy and ability with which the League conducted its operations; and Mr. Molesworth's account of its campaign is one of the most interesting parts of his History. The formal adoption by the extreme Radicals of the Six Points known as the People's Charter dates from 1838; and the history of the agitation is instructive as illustrating the ascendancy which the physical-force Chartists rapidly obtained over those who were anxious to rely only on moral force, and especially the readiness of not a few of the latter to join with their more violent associates rather than forfeit their position as leaders. It was in the summer of 1839 that the Chartists decreed a "sacred month" during which the working classes throughout the kingdom were to abstain from every kind of labour, with a view to compel the governing classes to concede the Six Points; and the 12th of August was fixed as the day when it should commence. The Convention subsequently resolved to abandon the idea, but it had taken hold of a considerable body of the party; and on the 12th there were disturbances in various parts of the manufacturing districts, in consequence of attempts to compel a cessation of labour. Two years later the project was revived, and in the course of a few days after it began to be carried out the Chartists could boast that for fifty miles round Manchester every loom was still, and every industry arrested, with the exception of such occupations as were connected with the actual supply of food. But the turn-outs soon began to give way; and the "sacred month" collapsed. Mr. Molesworth devotes a good deal of space to ecclesiastical questions, but he would have done well to collect them in a single chapter instead of taking them separately in chronological order.

One of the disadvantages of attempting to write a regular history of our own times is that the materials for it are only gradually coming to light. Since the publication of Mr. Molesworth's first volume, for example, Mr. Henry Reeve has given to the world Lord Hatherton's confidential explanation of the circumstances which led to the collapse of the Grey Ministry in 1834. This brief memoir is valuable chiefly because it shows that there was no intrigue or sinister purpose at the bottom of the webbuglio, and supplies a conclusive contradiction to Lord Brougham's statement that the King exerted himself to get rid of the Administration for the sake of having a Tory one in its stead. All that happened was that Lord Hatherton, then Mr. Littleton, compromised himself by a private communication to O'Connell, encouraging him to believe that the Government would give way on some points connected with the Irish Coercion Bill. Lord Grey opposed these concessions, and carried the Cabinet with him, and O'Connell, affecting to believe that he had been tricked, charged Littleton in the House of Commons with a breach of faith. Littleton thought that Lord Grey did not do him justice in his explanations on the subject, and insisted on resigning; and as Lord Althorp, who had authorised the communication to O'Connell, felt bound to resign too, the Administration broke up. It would seem that, if Lord Grey had been a little more conciliatory, the Government might have been kept together.

LORD KILGOBBIN.*

IT is impossible to read these volumes without being painfully impressed by the melancholy of the dedication. We would fain believe that it was penned in an hour of natural depression; that time may bring consolation for the loss to which it sadly alludes; and that the hope with which it concludes may prove fallacious:—

To the memory of one whose companionship made the happiness of a long life, and whose loss has left me helpless, I dedicate these volumes, written in breaking health and broken spirits. The task that was once my joy and pride I have lived to find associated with my sorrow; it is not then without a cause I say, I hope this effort may be my last.

So the dedication runs, and it touches us the more that we remember so well what the writer once was. Who had such unflagging animal spirits as Lever? who could draw so freely on a perennial flood of mirth and humour, yet never find the fountain fail? We must rank ourselves now with the last generation of novel-readers, and we look back on a manner of enjoyment of which those of the present day can form no conception. How should they indeed? Charles O'Malley, Harry Lorrequer, Tom Burke, only became personal intimates and living likenesses thanks to that special genius of their author which could clothe audacious extravagance of conception with an air of every-day life. Criticise them coldly, and, with their marvellous adventures and miraculous constitutions, they were about as improbable as Hercules, or Amadis de Gaul, or Jack of the Bean Stalk. But you had neither time, breath, nor heart to criticise them; your blood was on fire and your pulses on the gallop from the first page to the last. When the heroes and their feats were not seen dimly through a haze of smoke and blood, the scenes of the story were laid in Ireland. Ireland, as our readers know, and as Mr. Lever was never wearied of impressing on them, is a country where only the probable is unlikely. In the days he wrote of, a state of society of which the Saxon knew nothing was eccentric beyond the stranger's conceptions. We accepted unquestioningly the estimable country gentleman who held his bog-girt castle against the law, the police, and the army, by help of a tenantry whose payment of rent took the form of rough and ready feudal service. Thanks to accumulating precedents in successive novels, we came to admit that the younger members of such embarrassed families could always by help of ingenuity and audacity find a fifty-pound note to squander on occasion. We accepted a peculiar code of morals on the strength of the humour that inspired it, and laughed heartily at practical jokes which were generally personal and sometimes pretty nearly felonious. We came to reckon confidently on the Providence that took inexperienced duellists under its especial charge, so that we were only agreeably excited when our young English esquire found himself at daybreak on some dismal autumn morning shivering opposite the deadly pistol of the sporting attorney. We knew he had nothing worse to fear than a "winging" that would lay him up for a week or so, to be nursed by the high-bred, simple beauty, the daughter of that hospitable entertainer of his who every night of the three hundred and sixty-five took his three bottles of Sneyd, to say nothing of twice as many tumblers of punch. How pretty and lively all the girls were; how witty and warm-hearted the foreign-bred priest; what a piquant country it was altogether! The very excitement of the life was enough to carry the English visitor through its wear and tear, and the illusion cast over the whole was complete because the details were put with such marvellous vividness and vigour.

We have dwelt unduly perhaps on these earliest novels of Mr. Lever's because they recommended themselves to our taste and impressed themselves on our fancy, as on the taste and fancy of thousands of others, at a time when the taste is most fresh and the fancy most impressionable. Then the author slipped half insensibly into his second stage. He had slightly sobered down in the Knight of Gwynn, Roland Cushee, and Con Cregan, although there was still the old fire and dash. In the last two he changed Peninsular battle-fields for the wide world of promiscuous adventure; in the first and third, he began to introduce the political and diplomatic elements which he has since made his speciality. In all of them he spoke through his characters with that assumption of universal information which is nearly as useful as the reality for purposes of fiction, and which is infinitely creditable to the tact, memory, and invention of the author. From these Mr. Lever turned to the particular form of novel which he has clung to ever since—sparkling pictures of society, with the scenes laid chiefly abroad; pictures filled with statesmen, diplomatists, political and social adventurers, Queen's messengers, and minnows of the Foreign Office fancying themselves Tritons. Still, although in a different way, we were often sensible of the old strain on our credulity. Heroes cleared moral difficulties with the same startling ease with which Charles O'Malley jumped the market-cart. Lucky fellows, starting from the humblest beginnings to scramble up the social ladder, found themselves mounting as if by enchantment, while statesmen and Ministers anxiously tendered their shoulders. Beauty married to wit achieved marvellous successes, bringing a world of admirers to its feet; and conversation flowed and flashed in perpetual coruscations of anecdote, epigram, and allusion. In short, Cornelius O'Dowd, with his venetian mind, and shrewd, light touch upon subjects political, became the coadjutor of Charles O'Malley.

Lord Kilgobbin is one of the series—we sincerely hope not the last. But Mr. Lever's intimation must be our excuse for dwelling on his former works before proceeding to his present one. In Lord Kilgobbin we meet the familiar types, although they are grouped and disposed in a novel fashion. His lordship we know well. He is the freehanded, thoughtless Irish squire, settling steadily downwards toward the condition of the squireen. He is of the "real old blood or stock"—a fact nearly as perpetually present to his neighbours and dependents as to himself. His property has shrunk woefully in the course of generations, and what is left of it will compare unfavourably with the worst of the Irish encumbered estates. Yet he still manages to rub along, in a certain rude comfort, with a pretentious household, and some '45 claret, which he produces on occasion. His lordship's position is an exceptionally false one. His title is one of sheer courtesy, a damnosa hereditas bequeathed to an ancestor by James II. on his flight from Ireland, and it is given or withheld as taste or feeling dictates. The worthy peer has a son and a daughter. The former plays a very subordinate part throughout, and indeed almost drops out of sight and memory before the end of the story. The daughter is pretty and clever, shows herself a heroine on occasion, and breaks hearts in a quiet way. But she is entirely eclipsed and cast into the background by the superior brilliancy of one of Mr. Lever's favourite creations. Nina Kostalergi descends on the Irish bogs like some brilliant bird of paradise from warm Southern climes. The tie to the Kilgobbin family is through her mother; Miss Kearney, who was his lordship's only sister, having made a runaway match with a Greek adventurer. Spiridon Kostalergi, who has appropriated the high-sounding title of Prince of Delos, and assumed a manner as grand as the title, is of course a supple and most unscrupulous scoundrel. He had arranged to sell his lovely and accomplished child to the impresario of an Italian theatre. The young lady objected to this disposal of her person as a down-come in life, for circumstances had thrown her in the way of mixing a good deal in the highest Continental society. She takes flight accordingly, and wings her way to the shelter of Kilgobbin, whither her father does not care to follow her. Like father, like daughter. Nina seems to us frivolous, heartless, coquettish, and capricious. She plays fast and loose with the hearts of all the men, married or single, who are unlucky enough to cross her path. These are of sets and ranks differing widely. She herself, in some instances, is the landstone, which diminishes the improbability of such a galaxy being gathered in such a heaven-forsaken place. The Fenian movement and the unsettled state of the country supply the action and sensation, and the matter generally for startling and enlightening the English guests. Among the motley group assembled on this remote stage we find a Private Secretary of the Lord-Lieutenant; one of the Viceregal aides-de-camp; an Irish lieutenant of Austrian hussars; a captain of Constabulary; a student of Trinity College with political ambitions; a Fenian head-centre, and finally Joe Atlee, who may be said to be more than any of them the hero in a book where all the men make the running together, and no one, so far as space goes, is very prominently singled out from the ruck.

* Lord Kilgobbin. By Charles Lever, LL.D. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1872.

Given these mixed materials, one may predict the tone, if not the course, of the story. Nina Kostalergi dominates all of them; establishing herself as lady paramount in the household, while her cousin Kate subsides quietly into the second place, and her uncle Kearney accepts her wishes as laws. She makes the old gentleman dress for a dinner that is arranged à la Russe, and compels him actually to forswear his punch. Yet she brings him to dote on her to distraction, and extracts compliments having the hearty Irish flavour of the old school. Her haughty style of beauty, the "insolence" of manner which Mr. Lever is fond of insisting on, her quick wit and ready tongue make her socially invincible. Ambitious men think they could do no better than secure this penniless girl as partner and patroness of their careers. She is brilliant and ornamental; clever enough for anything; one who would make every one talk, and whom anybody might well be proud of. Poor men of modest notions, fascinated by her softest moods, fancy she might be counted on for love in a cottage. She chimes in so dramatically with the lofty self-sacrificing inspirations of the Fenian head-centre, that she might almost have won him from the settled purpose of his life if that settled resolution of his were not what she admired in him. For by him she is really captivated, and she ends by giving the most convincing proof of it. The proof is given under the influence of a special impulse, and her nature is supposed to remain as much a mystery to us as it had been to her admirers throughout the book. The male counterpart of Nina is Joe Atlee—Bohemians they both are, as he told her at an early interview. This Admirable Crichton is the Charles O'Malley of Mr. Lever's later line. Indeed it is easier to realize a Light Dragoon with as many lives as a cat and as tough a constitution than to conceive Atlee's precocious talent and ubiquitous connexions, and reconcile his tremendous literary achievements with his modest life and his ambitious nature. He chums in Trinity College with his friend Kearney, whose purse and wardrobe he freely draws upon. He cannot muster a shilling of his own on occasion, and absolute impecuniosity is his normal state. Yet he is an honoured contributor to all the leading journals and magazines in Europe. He writes a resounding article on the Eastern question in the Debates, only to demolish it forthwith in the columns of the Times. He enjoys carte blanche with the Ministerial diplomat, the Edinburgh, the Quarterly, the Kraus, the Review, &c. &c. He has done ourselves the honour of sending us editorial articles, and we know that he contributes habitually to the greenest Fenian organs. What, we must ask, became of the cheques that must have come showering in upon him from the various European capitals? Why did the ambitious youth who made statesmen wince and tremble not avail himself of these literary stepping-stones instead of toadying a shallow Private Secretary? We ask the questions, but we can suggest no better answer than that Atlee is characteristic of his author. Only accept the primary conditions of his being, and you have a most amusing character. He elbows his way towards his ends with a bland and yet flexible audacity that goes far to account for his amazing success, while his animated talk runs lightly over all the infinity of subjects that engage his versatile mind. He develops cleverly, and, as we think, not unnaturally. He starts from his vulgar surroundings as an offensive snob who, conscious of his social shortcomings, makes brass do duty for breeding. But, thanks to his marvellous adaptability, to his happy faculty of imitation and gift of close observation, he rapidly gets licked into shape, and you can watch the process as it goes forward. At last even those who have known him well from the beginning forget their early memories and prejudices; while his talents have fair play given them in general society, and we presume that he sees his career assured. But the book ends too abruptly, and the characters are disposed of somewhat summarily. We suspect that the sad allusion in the dedication may account for a certain want of consistency and proportion which characterizes the story. But in its several parts the author shows himself as vigorous as ever; there is all the old tact, all the old versatility, and, in spite of circumstances, much of the old lightness and brightness. Nina and Atlee are as good in their several ways as anything Mr. Lever has given us lately, and we are really sorry to take leave of them just when their respective careers threaten to become most exciting. They are the last persons to settle down into humdrum lives, and we venture to cherish a hope that Mr. Lever may tell us more of them.

FARLEY'S MODERN TURKEY.*

MR. FARLEY'S book, though fairly described by its title so far as the most interesting parts of its contents are concerned, is opened by a few chapters whose connexion with the remainder is not at first sight very obvious. He has a good deal of interesting information to communicate in regard to the resources of modern Turkey, and we may add that he puts it briefly, clearly, and in an agreeable style. But Mr. Farley apparently thought that something was necessary to catch the attention of the public. Everything connected even in a remote degree with the Eastern question is apt to call up associations of anything but a lively character. The general reader has no wish whatever for one more diagnosis of the symptoms of the sick man. He is rather inclined to indulge in a languid wish that Turkey could be swallowed up by an earthquake, so that we might be liable to no more demands for the support of our old ally. As that is impossible, he contents himself with turning a deaf ear to the subject, and forgetting that so troublesome a country exists. Perhaps, however, he may be imperceptibly lured to approach it by a few preparatory remarks upon the Holy Land and a description of the Empress Eugénie. This, we should add, is our interpretation of Mr. Farley's motives for treating us to a description of Lebanon and Nazareth, and for reproducing some letters to the Daily News which he contributed during the visit of the Empress to Constantinople. His own account of the matter is, that he is of opinion that consumptive patients would derive much benefit from a stay in Syria, and that the Empress is held in such estimation in this country that it is desirable to preserve "the record of an historical event, the like of which never occurred before, and may probably never occur again." The effect, at any rate, of the insertion of these chapters is to throw a kind of rose-coloured glow over the book, which, we may venture to add, strikes us as a little too pronounced in tone. Perhaps, too, it is rather commonplace. We seem to have met the Maronite Princess, who is introduced to us in one of the early pages, in a good many newspapers and popular books of travel, or perhaps she recalls some dim recollections of Lalla Rookh. She has a rich shawl round her waist, loose trousers of yellow silk, and yellow leather papooshes. Her face is concealed by a white veil, and as she withdraws its fringes for a momentary glance at the Franks, she discloses "a face of perfect beauty, a complexion exceedingly fair, and those wonderful almond-shaped eyes that are so rarely seen away from the East." In the East, however, they must be exceedingly common, judging from the extraordinary regularity with which they reveal themselves to the gaze of the literary tourist. Then of course Mr. Farley meets a courteous chief, who tears a morsel from a joint of lamb and graciously presents it to him with his own fingers; and, in short, he goes through all the regular round of travellers' sights and emotions with which we have been tolerably familiar since the days of Esther.

Luckily we soon make our escape from this region to be presented to the Empress at Constantinople. Mr. Farley discharged the duties of a Correspondent with admirable zeal, and we must presume that the readers of a Liberal journal were glad to know how Her Imperial Majesty was dressed, what was the furniture of her dressing-room and bedroom, and to be assured that nothing was absent which "the most fastidious feminine taste could exact." We are assured that an exhibition of fireworks and a parade of the troops gave to the scene the appearance of "a dream of Fairy-land rather than a reality of everyday life." Fairy-land is only known from pantomimes, and perhaps the resemblance may have been accurate enough. The French inhabitants of Constantinople declared, in a fine burst of enthusiasm, that from the visits of great sovereigns there would arise "a new era of progress and solid liberty which the lights of civilization and the destruction of ignorance cannot fail to extend to every country." The meeting of a Sultan and a French Empress will not suggest to every one the probable extension of liberty, however that word may be qualified by the epithet "solid," and Mr. Farley confesses, a page or two later, that the sanguine expectations of French journalists were not destined to be fulfilled. Those sagacious persons, it seems, declared that the visit of the Empress had already put an end to the Eastern style of feminine costume in favour of the latest French fashions; and they anticipated the abolition of all restrictions upon feminine liberty. This statement is very properly described by Mr. Farley as "exaggerated French nonsense"; and it is plain that in his opinion a change from the Turkish to the French customs in regard to women would be of very doubtful utility. Indeed he thinks that in many respects the women of Mahomedan countries have a great advantage over their European sisters. They have not at present, and for obvious reasons they are not likely to have, the inestimable privilege of voting for members of Parliament; but they have already secured many of the advantages towards which that privilege is supposed to be an indispensable preliminary. Women, for example, retain their property after marriage; though they cannot take the initiative in proceedings for divorce, they can render it inevitable in various ways; and a woman can always make the father of her child responsible for its maintenance. Indeed Mr. Farley goes so far as apparently to attribute the elevation of woman in modern society to Mahomedan influences instead of to those which are more generally assigned as its cause. In the early days of Christianity, he urges, women were little better than slaves. Their condition did not improve "until the contact of Christians with Mussulmans had given birth to chivalry." "Chivalry," he adds, "had its root in Spain, whence Charlemagne transported it to the centre of Europe." And he goes on to argue that almost all the good qualities to which we generally apply the name of chivalric were in fact imported by this route from the East. Polygamy is generally credited with many evils, but polygamy is only the luxury of a few, and, in spite of polygamy, Eastern women enjoy as much liberty than their sisters of the West, if not more. Indeed Mr. Farley's enthusiasm rises so high that he challenges "some learned theologian" to explain "why it is that men are so much better in all the social relations of life under Mahomedan laws than under those of Christianity." In fact, we are slightly puzzled to know, after reading this glowing chapter, how it is that Mr. Farley himself has resisted the temptation of conversion to Islam. We have not room to discuss his theories nor to examine into the truth of his historical statement about Charlemagne. The influence of Eastern manners upon the West is undoubtedly a very interesting question; but we are not quite convinced that truthfulness, honour, chastity, and gentleness to women and children reached Europe exclusively through the channel assigned.

* Modern Turkey. By J. Lewis Farley. London: H. Kegan & Blacklock. 1872.

However that may be, the spirit indicated by these sentiments is perhaps just a little too prevalent through the remainder of Mr. Farley's volume. He is a staunch believer in the power of Turkey to take its place amongst civilized nations. Amongst other Western prejudices there has been a general belief that education has been discouraged by Mahomedanism. Mr. Farley declares that, on the contrary, there is no country in which instruction is more esteemed or in which its professors are more respected than in Turkey. The schools have of course fallen behind those of other European nations in obedience to the causes, whatever they may be, which have prevented those admirable Mahomedans from keeping on a level with us in the general advance of civilization. Still great efforts are being made. The hall of the recently opened University was filled every evening with an attentive audience eager to hear from Mahomedan teachers the results of the last advances of European thought. Azziz Effendi gave an excellent lecture on chemistry, illustrated by experiments; Tahsin Effendi discussed the scientific properties of water; "Selim Effendi discoursed in a very lucid manner about the planets," and Tahsin Effendi again upon "the immense and the microscopic." If Tindall Effendi should ever find public interest flag at the Royal Institution, we should recommend him to consider the propriety of emigrating to Constantinople. It would be curious to speculate on the effects of this gradual infiltration of the East with Western scientific ideas—a process which Mr. Farley would regard as merely paying off some part of the immense debt which we inherit from our ancestors. The greater part of his book, however, is occupied with an account of the natural resources of Turkey, which are undoubtedly in many respects enormous. He considers Asia Minor to be an admirable field for emigration. Indeed there is already a flourishing colony of Germans established at Amadia, and their success has been so marked that a large body of their fellow-countrymen are about to establish themselves near Angora with a view to agriculture in general, and the improvement of Angora sheep in particular. An isolated emigrant would hardly be able to make his way; but if a co-operative association of English capitalists and workmen should settle in many parts of the country their success would be certain. Another opportunity of growing rich which is only waiting for somebody to seize it is in the Black Sea fisheries. There is no doubt, Mr. Farley assures us, that a company provided with proper boats and tackle and experienced managers "would clear cent. per cent. as a minimum of profit." Then, again, there is abundance of mineral wealth still unworked, and Mr. Farley believes that "the time may not be far distant when the flames of the blast-furnaces will illuminate the spires of the Anti-Taurus," and Turkey, in less poetical language, again become a great manufacturing country. The want which requires most imperatively to be supplied is that of communications. Hitherto very little has been done in the way of providing the provinces of the interior with railways, or even with direct roads, or in making practically useful the noble harbours which are to be found on the sea-coast. Mr. Farley, however, gives various instances of the success which has been attained in such partial experiments as have hitherto been made. In spite of everything trade is rapidly increasing, and the task of finding outlets for it would naturally be remunerative. Finally, if it be asked why Turkey does not construct her own public works, when the prospects of profit are so great and undeniable, Mr. Farley replies that in Turkey fortunes are made so rapidly in financial enterprises that local capitalists do not care to support industrial undertakings. They can afford to leave these mere collateral sources of gain to the foreign capitalists, whom Mr. Farley exhorts to avail themselves of the opportunity. We close the book with a sense that our mouths are watering. Why should we stop in this benighted old country content with a paltry five per cent. and trammelled by all the restrictions of monogamy, when, in young and rising Turkey, chances of investing one's fortune so as to bring cent. per cent. with perfect security are literally going about begging, and the population is the most honest and chivalrous on the face of the earth? Some little drawbacks might perhaps be hinted by experienced people, and indeed Mr. Farley confesses that there are dark spots to be found in his glowing picture. Meanwhile the facts which he adduces certainly deserve attention, and if the rose-colour is used a little too profusely, that may be a justifiable mode of overcoming a prejudice which is as unreasonably strong in the opposite direction. We are content to conclude by quoting his peroration:—"The Pagoda-tree still flourishes in the East. It has, ere now, been shaken by some of our adventurous countrymen, but it still bears golden fruit. I have pointed out where it is to be found." If the golden fruit is surrounded by thorns and is not always sound to the core, that is not a peculiarity of the Turkish variety of the commodity.

DIAMOND DIGGING.*

THE first diamond of South Africa is said to have been found in 1867. A very fine gem was found two years later. In the earlier part of 1870 the number of diamonds discovered was so considerable that a rush set in from all quarters to the banks of the Vaal river, which has continued ever since. There has been lately a check to the enthusiasm of this pursuit through the depreciation of "off-coloured" or yellow stones in the European markets. It is only fashion that makes diamonds valuable, and fashion must be allowed to prescribe its own conditions. But probably the value even of off-coloured stones of large size will be high enough to reward handsomely the lucky diggers who find them, although not to make their fortunes as rapidly as was at first expected. The original diggings were on the banks of the Vaal river, but the most frequented and productive are now the "dry" diggings at twenty-five miles distance. The epithet "dry" signifies a barren, treeless waste with perpetual all-penetrating dust and almost no water. By the river side there is bathing, fishing, shade, and firewood—all of which comforts are wanting at the "dry" diggings; but then they yield many more diamonds. The town of Klip Drift on the river is at present the metropolis of the district. The dried-up diggers from Du Toit's Pan come there to refresh themselves when utterly beaten from their work by dust and drought, and it is the depot of all the merchants. The "Pan," which is the centre of the busiest industry, and yields the largest returns, is a shallow depression in the ground, filled with brackish water in the rainy season, and forming at other seasons an expanse of hard mud, fissured in all directions by the heat. The soil is much easier to work at the Pan than by the river-side, but the circumstances of existence are almost intolerable. In the eloquent language of a local newspaper, "the dust of the dry diggings is to be classed with plague, pestilence, and famine, and if there is anything worse, with that also." But all hardships are easy while health lasts to him who hopes to see at any moment a gem about the size of a pigeon's egg gleaming in the floor or wall of his "claim" as he excavates it. Du Toit's Pan already boasts many large hotels, immense stores, two churches, several billiard-rooms, a hospital, and a theatre. Immediately around the Pan is a broad expanse of "veldt," or prairie with stunted growth of scrub, and here and there a mimosa or thorn-bush, and at distances of five to twelve miles are ranges of picturesque hills. The monotony of digging may be varied by a day's shooting for the pot in the "veldt," or by a two days' excursion for bathing and fishing to the river. The larger game, which cannot be reached in a day's excursion, are brought abundantly to market by the Dutch settlers in the interior. Butchers' meat and game are cheap, but there has been till lately a great scarcity of vegetables, which the Dutch farmers never took the trouble to grow for their own use, although they have now been tempted by the prospect of a good trade. Nothing is gained by taking an outfit from England, and little by buying on the coast, as almost everything necessary can be purchased at the diggings. If the journey thither is made by Transport Company's Wagon from Cape Town, only 40 lbs. of luggage is allowed. If the slower journey by bullock-wagon is preferred for the sake of sport, the intending digger may carry his stores and equipment with him. The routes from Algon Bay or Port Natal may be chosen instead of that from Cape Town, if the bullock-wagon be adopted. It is for a good sportsman a delightful method of spending a month or so; but if a man expects to make his fortune at the diggings, he is of course anxious to begin work, so perhaps the quicker journey by Transport Wagon is preferable.

* The Diamond Diggings of South Africa: a Personal and Practical Account. By Charles A. Payton. "Saxo" of "The Field." With a Brief Notice of the new Gold Fields. London: Horace Cox. 1872.

The author of this book did not gain much by his visit, except the knowledge and experience which he now lays before the public, but he seems to wish to try his luck again. The adventure would be best made by two friends in company, and the necessary cost of journey from England, outfit, and implements, and six months' working expenses, is calculated at 270*l.* for the two. It is reckoned that in six months they ought to have found something to keep work going for some time longer. A man who is young, healthy, active, industrious, and able to turn his hand to different things, is almost sure to find means of living, until by patient observation he discovers an opening to prosperity. It may be expected, however, that there has already been a great rush to the diggings of persons willing to make themselves generally useful. To judge from this author's descriptions of public amusements at Du Toit's Pan, we might think that the amateur actors and singers with whom London is overdone would be welcomed and rewarded at the diggings. But probably there is by this time a glut of comic singers, and possibly also of potatoes and cabbages in that market. We may, however, venture to say that the former article cannot be grown by the Boers on their farms in the Transvaal district. The author thinks that there is a good opening for energetic and clever doctors and lawyers at the diggings, particularly as they can always work at the sieve or sorting-table while waiting for disease or litigation to break out among their neighbours. The harder work of pick and shovel is chiefly done by labourers of the Kafir and other native tribes, of whom large numbers are attracted by high wages. They are industrious, and tolerably honest, and any aberration from the right path is usually followed by an application of "cat" at the police office. A young community cannot provide "chokey," or prison for offenders, so they must be punished summarily and dismissed. Even white men have been punished for dishonesty or brutal violence with the cat, and also by being dragged through the river and expelled from the diggings. Criminal law takes nearly the same aspect everywhere under similar circumstances, and whatever may be said or done in quiet times at home, the gallows and the cat are sure to assert their importance in a new and unsettled society like this on the Vaal river. On the whole, however, this congeries of all nations is peaceable, and now that it has been brought under British rule the administration of justice is firm and tolerably uniform. The cat at Klip Drift is, or was, either stronger or more conscientious in its work than at Du Toit's Pan, but such inequality is probably unavoidable in the system. The "niggers," at any rate, are not deterred from the diggings by the treatment which they meet there, and they even submitted to the magistrate when he interfered to stop a great fight between the Kafirs and Basutos. The author encourages engineers and land-surveyors, especially the latter, as likely to obtain lucrative employment. But all that he says as to the prospects of any profession or trade must be qualified by his general advice that no man should give up a fixed income, however moderate, at home, for the vicissitudes and hardships of a digger's life.

The rapid progress of civilization at Du Toit's Pan may be inferred from the fact that the bachelors of that town gave a ball, at which "there was certainly no want of ladies; indeed some persons thought that the proportion was too large." Among the diggers are some married couples, and a healthy, handy woman finds many necessary things which she can do better than the generality of men. We should certainly trust feminine eyes to pick out diamonds at the sorting-table, and there is room for any extent of economy of health and money in buying and cooking food. The greatest hardship to English people of either sex would probably be that water is so scarce at Du Toit's Pan that you can only allow yourself half a bucket once a week to wash in. The river, as we have said, is twenty-five miles distant from the Pan. It ought not to be forgotten, in estimating the prospects of these settlements, that diamonds cannot be collected in such large numbers without heavily affecting the price. The analogy furnished by the absorption of the vast quantities of Australian and Californian gold which have been produced in the last twenty years may be delusive, for diamonds are not a medium of commerce, but merely an ornament of luxury. The author says that the comparatively small prices now given for African stones are not due so much to their "off-colour" as to the fact that the immense supply has revolutionised the market. Much inconvenience has been felt at the diggings from the absence of small change. A Dutch farmer who brought in a load of oranges, sold them all at a shilling a-piece, and carried away a bag of silver to his home—stead on the "veldt," incurred a double portion of the dislike which English settlers usually feel towards the Boers. The tavern-keepers issue bits of paper as tokens for shillings; coppers are unknown, and a cigar or two boxes of matches represent three-pence. The temptations to drink are as frequent and powerful as anywhere, and the spirit called "Cape smoke" is one of the most pernicious in the world. It is difficult to preach abstinence where water is both dear and bad; but perhaps tea and coffee are the most convenient and wholesome drinks that the digger can adopt. The author speaks highly of Mr. Truter, who was head of the Free State police; but his men were drunken, dissipated, seedy-looking reprobates, recruited from the lowest class of society on the diggings. When wanted they were either not to be found, or too tipsy to be useful. Once, indeed, when a fight had been announced to come off between an Englishman and a Dutchman, the police mustered in considerable force—not however to prevent hostilities, but to keep the ring, see fair play, and enjoy the spectacle. Mr. Truter and his dirty blackguards have now given place to a British Commissioner and policemen much after the home model. The prison or "chokey" is a dreadful place of punishment for an Englishman, because he will probably have to share its narrow and filthy floor with one or more "niggers," whose personal condition and habits need not be more particularly described.

In autumn of last year the pursuit of diamonds had been partially suspended, for the reason that gold in paying quantities had been discovered about four hundred miles further inland. Many diggers were on the move to this new scene of speculative industry, and if the prospect held out should be realized, towns like those which this author has described will be created as rapidly, and on the same plan. The condition of the Cape Colony has strangely changed since Sir Harry Smith waged costly and not very glorious war against the tribes who are now working busily for white masters at handsome wages. Time was when the very names of the Orange and Vaal rivers were odious, as suggesting endless unprofitable expense. It was little suspected that our troops, in their weary marches, were almost treading upon gold and diamonds.

FARM STORIES.*

IT is seldom that the repetition of a success is up to the mark of the original; and, as a rule, it is wiser to break fresh ground than to go again over the old where the maiden tillage has been favourable. Perhaps it is that we expect too much in repetition; more probably that the freshness which charmed us in the first issue is dulled in the second, and that we get only the sweepings of the mill, the skimmed milk after the cream has been gathered. Thus the first series of Peasant Life was eminently delightful. Vigorous and natural, it made its way by the very force of its truth and simplicity; but this second series is not quite so good, though it seems almost hypercritical to say so. There is more straining after effect about it, more conventionality of style and subject, less of the rude actualities of rural life, and more conscious sentimentalism. The broad bold pen that sketched Muckle Jock and the bondager has got itself tapered off to a finer point in the "Dressmakers" and "Hetty"; and we miss the rough-hewn humanity of the early stories, not considering the exchange to a certain picturesque, clean-skinned rusticity a good one. Still, the stories are pleasant, and rich in those quaint sayings and full-flavoured epithets which give so much charm of local colouring. When Jamphlin Jamie speaks pious words to the widow he is courting, and angry ones to the brazen wench who is courting him, we know that his language is exactly such as a man of his class and kind would use. And though his religion is expressed in an odd fashion enough, yet it reads like truth, and is probably a literal transcription. "Och sir!" he says, describing the way in which he escaped from the snare set him by the deil, "I took me tae ma twa knees. No lik' that bletherin' auld man o' Uz, who yarned lang screeds till his Maker, tho' they're gran' readin'. I didna dae lik' that; but, kenning better, I made lang prayers, and, praise be till Him, He pulled me through." His various mishaps are exceedingly well told, and we cannot but pity him when that "Bull o' Bashan, monster o' a' iniquity," Baff Fraser, sets herself to "devour" him; in which laudable design she succeeds to her own satisfaction and Jamphlin Jamie's ultimate content.

William Bain, the clasher or dyke builder, is not unlike our old friend Muckle Jock in his dumb love and slow courtship, though the story wants the humorous frankness and rough realism which made the history of Jock and the bondager so fresh and amusing. Yet the confession of the poor love-sick clasher when his mother questions him is really pathetic, and, long as the extract is, we cannot refrain from giving it:—

It was at dinner-time that his mother, in her straightforward way, went into the matter. "Mrs. Jalk, fra Howe, was here on Friday, an' said she 'Yor soun was hairtlin' an' saletin' at auld Grant's, an' Jankie' o' his dochter, and lies hard till her.' Are ye courtin' there, Willie?"

How small he felt himself before his mother! How he could have wished * Peasant Life: Sketches of the Villagers and Field-Labourers in Glenelg. Second Series. London: Blackie & Co.

The Scottish Minstrel. By Jeremiah Guthrie. Translated by Gustavus Vere. London: Tinsley Brothers.

away from this interrogation! Fortunately he could not get away without saying, although he was dumfounded at the first.

"Did she speak true?" again inquired the mother.

"It was nae muckle lie," he answered with a great gulp.

There was a pause, after which the woman spoke again sharply and bitterly. "Laddie, ye're the wrong tae lead her upo' the lee; an' I dinna ken what ye mean at a'."

He rose from his half-eaten dinner, and sat down at the fireside out of sight of his mother at the table. His voice was thick with emotion, but he said steadily, "I mean naething but honest by her. She's a guid an' a clever lass, an' I lo'e her, mith'er! She's ower guid an' clever for me!" There it was all out, and the mother might think of it what she liked. He scarcely knew what he said.

When his mother begins to fret, Willie begins to reason:—

"Mither, I'm no denyin', when ye ask me, but I lo'e the lass. I lo'e her mair as ye, better nor mair, but I me'er said 'I lo'e' till her."

"Then, what wae ye lo'e courtin'?" asked the mother through her teeth.

"Deed an' truth, I dinna ken that am courtin' reasonable at a'! I me'er said till her 'Fair be ye!' Am sure she thinks an' nae courtin'. Am nae courtin', I say, mith'er!" He breathed a long sigh, and the tears were in his eyes as he went on. "But my heart loupes when I see her o'en far awa', an' I grow a'ly an' sick, an' contentit an' warm o' bairn when she's by her; an' am distracted when she's gane awa': an' am downright in love wi' her, I ken, mith'er! But ye're the first that ken o' it frae me." He sat down again on his chair with a thud. And his words had effect on his mother.

"Ye wae aye a good son, Willie," she said.

"Am thinkin' that same," said he somewhat hardly. "Am no mindit to be ought i' the comin' time; but what for no shudn't I hae a sweetheart?"

"Am no contrairin' ye," said the woman.

There the subject dropped; but at night, before he went to bed, she spoke of the matter again, more reasonably this time. "Ye haena spok' o' love tae the lass Grant, Willie?"

"No me."

"Weel, then, am mindit tae see her wi' me an' een—nae tae mak' love till her for ye, but till I see that she's wairth ma laddie. When the tatoes is lifted, and twa-three bits o' wark out o' hae, I'll win tae see her; or she'll cam' tae me here. The Hallowmae fair 'll bring her tae the town whatever."

"God bless ye, mith'er!" said the lair, going off to bed and to dream.

But as the course of true love never does run smooth, either in Glendale or elsewhere, the poor clacher has to draw his weird painfully enough before he comes to his peace. "Mak' ma bed, mith'er," he says, with an unconscious imitation of the old ballad, when he hears that Kirsty Grant has "contractit" with Tam Murison, and that "the cries 'll be out the morn'." "I'll lie down, mith'er, I dinna mind if it be tae dee." It seems to us, however, that if the honest dyke builder had a nature of so much fiery sensitiveness, he would have found a voice sooner than he did, and that he would not have run the risk of losing his dawtie for the want of timely speaking. To be sure there are certain slow and "innerly" natures that feel deeply while they betray nothing; and Willie Hain might have fallen sick of love and sorrow, for all that he never showed to man or maid the passion he was fostering. And as the author evidently knows his own work, and as his portraits are probably from the life, we must take them as we find them, without making objections which may be more fanciful than real.

The story we like least is the "Dressmakers." It is less simple than the others, and has just a dash of affectation in it that spoils what else might have been a pretty and pathetic idyl. The girls are of a class of thought and refinement beyond their social status; which of itself always gives an unnatural air to a tale, and strikes a false chord from the beginning. The author's own style of narration is Carlylese, not in grotesqueness, but in that peculiar psychological exaggeration, that dwelling on every little fact and feeling with extravagant persistency, which is one of the most marked characteristics of Mr. Carlyle's school; the action of the hero is annoying in an apparent want of decision, which turns out, however, to be unnecessary reticence and unpardonable blindness; and the end is scarcely likely. So that, on the whole, the story leaves an artificial and galling kind of impression on the mind, not favourable to one's theories of peasant life, and more after the pattern of the Keppels and Book of Beauty kind of humanity than that which owned the clacher and Jamphlin' Jamie as its members.

Love-making is the one most important fact in rural society. It is an important fact everywhere, but in the country, where life is so much less eventful than in towns, it takes even larger dimensions and has a more enduring influence. Consequently almost all rural tales turn on love; and the author of this second series of stories illustrative of peasant life in the North has not been able to break out of the charmed circle. "Queer Jean," "Widow Macrae," and "Hetty," which, with the three stories already spoken of, make up the half-dozen composing the volume, take each a different phase of the master passion. "Queer Jean" is the story of a girl betrayed and then deserted, with the added pain of her father's angry banishment from home, and the shame she has brought on her family not forgiven by any of them. "Widow Macrae" takes just the contrary side of the same theme, and shows how simple Mary Macrae "gave red faces" to Black Jock, the gamekeeper, when her innocent eyes were opened to the true meaning of his "kindness," and she saw through him and his false-hearted ways; and "Hetty" tells how an artful jade wheedled away a weak man's love from his best friend, and how by affliction she was brought to grace, and gained the blessing she did not set out by deservin'. But in "Hetty," again, we find the affectation that was so visible in the "Dressmakers," and a tone of thought and feeling not in harmony with the necessary state of culture of the actors.

The religion of Jamphlin' Jamie sounds true and realistic; that of Hetty rings false and as if made up for the market; and if stories of this kind are not true, they are nothing. Still, though we have thought it right to speak of this second series with a certain qualification in our praise, we regard the book as better work than nine-tenths of the novels and stories published. Our only regret is that it is not so good as it might have been, and as it would have been had the author been more careful to avoid sentimentalism, and to be uncompromisingly true to the ruder sort of nature he undertook to paint.

The quiet annals of a Bernese farmer's family, where there are no crimes, very little story, and not a shred of mystery, would seem to promise ill for general interest; but Soul and Money is full of pathetic and carefully drawn pictures of human feeling, and its tender quietness makes the turbulent literature of sensationalism seem even more coarse and garish by contrast. The first part of the book, though uneventful, is by no means flat. It sets forth the misunderstanding that gradually creeps in between a worthy husband and his wife, and the discord and misery which spread through the house in consequence, and react with bitter energy on the children. Homely as the details are, the skill with which they are touched in makes them to the full as interesting as a more stirring theme. The characters are singularly life-like. Christian, heavy, procrustinating, unable and unwilling to stir one inch out of the groove in which his forefathers had run their lives, hiding all his emotions beneath a wooden face and a stolid manner, yet suffering as acutely as these good lumbering souls do suffer when they take sorrow to heart—proud of his farm, proud of his name, of his integrity, of his well-doing, of his virtue—stands out from the pages solid and living. And his wife Anna is the worthy pendant to the picture made by him. Quick, active, generous, hasty in temper, and warm in heart, she has her own trials in the slower nature of her husband; and, woman like, is disposed to resent the difference of temperament between them as a personal wrong for which she deserves commiseration and is justified in self-pity, as well as in wifely displeasure. Where Christian would have refused so much as a handful of meal, she gives of their best to the poor; where she would have taken time by the forelock, he lags at his heels and lets him win the race; so that it is easy to see how misunderstandings would arise between them; and how to such a woman as Anna the difference of nature alone would seem to be a personal indignity for which her husband was justly blamable. The story, such as it is, is very well told; and the reconciliation and better state of feeling which we are happy to say come about in the second half of the book fall admirably into place. The book is a good companion, because such a strong contrast, to the Scottish stories with which we have bracketed it. Both treat of rural life; both deal more with emotion than with passion, more with sorrow than with crime; and through both runs that vein of religious feeling so characteristic of the better class of peasants, and which is at once their strength and their weakness. Yet, with so many points of resemblance, these two books are essentially and refreshingly different in tone and treatment; for peasant life, if everywhere built on the same natural basis, has its own special manifestations according to nationality, such as are not known in the "dead level of civilization"; so that, whatever the points of elemental resemblance, the result is decidedly not monotonous when men paint the lives and doings of the peasant class for the benefit of their more refined brethren in the higher ranks.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

AN American Dictionary of Biography* has of course its value as a book of reference. By its aid a reader of memoirs or newspapers who cared to study them with sufficient diligence, and to hunt out the history of every name he might come across, could satisfy himself that the Smith or Peabody mentioned in a letter or a leading article was either John C. Smith, once Secretary of Legation at Copenhagen, or James E. Smith, the editor of the first newspaper started in Nevada; Thomas A. Peabody, the preacher of Denver City, or William B. Peabody, the clergyman of Lynchburg; and the context might help him to fix on the particular character he wanted. For any other purpose something very different from the work before us is required; something that should give us one-tenth of the number of names, and ten times as much information respecting each; a work much less extensive and much more select—with much less, in short, of that democratic instinct which puts upon a level all men sufficiently important or importunate to find their way into print. The book before us gives nearly the same space to Cassius M. Clay, whom probably nine in ten of our readers have happily forgotten, and to Henry Clay, one of the greatest men whom independent America has produced—her really great names mostly belonging to the generation born during the Colonial period, and developed by the Revolution; it makes more of Jefferson Davis, one of the least distinguished of those major-generals whose number brought so many * Dictionary of American Biography, including Men of the Time. Containing nearly Ten Thousand Notices of Persons of both Sexes, of Native and Foreign Birth, who have been remarkable or prominently connected with the Arts, Sciences, Literature, Politics, or History of the American Continent. Giving also the Prominence of many of the Foreign and peculiar American Names, a Key to the Accented Names of Writers, and a Supplement. By Francis B. Drake. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Tinsley & Co. 1871.

sarcastic upon the administration of Mr. Stanton, than of the namesake who guided during four eventful years the destinies of the Confederacy. The Dictionary contains about a thousand pages in double columns, and the names that occupy more than half a column are a small minority, while to scarcely any is a whole column allotted. In fact, we learn little more respecting the most distinguished of those whose biographies are inserted than might be found in an almanac or an army list—a mere technical answer to the question "Who is he?" We can imagine that such a book may find its place among the Directories and similar works on the table of a political aspirant or private secretary, whose special business it is to gratify as many free and enlightened citizens as possible by an intimate knowledge of their personal history, but it can have none of the interest that would belong to a real attempt at a national collection of biographies. We may note, as an exceptional merit in these days, the absence of offensive epithets or abusive language respecting the soldiers and statesmen of the South.

The Underground Railroad was*, as our readers will remember, the name given by the practical Abolitionists of the Northern States to the organization by means of which fugitives from slavery were assisted to evade the pursuit of their masters and the agents of Federal law, and to find a refuge beyond the Canadian frontier. While the majority of the party confined themselves to declamation and newspaper invective, and used their position and privileges under the Constitution of the United States to wage a systematic war against the rights which that Constitution had secured to others, a more earnest minority repudiated alike the restraints and the benefits of the law, and, rejecting all the privileges of citizenship, set themselves to work to render what they held to be justice to the slave in spite of the law and in defiance of its penalties. In the performance of this self-chosen duty, many of them underwent severe sufferings, some were imprisoned for long terms, a few were killed, and all lived in more or less constant anxiety and peril; but they did succeed in liberating many hundreds of slaves, and contributed not a little to that bitter exasperation of feeling which culminated in civil war, sectional conquest, and emancipation. Whatever may be our view of the constitutional duties of American citizens, or of the merits of the quarrel between North and South, it is impossible not to respect those who, taking the obvious view of their obligations under the Constitution, and finding them intolerable, chose to renounce its benefits and its burdens, and to live as aliens in their native land, in order to fulfil what they held to be the higher obligations of men and Christians. Nay, even persons who do not share the almost universal abhorrence of slavery, and who believe that on the whole the negro was happier as a slave than as a freeman, cannot but sympathize with those who, by escaping, proved that they found slavery intolerable, and with those who, out of mere humanity and Christian charity, risked life and goods to assist the fugitives. As many a bitter Tory, in the evil days of the later Stuarts, would have faced the scaffold rather than surrender to justice a fugitive follower of Monmouth or Argyle, as Puritans more than once furthered, in violation of all their principles, religious and political, the escape of hunted Cavaliers, so even a slaveholder, if he were a Christian and a gentleman, would hardly be able to refuse shelter to a hunted slave whose scars and mutilated features showed that slavery had in his case proved all that its worst enemies called it. We believe therefore that very few will read the stories of hairbreadth escapes and perilous adventures which fill these bulky records of the "U. G. R. R." without hearty sympathy for the fugitives, and generally for their friends; whatever thoughtful men may be inclined to say of the encouragement given by the latter to wanton thefts practised by confidential slaves on trusting masters. In general the fugitives complained of personal cruelty, or, less frequently, of apprehended separation from their children. Sometimes, no doubt, they had been led to run away by skillful abolitionist incitement, or by that mere ignorant discontent which renders English servants of the present day equally prone to leave a good situation merely for the love of change. But, as a rule, the only fugitives from the far South were impelled by brutal usage to run the risks and incur the hardships of the long and terrible journey; and the small number of runaways during the war proved that those belonged to a wholly exceptional class, and formed a very small minority of the slave population. The writer of this book, William Still, himself formerly a slave, and brought up among fanatical abolitionists, is not the sort of writer from whom we could expect anything like discrimination or common fairness. With him every fugitive is a hero, and every slaveowner a demon; and the reader must take his stories as they are told, and for what they are worth, without hoping to obtain from them any real light on the subject of slavery. It is more disappointing and less accountable that there is no real explanation of the system and organization of the Underground Railroad itself. For the rest, the book would be improved by being cut down to half its bulk, which could be done the more easily as it is in no sense a history, but simply a collection of individual narratives.

We have, among several other Reports and State papers, another volume on the condition and resources of the mining districts in the Far West*, containing a chapter on metallurgical processes which indicates considerable progress in that department of mining industry. To the general reader the most interesting part of the work is the preface, which discusses briefly the quality and prospects of Chinese labour in the Pacific States, and announces conclusions which are not exactly what we should have expected. We learn that whereas the European labourers in the mines are often unacquainted with mining work, among the Chinese none but miners offer themselves for this kind of employment; that they are more trustworthy and faithful than their European competitors; and that, on the whole, and taking the comparative ignorance of some of the latter into account, the value of their labour is not so very different. The wages of Chinese labour are rising, and Mr. Raymond anticipates that those of European labour must fall. Altogether he sees no justification for the fears of those who apprehend that the Chinese may undersell and drive out European labour from the Pacific States, but seems to think that the two races may be left side by side, free from legislative hindrances and allowed to find their several levels, without any risk that the inferior, by its persevering industry and its smaller wants, may supersede the superior and turn California and the Far West into Mongolian colonies. His good opinion of the Chinese is the more valuable because it is the result of experience and observation, in direct contradiction to the all but universal prejudices of the white population of the mining States and Territories; prejudices which in many cases, no doubt, are a mere cloak for malice, envy, and dislike of a race whose sobriety, industry, and thrift render them very troublesome competitors for employment, but which are not altogether without more creditable and plausible grounds. The principal disadvantages of Chinese labour are said to be an undue addition to the observation of festivals and holidays, and a rooted distrust which makes them exact payment of their wages in coin to the day, and often leave en masse if the cashbox be not replenished in time.

The Financial Report of the Secretary of the Treasury† reveals, as usual since the war, a state of things which might well move the envy of Mr. Lowe, and cause Mr. Gladstone some earnest searchings of heart on the score of the comparative darkness of mind and want of financial morality displayed by the British Parliament in its eagerness for reductions of taxation and its indifference to the diminution of the debt. The Federal Budget shows a revenue averaging some seventy millions sterling, of which about forty are derived from customs, and nearly twenty-eight from what we should call stamps and excise; behind which, it must always be remembered, lies hidden from the eyes of English financial reformers a vast State taxation, almost entirely direct in its incidence, and levied upon the supposed capital value of real and personal estate. This division of resources between the State and Federal Governments—the former being constitutionally precluded from levying customs duties, and practically, by the prohibition of inter-State tariffs, from levying an excise—requires to be borne in mind in every mention of American finance. The Federal expenditure is about fifty-three to fifty-six millions sterling, of which some two-fifths are absorbed by the interest of the debt. There is thus a surplus of about fifteen millions annually; of which ten millions are devoted to the repayment of debt; not, unluckily, by the redemption of paper currency, against which too many interests and prejudices are arrayed, but by the purchase of U.S. bonds. There remains upon the estimates of the current and following years a sum of six or seven millions sterling available for the reduction of the most objectionable duties of customs and excise; the latter of which bids fair ere long to be reduced pretty nearly to the English model.

The Bureau of Statistics sends in three valuable Reports.‡ That on Commerce and Navigation exhibits a terrible falling off in the number of American vessels, which is not much more than half what it was in 1859 and 1860; a fact which Fenian sympathizers impute to the Alabama, and Free-traders, on better evidence, to the unspeakably clumsy arrangements of a Protectionist tariff. The tonnage cleared from American ports * Mines, Mills, and Furnaces of the Pacific States and Territories: an Account of the Condition, Resources, and Methods of the Mining and Metallurgical Industry in those Regions, chiefly relating to the Precious Metals. A Sequel to "American Mines and Mining." By Rosier W. Raymond, Ph.D., U.S. Commissioner of Mining Statistics, &c. &c. New York: Ford & Co. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1871.

† Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the State of the Finances for the Year 1871.

‡ Annual Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on the Commerce and Navigation of the United States for the Fiscal Year ended June 30, 1871.

Special Report on the Customs Tariff Legislation of the United States. With Appendices. By Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics.

Special Report on Immigration: Accompanying Information for Immigrants relative to the Prices and Rental of Land, the Simple Products, kind of Labour in Demand, &c. &c. in the Western and Southern States. To which are appended Tables showing the average weekly wages paid in the several States and Sections for Factory, Mechanical, and Farm Labour, the Cost of Provisions, Groceries, &c. &c. By Edward Young, Ph.D., Chief of the Bureau of Statistics. Washington: Government Printing Office. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

* The Underground Railroad; a Record of Facts, Authentic Narratives, Letters, &c., narrating the Hardships, Hairbreadth Escapes, and Death Struggles of Slaves in their Efforts after Freedom, as Related by Themselves or Others, or Witnessed by the Author. Together with Sketches of some of the largest Stockholders, and most Liberal Aiders and Adversers of the Bond. By William Still, for many years connected with the Anti-Slavery Office in Philadelphia, and Chairman of the Acting Vigilant Committee of the Philadelphia Branch of the Underground Railroad. Illustrated with 70 fine Engravings by Russell Sobell and others. Portraits from Photographs from Life. Sold only by Subscription. Philadelphia: Porter & Coates. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

during the year was about nine millions and a-half, of which more than six millions were foreign; and the real difference is, we suspect, greater still, the American shipping having a monopoly of the coasting trade, and clearing twice or three times as often as the foreign vessels. The imports are about 108 millions sterling, of which about five and a-half are re-exported; the exports of domestic produce about 107 millions. The explanation of this excess of exports probably lies in the large amount of American State, Federal, and Railway Bonds held in Europe, the interest on which is hidden in these figures. But for that, the foreign trade of the United States, as of other commercial countries, would show a balance of profit in the shape of a considerable excess of imports. The Report on the Customs contains a complete and very elaborate history of tariff legislation since the formation of the Union, including not only the Acts ultimately passed, but the discussions they provoked and the modifications they underwent in Congress. But of all these documents by far the most interesting is the Report on Immigration. This gives not only the statistics of immigration for the last fifty-three years, since the establishment of a permanent department in 1819, but very full and valuable information for the benefit of immigrants themselves, from which it would be easy to draw up in a single sheet octavo all that persons who think of seeking a home beyond the Atlantic could desire to know in order to the choice of a habitation. The most novel point of the statistical part of the Report is the proportion of female immigrants. This is smallest among the Chinese—7 per cent.; largest among the Irish—45 per cent.; and it amounts to 40 per cent. of the whole, a much larger proportion than the language commonly used by writers on the subject, and the current ideas of Americans themselves, would lead us to expect. Immigrants will find in this volume answers from the States to which emigration is now chiefly directed to questions regarding the prospects there offered to capital, to skilled and to unskilled industry; the price of land, the facility of obtaining it, cleared or uncleared; the terms on which farms may be rented, and their size; the condition of trade, manufactures, mining, agriculture, and the demand for every sort of labour, and they can at once fix their "objective point" accordingly.

Upon the scientific accuracy of Dr. Dana's statements respecting Corals and Coral Islands* we do not attempt, in this place, to pronounce; that his work is likely to be more popular than most accounts of the corals and coral polypes that we have seen, we have no doubt whatever. The drawings illustrate the text, and the text explains the drawings; and both, without being anywhere loose or slovenly, are simple and intelligible to the uninformed reader; popularizing, without vulgarizing, a most curious and interesting portion of natural history.

Dr. Prime's Sketches of Travel† will be more interesting to Americans than to Englishmen in proportion as the scenes on which, while journeying "round the world," he chiefly dwells, are more familiar to Englishmen than to Americans. And there is a tendency, here and there, to be "smart," which is perhaps less disagreeable to our Transatlantic kinsmen than to most of ourselves. Apart from this fault of style, the author's language is generally simple and well chosen, and his observations, if not very original, are quick and practical. To English readers they have now and then a flavour of novelty, as coming from a visitor who sees everything from a somewhat different point of view from our own. In this respect the part of the volume which relates the author's somewhat hasty visit to the North-Western provinces of India is perhaps the most noteworthy; on other grounds the accounts of California and Japan are the most readable. But extreme hurry, and the utter absence of leisure to observe carefully or closely, deprive the work of all merit beyond that of the merest journal of travel; it is one which may be read once with some pleasure, but which nobody would dream of keeping, or reading again.

Dr. Chadbourne's lectures on Instinct‡ deserve attentive perusal, and at least a passing consideration. They contain no new facts on the subject, and broach no very startling theories; on the contrary, the writer inclines rather to the obvious and orthodox view which ascribes nearly all the habitual acts of animals to pure instinct, but admits that the higher among them, at least, do reason upon occasion. But the value of the book lies in the clearness with which the bearing of perfectly familiar truths upon each other and upon the current controversies of the day is perceived and brought to light; and in the distinctness with which the entire system of physical life is conceived and displayed as a whole. Among the many replies which Mr. Darwin's works have called forth, scarcely any has appeared to us to suggest more real and serious difficulties in the way of his theory of development; difficulties not technical merely or negative, not merely indicating defects of evidence or argument here and there, but pointing out how much the theory fails to explain, how much appears to conflict with it; how much, not merely in individual instances, but upon the whole, the system of nature presents that does not seem to harmonize with that view. Among the most remarkable passages in this unpretending volume is that on the physical tendencies of plants which seem to fulfil the part played by instinct in the animal world; and scarcely less interesting are some suggestions of instances in which creatures have acquired organs or habits which appear not only not to be directed to their own good, but actually to injure them for the benefit of others—instances which, if valid, must, as Mr. Darwin himself admits, compel him to reconsider his theory. Altogether, for so short and popular a work, the lectures possess very unusual interest and suggestiveness.

Dr. Moffat publishes the first part of A Comparative History of Religions* in the shape of a comparison of Ancient Scriptures—Hindoo, Egyptian, Assyrian, Persian, Hebrew, &c.—the very size and form of which suggests that the author is hardly alive to the magnitude of the task he has undertaken. The principal point made in the present volume is that in all or nearly all cases the earliest accessible records of religion appear to indicate that polytheism was preceded by and developed out of monotheism; an apparent paradox which the author defends with a variety of plausible arguments.

Mr. Henry Dunster †, whose biography is now written and published for the first time, was born about 1612, and was in middle life the first President of Harvard College. He fled from England to avoid the persecution to which Nonconformists were subjected in 1639-40; and found that he had escaped from the frying-pan into the fire. The Pilgrim Fathers of New England, whom poets and historians have so wildly misrepresented, hated freedom of conscience with a hatred far more virulent and personal than was shown by Laud or Charles. The last thing that they dreamt of allowing to any man out of their own fold was that "freedom to worship God" which their panegyrists have represented as their object; and the latter portion of the present volume is a history of the persecution suffered by Mr. Dunster when he ventured to pronounce himself a Baptist—persecution which drove him from Harvard and from Massachusetts. Some earlier passages display a curious mixture of simplicity and superstition, sense and fanaticism.

The Report of the American Board of Foreign Missions ‡ (Congregationalist) possesses a somewhat limited and special interest, but contains a good deal of incidental information—of course, from a professional point of view—concerning the organization and working of missionary institutions.

Among the works of fiction on our list for this month are two the authorship of which will to many readers be a sufficient recommendation, and one whose title vouches for its containing much that is curious and a good deal that is unpleasant. The last is entitled "Five Hundred Majority," § and is a description of the reign and downfall of the famous Tammany Ring. The others are both collections of short tales; one by Mrs. Stowe, under the title of Old Town Fireside Stories ||, which is much what the name will suggest to the readers of Mrs. Stowe's later works; the other called Beauty and the Beast, and Tales of Home ¶, by Bayard Taylor. The first of the series is a romance the scene of which is laid in Russia; the rest are tales of American life. Mr. Taylor is also the author of a very singular poem, entitled the Manque of the Gods **, in which all the chief objects of human worship are speakers; all, with the exception of the Mahometan deity, being regarded not as names of the Supreme Being, but as distinct entities of different rank and character. Names are thus introduced which few persons will like to see in such a connexion. For the rest, the poem is at least remarkable, and in some passages powerful and suggestive. Dana's Household Book of Poetry †† contains some really choice selections, many of them old favourites, and is perhaps as useful a drawing-room ornament as a volume of the sort is likely to be.

* A Comparative History of Religions. By James C. Moffat, D.D., Professor in the Theological Seminary at Princeton. Part I.—Ancient Scriptures. New York: Dodd & Mead. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1871.

† Life of Henry Dunster, First President of Harvard College. By Rev. Jeremiah Chaplin, D.D. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

‡ Sixty-first Annual Report of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, Presented at the Meeting held at Salem, Mass., Oct. 3-6, 1871. Boston: Printed at the Riverside Press, Cambridge. London: Trübner & Co. 1871.

§ Putnam's Library of Choice Books. Five Hundred Majority, or the Days of Tammany. By Wyllis Wiles. New York: Putnam & Sons. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

|| Old Town Fireside Stories. By Harriet Beecher Stowe. With Illustrations. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

¶ Beauty and the Beast, and Tales of Home. By Bayard Taylor. New York: Putnam & Sons. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

** The Manque of the Gods. By Bayard Taylor. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

†† The Household Book of Poetry. Collected and Edited by Charles A. Dana. New York: Appleton & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country through any Newagent, on the day of publication.

* Corals and Coral Islands. By James D. Dana, LL.D., Professor of Geology and Mineralogy in Yale College, &c. &c. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

† Around the World: Sketches of Travel Through Many Lands and Over Many Seas. By E. G. D. Prime, D.D. New York: Harper & Brothers. London: Sampson Low & Co.

‡ Lowell Lectures, 1871: Instinct, its Office in the Animal Kingdom, and its Relation to the Higher Powers in Man. By P. A. Chadbourne, LL.D., Author of "Relations of Natural History," "Natural Theology," &c., &c. New York: Putnam & Sons. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

IMPORTANT TO INVESTORS in BRITISH and FOREIGN MINES, RAILWAY STOCKS, and other SECURITIES of all countries. At the rate of 5, 10, and 15 per cent. Consult MR. JOHN A. HARRINGTON, at 110 Broadway, New York, for full particulars of the NEW YORK INVESTMENT, sent free by mail on application to JOHN A. HARRINGTON, at 110 Broadway, New York. Dealer, 70 and 71 Bishopsgate Street, London, E.C. Agents, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885,

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 866, Vol. 33.

June 1, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE WASHINGTON TREATY.

AFTER many desperate efforts on the part of both players, the shuttlecock of the Washington Treaty seems at last about to fall to the ground. The motive of the recent exertions was not discreditable, but the game had for some time past visibly tended to a collapse. The telegraphic correspondence between Mr. FISH and General SCHENCK proves that the American Government was from the first determined to make no substantial concession. Some passages in the letters are in themselves not a little surprising. General SCHENCK informs the SECRETARY OF STATE that the English Government has been chiefly influenced by an unwillingness on the part of Mr. GLADSTONE to seem to relinquish the extreme position which he took as to the interpretation of the Treaty, and by a reluctance to accept any rule to limit claims against neutrals in future. In England Mr. GLADSTONE has generally been suspected of an undue eagerness to make concessions; but it is of course possible that the general impression may have been unfounded. General SCHENCK's belief that the English nation or Government wished to reserve the contingent right of imitating Mr. SUMNER is one of those misconceptions which almost seem to show that international understandings are impossible. In an earlier part of the correspondence Mr. FISH makes the astonishing statement that neither in the Case presented at Geneva nor in the instructions to General SCHENCK did the American Government ask for pecuniary damages on account of the indirect claims. The Case in the plainest language contains the claim for the costs of the war after Gettysburg, or for such part of the costs as the Tribunal may consider just, with interest in either case from the same date at seven per cent. It was impossible to reconcile the resolution of the American Government with the withdrawal of the claims. It is barely possible that, if the Supplementary Article had been ratified by both Governments, with or without modifications, the arbitration might have escaped further miscarriage; but as soon as it was announced that the Senate had introduced amendments into the draft of the Article, it was justly assumed that their object must have been to obtain some verbal recognition of the disputed claims. The original Article had excited many misgivings in England, because the condemnation of the mode of extortion under consideration was strictly confined to the future. The PRESIDENT was to undertake to make no claim at Geneva; but it would have been undoubtedly contended that the claim had already been made. It is now scarcely worth while to inquire whether a virtual retraction of the demand would have been too dearly purchased by connivance at an ambiguous phrase. To an English judgment it seems that it would have been a more dignified course simply to withdraw the indirect claims; nor can it be said that the harshest criticism of the proposed contrivance is not fully justified. General SCHENCK's device, which probably originated in instructions from his Government, was in the highest degree anomalous; but the American Government seemed not to appreciate the inconsistency of the two recitals that the Treaty covers claims for indirect damages, and that the PRESIDENT nevertheless holds that they are in principle inadmissible. It seemed odd that England, after consistently protesting against every demand of the kind, should be required formally to disavow a doctrine which it appears was preferred by the United States with full knowledge of its unsoundness; but when a pertinacious opponent unexpectedly yields, it is expedient to make some sacrifice for the purpose of covering his retreat. Although there was reason to fear that some attempt would still have been made to submit the claims to the Tribunal, even Mr. BASCOMB DAVIS would have been embarrassed by an official confession that his demand was essentially unjust. It could not be expected that the English Government would assent to the use of any phrase which would plainly admit of the presentation of the claims. Fear of the supervision of the House of Commons would alone have prevented any concession which might have been inconsistent with Mr. GLADSTONE's repeated assurances. The objections to General SCHENCK's contrivance which are suggested by American journals are more whimsical than the Supplementary Article itself. It is a mere figure of speech to allege that his ingenious project was dictated by the English Government. A still more surprising proof of Lord GRANVILLE's malignant cunning has been exposed by the New York World. It seems that the Machiavellian Minister has, for the purpose of entangling the United States in future liabilities, allowed the demand for the expense of watching the Confederate cruisers to be included among the direct claims. It is perfectly true that the demand is utterly remote and consequential; but the classification was due to the acuteness of the American Commissioners. It now appears, if the World is correctly informed, that the claims by owners or freighters of captured vessels will amount to 3,000,000*l.*, which will, as is admitted, collapse on examination into a fourth of the amount. The claims for the expenses of the American navy are estimated at an enormous sum, and the framers of the celebrated Case are perfectly capable of repeating at sea the demand which they made on account of the expenses supposed to have been incurred on land. Lord GRANVILLE is accused of having countenanced the attempt at extortion for the remote purpose of making a still larger claim on the United States in the event of a future war in which America may be neutral. A more improbable charge was never made against a lamb by the most unscrupulous of wolves.

Mr. BERNARD's Oxford lecture on the Treaty, though it amazes Mr. DISRAELI, is the most comprehensive account of the Washington negotiations which has been hitherto published. It was impossible that his apology for the obscure wording of the Treaty should be absolutely complete, especially as he prudently refrained from corroborating Sir S. NORTH-COTE's unseasonable revelation. It was no part of Mr. BERNARD's plan to mention the services which he had rendered to the country since the conclusion of the Treaty. The English Case and Counter-case are models of clear and convincing reasoning and of lucid statement, and it may be conjectured that Mr. BERNARD has also had a share in the preparation of Lord GRANVILLE's admirable despatches on the recent controversy. It is difficult to understand how even American politicians, though, as Mr. BERNARD temperately states, they are somewhat unreasonable, can fail to be satisfied with Lord GRANVILLE's detailed demonstration that the demand for consequential damages was never included among the "Alabama Claims." It is true that the PRESIDENT and the SECRETARY OF STATE, who now hold that all demands of the kind are unjust, had in Mr. FISH's well-known despatch to Lord CLARENDON fully adopted Mr. SUMNER's audacious figment; but neither Mr. FISH nor his predecessor at any time preferred any claim on account of the pretended damages. Mr. BERNARD confirms Lord GRANVILLE's statement that one of the reasons for waiving the Fenian claims was that they would to some extent have been indirect and constructive. It is evident that demands for compensation of private persons who may have been injured by the Fenian invaders would have been strictly analogous to the genuine Alabama Claims; and the English Commissioners would have been ill advised in preferring any demand on behalf of the Canadian Government. The best excuse for the omission is that the Fenian outrages had not been mentioned in the previous correspondence between the Governments.

When the English Government declined to assent to the alterations proposed by the Senate, there could be little doubt of the result of the negotiation. The unpopularity of the PRESIDENT's last attempt to save the Treaty had been plainly indicated by the abstinence of a considerable number of Senators from voting; and several of the most important journals denounced in violent language the moderate concession which they described as a surrender. It was nearly certain that any further advance towards conciliation would be deemed wholly inadmissible. The question whether the failure of the Treaty will affect the chances of the re-election of the PRESIDENT concerns only the citizens of the United States. The disappointment of the hopes which had been entertained is exclusively due to himself, or rather to his advisers. The intemperate language of the American Case was perhaps attributable to bad taste and feeling rather than to an error in judgment. The sharp practice of introducing the claim for consequential damages was the result of an unlucky afterthought. The greatest mistake of all was the obstinate refusal to correct the blunder when it had been courteously pointed out by the English Government. There is reason to believe that the American people will be seriously disappointed, and no community is more capable of feeling the discredit in which it has been involved by its Government. The inflated claims for direct damages, though they have now become unimportant, indicate the tone and temper in which the American agents set about the task of arranging an amicable settlement of the controversy. If there are any Americans who wish to understand the consequences of the manner in which the litigation has been managed, it may be worthy of their attention that, for the first time within living memory, there is at present no American party in England.

The effect of the abandonment of the Treaty on the position of the English Government cannot be confidently foretold. The disapprobation which was caused by the discovery that the English Commissioners had been overreached has been in the course of six months discounted and exhausted. To the subsequent efforts which have been made to procure the retraction of the indirect claims both Houses of Parliament are in some sense parties; and Lord GRANVILLE's correspondence with Mr. FISH may defy hostile criticism. The pledge that the disputed claims should not be submitted to the Tribunal at Geneva has been faithfully redeemed; and it may be held with some reason that, if the Washington Treaty has broken down, no other attempt at negotiation could possibly have succeeded. Many Englishmen, influenced either by characteristic distrust of themselves and their Government, or by the confident assertions of the Americans, had since the war supposed that the complaints and accusations which were so persistently repeated must have had a solid foundation. The discussions of the last year have thrown light on the true history of English neutrality; and sensitive consciences have been quieted by the apology which was made in respect of a consideration which has ultimately failed. In the recent dispute no American whose opinion is of the smallest value affects to think that his Government was in the right. The point of honour which seems to consist in a resolute maintenance of wrong once committed is not founded on any rule of morality or good sense. Whatever may be the future fate of the Alabama controversy, the indirect claims are dead and buried; and if the American Government refuses to recour to the project of arbitration, the fault will rest exclusively with itself. It must be a mortifying reflection to the PRESIDENT that, if the preparation of the Case had been entrusted to a prudent and courteous lawyer, or if the PRESIDENT himself had possessed sufficient moral courage to overrule the unreasonable sharpness of his agent, the principal achievement of his administration would not have resulted in failure.

GERMANY.

THE East of Europe is always just enough disturbed to keep Germany on the alert, although it is at present quiet enough to let the attention of Germans remain concentrated on their great struggle with their ecclesiastical enemies. The hot ashes of discord are always slumbering under a very thin covering of earth in the wild regions which border the Lower Danube, and peace only prevails because the great Powers choose that it shall prevail. The Emperor of AUSTRIA has lately been making a tour in his remote South-Eastern provinces, and Germans have noticed with some indignation that the petty sovereigns of Roumania and Servia have not paid him any of the attention which custom prescribes when so great a person comes near the borders of little princes. The wrongs of the Jews of Roumania have also attracted the notice, and caused the condemnation of the Imperial Parliament of Germany; and although the Committee to which the matter was first referred counselled prudence, and strongly hinted at the folly of interfering in the internal affairs of foreign countries, yet the Chamber was not to be restrained, but vindicated its right to take cognizance of the victims of Roumanian bigotry on the ground that Roumania was under the guarantee of the great Powers, or at least was indebted to them for its separate political existence, and that Germany was entitled to see that it was not disgraced by the acts of those whom it had been a party to entrusting with the power they abused. It is obvious that if Germany is to remonstrate on this ground, it may add interference to remonstrance, and then a collision with Russia might easily begin. If either Russia or Germany wished to stir up the Danubian question neither would have any difficulty in doing so; and all that can be said is that for the moment the Governments of the two countries are desirous that everything shall be kept as quiet as possible. Prince BISMARCK lately refused to offer any opinion on the SULTAN's proposal to make a change in the line of Turkish succession, on the ground that Germany did not concern itself with Eastern questions; while, on the other hand, it was noticed that the Russian journals which ordinarily stimulate the Roumanians and Servians into the course of danger and offence have lately been entirely silent as to the proceedings of those badly behaved little countries. Still it must always be kept in mind, when Germany is under discussion, that she has perpetually three causes of anxiety, the pressure of which may be now less and now greater, but never ceases altogether. She has to think of the Danube and Russia, of France, and of the Papacy. Fortunately for her, she is encountering the last of those three hostile influences just at a moment when she is under remarkably little anxiety about the other two; and it may be that so evident a fact will strike her present adversaries as not unimportant, and that they will try to compromise matters for the present, and let things go on without any open rupture until a more favourable crisis arises, and either France or Russia is beginning to give Germany serious trouble. Meanwhile the German Government seems determined to show that it is not afraid of Rome, and that if the State is challenged by the Church, the State will use the weapons at its command. A German Bishop whose spiritual functions are more immediately connected with the army announced within the last few days, under special orders from Rome, that he would excommunicate a priest if he continued to celebrate divine service in a building in which at other times some of the Old Catholics were permitted to assemble. The German Government has replied by treating this threat of excommunication as an infraction of military discipline, the Bishop being in some way attached to the army, has suspended him from the discharge of his functions, and informed him that it will hold a formal inquiry into his conduct. As the circumstances of the case were peculiar on account of the Bishop's semi-military position, it is possible that no serious question between the Government and the Church may arise out of it. But such a question must arise somewhere and somehow very shortly. On every side the same perpetual cause of difference and quarrel exists. The Bishop of STRASBURG recently declined to be present at the ceremony of opening the Strasburg University if Dr. DÖLLINGER was suffered to attend. The Government gave way, and bought the sanction of the Bishop's presence at this price, for it was ready to endure any temporary inconvenience rather than that the opening of the University in its new German character should be a failure. But it is not likely to yield again, and unless Rome withdraws from the conflict in order to wait for a more propitious moment, the differences between Rome and Germany can scarcely fail to assume within a very short time a most serious character.

The opening of the University of Strasburg was made as grand an affair as possible, and everything has been done to show the intentions of the Government to make the new home of German intellect brilliant and famous. Professors of the highest eminence have been engaged, Germans from all parts of the Fatherland have begun to flock there, and the Alsatians will at last, in the fulness of time, have an opportunity of discovering what Geist really means. Even their warmest friends represent them as eminently suited by nature and habits to illustrate the immense difference which the discovery may make in the human intellect. But the Alsatians, if not very clever, are shrewd enough to understand which side of their bread is buttered, and the butter is being laid on very thick on the German side. The French indemnity is flowing like a golden river into the conquest provinces. They are in the first place to receive about six millions sterling to compensate them for their losses. Strasburg will rise up from its ashes fairer and grander than ever, and it is not in the heart of man not to see some merit in officials who have got six millions of money to distribute. The mere thought of such a sum suggests a vista of the most brilliant jobs, and there is no knowing how many good turns can be done under such circumstances by those in authority to prudent men who reveal that they have true German hearts beating under their homely exteriors. In the next place, two millions of money are to be devoted to replenishing the rolling-stock on the railways in German Lorraine and Alsace, and although the main purpose of the grant may be to put the lines in first-rate order for strategic purposes, the riches of the district can scarcely fail to be increased by the consequent development of internal communications. The upper and the higher middle classes, especially in the towns, may probably for a long time hold themselves aloof from Germany. The new Rector of the University is a Protestant, and the Protestants have long been in Alsace, not only a small minority, but a minority bullied and trampled on in a thousand petty ways during the period of license accorded to Catholic ecclesiastics in the days of the Second Empire. The majority of the population may therefore, so far as it is influenced by religious animosities, regard the new order of things as strangely out of the proper course, and the higher centres of provincial life will no doubt have their standing distaste for everything German heightened by religious feeling. Two measures also on which the Germans have thought proper to insist will naturally heighten this hostility to the new government. Every young Alsatian who after a certain date chooses to stay in his native province will have to serve in the German army, and no one will be suffered to hold land in Alsace who is not a German citizen. Those, therefore, who do not wish to see their sons serving in the ranks of the enemy, and who cannot bear to forego their French citizenship, will have to sell their land and bid adieu to the province. On many persons of sensitive minds this necessity will fall as a great hardship, and it is impossible that there should be any good will to Germany in families on whom this bitter choice is imposed, and who feel its bitterness. But the mass of the population will probably make no difficulty whatever, and will go on holding their land as cheerfully under one Government as under another, and will console themselves for the burden of German military service by the obvious reflection that, if men must fight, it is a great satisfaction to fight on the strongest and safest side.

That the side of Germany shall continue to be the strongest and safest is an object of which the German Government never loses sight for a moment. Besides the sum of six millions devoted to making good the losses of the newly annexed provinces, another sum of six millions is to be laid out in improving and arming the fortresses of Alsace and Lorraine. The fortifications of Metz are not up to the high standard on which the new possessors of the great stronghold insist; and there will be plenty of French money available for the purpose of making Metz all that it should be to prevent France from ever regaining it. The numbers of the German army are also to be rapidly and largely increased. A new battalion of a thousand men is to be added to each of the 148 German regiments, so that Germany will have an army on the war footing of nearly six hundred thousand infantry, whereas the French Government only proposes to have a little over four hundred thousand. This increase in the German army has been obtained not only by making a greater call generally on the population, but by North Germany having persuaded South Germany to provide its proportional number of troops. Here, again, the French indemnity is found to be doing its work. In the late war the number of the Southern troops was not in proportion to the population, and in the distribution of the indemnity the obviously fair course to take was to give grants to the different Governments in proportion to the sacrifices they had actually made. But it was thought prudent to animate the lagging spirits of the South by a gentle and skilfully administered bribe. A portion of the indemnity is to be distributed not in accordance with services rendered in the late war, but in accordance with the total of the population. South Germany will thus get, it is reckoned, about a million sterling more than it ought properly to do, and with this encouragement South Germany is ready to set earnestly to work and to send the due number of men into the ranks of the national army. The Germans are too wise to spend very much of their newly found wealth in the construction of a navy of the first class. But they think they may at least go so far as to provide for their security in the North Sea and the Baltic, and to have in readiness a sufficient number of ships of war to protect their commerce in distant quarters of the globe, and especially in the Asiatic seas. Their trade in that part of the world is as yet inconsiderable; but they are exactly the men, if they ever get a foothold in China or Japan, to keep it; for they can get a farthing out of a six-penny bargain as no other Europeans can, they always keep their minds alive, and they are perfectly indifferent to the charms of the dangerous and exciting pursuit of religious proselytism. It is impossible to estimate in how many strange and indirect ways the strength and wealth of Germany will have been increased by the result of the French war, and by the payment of the French indemnity. But some rough notion of the general result may be obtained if we do nothing more than notice what is direct, obvious, and unmistakable. The money wrung out of France will be used in the first place to make Germany better able than ever to fight France, and in the next place it cannot fail to be used to lighten the burdens of the German taxpayers. When a French war of revenge is talked of, it must not be forgotten that the indemnity which will, during peace, make the French taxpayer pay more, will also make the German taxpayer pay less; and so far as wealth is an element in military success, this difference will be continually and silently operating in favour of Germany.

THE BALLOT BILL.

THE Ballot Bill has got through the House of Commons, but not by any means in a triumphant manner. So doubtful seemed the judgment of the House that the SPEAKER declared that the Noes had it when the third reading was put to the vote, and on a division being taken the Ministerial majority had dwindled down to fifty-eight. This is a conspicuous falling off in comparison with the majorities by which the Government carried its Bills in the early part of its career. It now remains for the House of Lords to decide whether the Bill shall become law; and anticipations were freely offered in the Commons as to the course which the Lords will think it advisable to take. Those Liberals who complain that the Bill is not nearly stringent enough, and those Conservatives who really dislike the Bill, hoped that the Lords would reject it, and of course they prophesied that what they hoped would come to pass. Mr. FORSTER, on the other hand, confidently foretold that the Lords would regard this as a Bill which especially concerned the Commons; and as the constituencies, as represented by the Commons, had pronounced a wish for it, the Lords would scarcely think it within their proper constitutional sphere to throw out a measure coming before them under such circumstances. The standing arguments for and against the Bill were naturally repeated on the occasion of the third reading, but there was no possibility of adding anything new on a subject worn so threadbare. If the Lords listened only to those arguments by which they were most convinced, there can be little doubt that they would refuse to pass the Bill; and it is probable that there would be very little irritation against them in the country if they chose to take a course which the Constitution leaves it perfectly open to them to take. But the Lords will have other things to think of than the arguments for and against the measure that will be offered to them. The majority of the peers are Conservatives, and it is very doubtful whether the Conservatives are seriously opposed to the Bill. They think that under it they will gain more in the boroughs than they will lose in the counties. Mr. FORSTER adverted on Thursday night to the strange silence preserved by Mr. DISRAELI and Mr. GATMORNE HANBY with regard to the Ballot in their late manifestoes of Conservative opinion, and neither of these leaders of the party had a word to say against the Bill on Thursday night. It was thought sufficient to put Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE up to denounce the measure, and this certainly indicated a considerable amount of indifference on the part of the Conservatives as to the fate of the measure. The Conservative peers may, therefore, not improbably make just enough show of opposition to it to appear to be maintaining the principles of their party, and to throw the entire responsibility on their opponents, if it should prove that the Bill is a failure, or if it should be very unpopular in its working. The Conservatives have also cogent reasons to let the Bill pass in the Lords arising from their reluctance to bring on a Ministerial crisis this Session. The most obvious ground for rejecting it lies in the doubt which may be expressed as to the real wishes of the constituencies. If on this ground the Bill were rejected, the Ministry could hardly stay in office unless they dissolved, for they could not carry on the administration of affairs with any credit unless they were prepared to try their fate with another Ballot Bill next Session, and next year the argument that the constituencies should be consulted would have as much force as it can have this year. But the Conservatives neither wish to come into office nor to have a dissolution this year. Time, they think, is telling in their favour, and they want the Ministry to go on blundering, and the constituencies to go silently through the process of conversion for some time longer. The Ballot Bill may, therefore, not improbably pass, not because the Lords will approve of it, but because the Conservative party is willing to take its chance under its provisions, and because it will not suit that party to precipitate a crisis at present. These are not very high reasons for sanctioning a great constitutional change, but they are reasons of a kind which tells with unmistakable force in practical life.

An attempt was made in the Commons to alter that portion of the Bill which provides that persons who have obtained from a magistrate a certificate that they have declared before him their inability to read may call on the returning officer to record their vote for them, in the presence of the agents of the candidates. Mr. FORSTER insisted that the Bill should remain unaltered in this respect, both because it was impossible that at that late stage a provision which had been framed on an understanding between the Government and the Opposition should be upset, and also because, in his opinion, the provision would remain almost entirely a dead letter. Voters, he argued, will not like to take the trouble to go before a magistrate, and will be ashamed to declare that they cannot read. They may very easily learn how to vote without being able to read, for they have only to be told and to remember whereabouts in the list of candidates the name of the candidate for whom they wish to vote is to be found. In ordinary constituencies, and where the voters are left alone, this would probably be true. There is very little amusement in voting, and most voters who cannot read are men who care no more who has their votes than they care who is Emperor of Russia. Going before a magistrate is in their view a tedious and distasteful process, attended in many instances with painful recollections. A poor man would naturally avoid taking so much trouble to attain such a useless end as that of recording his vote for a member of Parliament, and if we are to confine ourselves to exceptional cases, and to think only of stern determined working-men, who, although totally uneducated, are burning with political fire, and would submit to any inconvenience in order to record their political opinions at the polling-booth, it is hardly possible to suppose that men of minds so unusually active and enlightened could not attain the art of setting their mark against the name of a candidate in a list. A few minutes' study would suffice to make them distinguish between the picture of one name and the picture of another name, and they would see and note in what place of the paper the name stood of their favourite candidate. But there can be no doubt that in some constituencies where bribery or intimidation was being actively carried on, the voter might be given to understand that to declare his inability to vote was part of the bargain that was being made with him, or part of the course of conduct into which he was being driven. It is impossible to deny that, if an ignorant man is bribed, and the briber tells him that, in order to get the money, he must go before a magistrate and get a certificate, and that then his vote is recorded in the presence of the agents, the check which the Bill affects to put on bribery is totally inoperative so far as he is concerned. All that can be said on the other side is that if in this case the good of the Bill would be at an end, so also would its mischief. For if no poor men took the trouble to go before a magistrate unless they were bribed, and if it was known how they voted, the agent of the landlord for whom they did not vote would know exactly who had been bribed, and could tell how to go to work in order to get up a petition with a fair chance of success.

Mr. FORSTER exerted himself to show that the notion so widely prevailing in and out of the House that the Bill allows the voter to show his voting-paper is a delusion. The complaints against the Bill, grounded on the assumption that it after all does not provide for secret voting, are for the most part unfounded. Whether the system of secret voting is a good or a bad thing, it is obvious that a Bill which affects to provide for secret voting ought to provide for it. If voters were permitted to show their voting-papers to the agents after they had marked them, the Ballot Bill would be a complete sham. But the Bill as it stands permits nothing of the kind. It expressly provides that the elector, after he has marked his ballot-paper, shall fold it up so as to conceal his vote, and shall then put his ballot-paper so folded up into the ballot-box. In order that the objects of the Bill should be defeated, the agent must stipulate that the voter shall disregard this rule, and shall so display his paper that the agent may see how he has voted. There must be two parties to the transaction. The voter must display the paper and the agent must see what is thus revealed. Supposing this were done, how would the two parties stand? The voter would, as Mr. FORSTER declares, be liable to be indicted for a misdemeanour for the wilful violation of a statute, and the Bill itself provides that the agent should be liable for his share in the transaction to six months' imprisonment. Mr. FORSTER owns that the law would be very self-dom put in force against the voter, and there would be innumerable practical difficulties in the way of getting a conviction against him under such circumstances. Still the mere knowledge of the fact that the law tells them clearly what to do, and can in some vague and mysterious way get at them if they will not do what it tells them to do, will operate most powerfully on the minds of voters. The law says they are to fold up their papers so as to conceal their vote, and they will so fold them up. The presiding officer will be there to direct them that they must act in the prescribed way, and the agents will keep him up to his duty. If one agent wants papers to be shown, the other agent will want them not to be shown, and one or the other will be always there ready to protest against any violation of the law, and will call on the presiding officer to tell the voter to fold his paper up properly. But it is not only the voter that is to be considered. The agent who induces him to show the paper will be liable to a punishment which a person in the position of an agent would feel very severely. A solicitor or a solicitor's clerk would very much dislike six months' imprisonment. He would be very reluctant to undergo the risk of such a punishment if he thought there was any chance of the offence being brought home to him. But the transaction could not fail to be a very marked one. A hundred voters would vote as they ought to do, then would come one man who, in spite of the directions of the presiding officer, would hold up his marked paper so conspicuously that the agents and every one present could see how he had voted. The agent of the candidate for whom the vote was not given would immediately know, and so would the presiding officer, that this strange and exceptional conduct could only be attributed to the voter having acted under the influence of the agent of the candidate for whom the vote had been given. This agent would thenceforth remain in the polling-booth in the position of a person who is known by a watchful enemy and by a public officer to have committed an offence for which, if it can be proved against him, he may next day be sent to prison. It is impossible to believe that such a risk would be run with frequency or impunity sufficient to detract in any material degree from the efficacy of the Bill.

THE SULTAN'S SPEECH.

ALTHOUGH Eastern questions have during living memory occupied their full share of attention, the Sovereign of Turkey still retains in popular imagination something of the picturesqueness which belonged to his half-barbaric ancestors. That the GRAND SIGNIOR should make a solemn visit to the Porte which has given its name to his Government is strictly conformable to ancient usage; but the illusion is disturbed when the Court newsmen state that the SULTAN arrived like any ordinary Christian Prince in a State carriage and four, attended by a brilliant suite. The Ministers who received him were properly headed by the GRAND VIZIER; but the Report of the Council of State was probably a prosaic document. The SULTAN himself afterwards shocked or dispelled all established associations by delivering a speech from the throne which might have been composed by the most businesslike of European Ministers. There can be no better proof of the soundness of political and economical commonplaces than the fact that they are adopted and reproduced by the Great Turk himself. It is possible that in his dominions they acquire a certain freshness and novelty which they have lost in the West. Except that the GRAND VIZIER surpasses Mr. GLADSTONE in clearness and vigour of style, the SULTAN's reference to his relations with Foreign Powers might have been copied word for word from any annual QUEEN'S Speech. There is perhaps a more definite meaning in the expression of a wish that all the subjects of the Empire, without exception, should enjoy perfect equality before the law. In former times it would have been thought strange that the representative of the Prophet should proclaim the equality of Christians with Muslimans; and there is even now no Turkish province in which the SULTAN's theory is reduced to practice. The harshness and injustice which still prevail cause reasonable discontent; but it is much that the equal rights of the Christian population are even nominally acknowledged. A great social and political change is indicated by the SULTAN's recommendation that every man should respect the feelings of his neighbour. Such language must jar on the susceptibilities of Mahomedan orthodoxy, not the less because it implies a recognition of the power of the subject races. General platitudes seldom coincide with facts, but they prove that it is thought worth while to enunciate them. Absolute monarchs have exceptional facilities in abrogating invidious distinctions among their subjects. The regeneration of Turkey may perhaps not be capable of accomplishment by peaceful methods; but under a Parliamentary constitution it would be altogether impossible. The representatives of Turks and of Rayahs would be more hopelessly divided than Irish Orangemen and Catholics. Both parties may perhaps in some degree respect the will of the SULTAN.

The only Turkish department which is mentioned as satisfactory is the naval and military administration. It may be hoped that no early opportunity will arise for testing the soundness of the SULTAN's complacent judgment of the state of the army and navy. There is no doubt that since the Crimean war great efforts have been made to improve the strength of the Turkish armaments. The land forces are far more numerous than at any time since the destruction of the Janissaries, and their efficiency has increased in a still higher degree. The navy has attained respectable dimensions; it includes some ironclad vessels constructed after the best models; and it is commanded by an English officer. The Turkish soldiers are naturally among the best in the world, but there is no middle or upper class to furnish a supply of competent officers; and it is a still graver evil that in the European provinces of the Empire recruits are raised only among the minority of the population. Until it becomes prudent and practicable to subject the Rayahs to military service there will be a difficulty in filling the ranks of the army, and the relative numbers of Mahomedans will have a tendency to decline. For the present Turkey is probably better able than at any former time to repel an invader, and there is a reasonable prospect of a further interval before any fresh aggression will be attempted. Since the English surrender of the stipulations which had been exacted from Russia in 1856 the relations between Turkey and Russia have been ostensibly friendly, although the SULTAN and his Ministers fully understand the purpose of the Russian Government in creating a fleet in the Black Sea and in restoring Sebastopol. The SULTAN's design of substituting direct hereditary succession to the throne for the Ottoman custom of preferring brothers to sons appears to be countenanced by Russia; and the ostentatious patronage of the Prince of SERBIA by the Emperor ALEXANDER may perhaps be suggested by similar motives, though it is less easy to reconcile with the friendly professions of Russia. The "existing treaties and international right" on which the SULTAN professes to rely have lost the greater part of their value since the abandonment of the Treaty of Paris by England, and since the retirement of France from interference with Eastern politics; but as long as the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy retains any considerable strength there will be no immediate danger of a Russian invasion of European Turkey.

The financial parts of the SULTAN's speech are the most important, as well as the most Occidental and modern. The elements of civilization which are most eagerly assimilated are not the most beneficial. North-American Indians acquired the habit of drinking whisky with docile facility; and Turkish Governments learned to borrow with little thought of the methods by which the permanent resources of the country could be increased. When Turkish loans were first placed in the market the credit of the Empire was good; and even at the present day the public debt is not excessive as compared with the obligations of many other States; but the facility of borrowing has encouraged both a frequent resort to the confidence of capitalists, and a reckless expenditure, to which the SULTAN himself has personally contributed. The lavish waste of money in building superfluous palaces has tended to produce financial embarrassment; and at last the necessity of husbanding the public credit appears to be partially appreciated. The SULTAN is enabled to announce that judicious reductions have been accomplished, that the adoption of a system of economy has caused a reduction of the floating debt, and, finally, that the expenditure and revenue have been balanced. If he has been accurately informed, his new Ministers must have effected considerable improvements, and perhaps they may have abstained from the corrupt practices of their predecessors. It remains to be seen whether the SULTAN himself is capable of practising the moderate self-denial which would seem to involve no painful sacrifice. The author of the speech fully understands that financial success must rest on the material prosperity of the Empire. Long-continued neglect and misgovernment have produced the negative advantage of hoarding large portions of the national wealth. The effects of industry and enterprise applied after centuries of stagnation could not fail to be as satisfactory as a crop after a fallow. It seems that new roads have been constructed in some parts of the Empire, and "the recent modification of the convention relating to the Roumelian railways" will, it is said, insure their completion. If reasonable energy is displayed in the formation of roads and railways there is no reason why Turkey should not become one of the most productive regions of Europe. The process would be greatly accelerated if a part of the German or Italian emigration could be diverted from the United States and South America to nearer countries of equal fertility; but the Turkish Government, notwithstanding its acceptance of modern phrases and modes of thought, is still too backward to satisfy the demands of civilized settlers.

It is not the less true because it is an odd confession for an Oriental despot, that "all that has been done is incommensurate with the spirit of the age in which we live, and with the rapid progress by which it is characterized." Nothing can be further from the mind of the genuine old-fashioned Turk than a wish for progress either rapid or slow, or than respect for that which is vaguely called the spirit of the age; but Turkey is perhaps at present as progressive as Spain, and it is not distracted by the struggles of political factions. Since the suppression of the Cretan insurrection no civil war has disturbed any province of the Empire; and the Greek Government has at least temporarily discontinued its intrigues and encroachments. The greatest risk is perhaps on the side of Egypt; but there is no immediate reason to apprehend an interruption of the existing tranquillity. It is impossible to foresee the consequences which may follow from the unreserved adoption of European theories. Some political observers confidently assert that the Turkish Empire is irretrievably decayed, and that all pretences of reform are hypocritical and deceptive. It would be equally rash to express unqualified confidence in the professions of the SULTAN's speech; but it can scarcely be denied that the policy of the statesmen who have discouraged revolutionary projects has thus far been justified by experience. One half of the task of transformation has been accomplished when the Turkish Government has been induced to preach the doctrines of economy, of industry, of financial prudence, and of legal equality. If the enemies of Turkey had prevailed, the interval in which so many changes have been produced would have been occupied with foreign or civil war, which might perhaps have ended in the expulsion of the Turks from Europe. The liberated races would then have had leisure to prosecute their own rivalries, and to contrive a new scheme of political organization in the midst of excitement and agitation. A hundred years ago it would have been easy to prove that the anarchy of Poland tended to political dissolution, and the apologists of the partitioning Powers still justify on the same ground the spoliation of the Republic. The result of ambition and injustice has not been so favourable as to warrant a repetition of the experiment.

THE FRENCH ARMY BILL.

IF laments were of any avail, they might be freely uttered over the French Army Bill. It is the latest link in that long chain of evils which had for its starting point the despotism of the First NAPOLEON. Had it not been for the disabilities under which Prussia was placed after Jena, the Prussian army would probably never have existed in its present form, and the example of a nation in arms might not have been given to Europe. But the Prussian army was created, and any one who could have foreseen the strength of the weapon then forged might have foreseen the impossibility of its remaining without imitation. Those who most regret the necessity of making every citizen a soldier may be amongst those who are most convinced that it is a necessity. The mischiefs of the system are obvious enough, but the mischiefs of trusting to any other come nearer home. It is true that national armies formed on the German model are a terrible burden to industry. It is true that they accustom the population to the idea of war. It is true that they deprive small countries of the opportunity of making patriotism supply the place of size by maintaining an army of disproportionate strength. But it is true also that the nation which employs an army formed on the old model is at an immense disadvantage in the presence of these new engines. It is true that the idea of universal service has got possession of the popular imagination, and that in no other way would it be possible to induce a Continental nation to endure the sacrifices which are necessarily involved in the maintenance of a great army. An immediate duty to one's own country takes precedence of duties to mankind, and though the formation of each new army on this principle may be a new misfortune for the world, the fact that it is indispensable for the independence of the nation which forms it is paramount over all lesser considerations. It must be said, too, as regards France, that it is less of a misfortune there than anywhere else. Some of the evils to be feared from the adoption of the German system are already present in their full strength. France can hardly be more formidable to her neighbours than she has been under preceding army laws; and even an army in which every citizen is made to serve cannot well be more burdensome to the civil population than was the army of the First Empire. And there is a special reason why the experiment whether an army, framed on a smaller scale but perfect in organization and equipment, may not be superior to larger but less trained forces, should not be tried in France. The possession of such an instrument gives tremendous strength to an arbitrary Government or a military adventurer, and there is as yet no security that France may not at the next turn of the wheel become the victim of one or the other. Until the supremacy of the civil power is undisputed, a national, as distinguished from a purely professional, army is perhaps the best protection from coups d'état of all kinds that the country can hope for.

The political interest of the debate in the Assembly turns on two points—the reconciliation between M. THIERS and the majority, and the speech of the Duke of AUMALE. It seems certain that the PRESIDENT has yielded to the Assembly upon the main question, and has accepted a reduction of the term of service as a sufficient consideration for his acquiescence in the principle of universality. The motives of this surrender can at present only be guessed at. M. THIERS may have satisfied himself that on this point the Assembly would be immovable, and may consequently have forborne to threaten a resignation which, if accepted, would have left him no alternative except undignified surrender or unpatriotic retirement. Or he may have found his preference for a scheme that would operate more rapidly justified by the opposition of the German Government, and may have been reduced to accept the proposals of the Assembly rather than confess that his own project would have to be modified under foreign dictation. Or the sudden rise of M. D'AUDRIFFET-PASQUIER and the growing political reputation of General CHANZY may have warned him that he is less indispensable than formerly to the moderate sections of the Assembly. Whatever may be the considerations which have shaped his policy, it seems indisputable that the policy itself is more than ever to be one of conciliation. M. THIERS has given way on the composition of the Council of State as well as upon the Army Bill, and there is now nothing but the tax upon raw materials to divide him from the general Conservative majority in the Chamber. He may prove as pliable on this point as on the other two; or, which is more likely, the Assembly may feel that a bad tax can always be taken off, and that it is very much easier to reject the PRESIDENT's proposal than to find one which shall not be open to objections scarcely less serious. If it were not that clear skies have so often proved deceptive in political meteorology, there would be every reason to expect an interval of unusual calm in French politics.

The Duke of AUMALE wisely made but one political allusion in his speech, and the object of this was to dissociate himself, and by implication his family, from any suspicion of complicity with the reactionary tendencies of the Count of CHAMBORD. The manner in which he introduced the tricolour into his peroration, and characterized it as the symbol not only of victory but also of union and concord, was ingenious and happy. Now that the persistence of the Count of CHAMBORD has made an immediate fusion between Legitimists and Orleanists impossible, it was time for the leaders of the latter to show that in the recent negotiations they have abandoned none of their principles. Nothing could more clearly and yet more inoffensively demonstrate this than a reference to the national standard. It came in with perfect appropriateness in the course of a debate on army organization, and it made it clear that the Princes of ORLEANS have no interest in consulting the prejudices of the chief of the BOURBONS. Probably the Duke of AUMALE might have attacked Legitimist principles far more openly without exciting in the mind of the Count of CHAMBORD half the indignation which he will feel at this incidental repudiation of the Legitimist flag. The main purpose of the Duke's speech, as of that of General TROCHU the day before, was to popularise the notion of universal service. Considering how determined the Assembly has shown itself upon this point, this labour may seem to be superfluous. But the country has to be reconciled as well as the Assembly, and the speech of the Duke of AUMALE was as much addressed to the former as to the latter. He insisted with great reason on the necessity of making the prohibition of substitutes absolute if any effective check is to be placed on the process of shifting military liability to some one else's shoulders. It is not enough that every Frenchman shall be liable to serve. It is essential that every Frenchman shall actually serve. So long as this is enforced there is no sense of exceptional hardship. What each man has to bear is simply the common lot of all his fellows, and there is all the difference in the world between this and the common lot of the great majority of his fellows. If one man in ten thousand is allowed to buy a substitute, the escape from military service will assume the form of a privilege instead of a disability, will be associated with exceptional advantages of position, instead of with exceptional disadvantages of health and family burdens. That the term of actual service should be longer in one case than in another is unavoidable, since the army needed for possible immediate service must receive a more thorough training than that which is only required in case of emergency. But even as between the two moieties of the annual contingent—the moiety which remains with the colours for the whole term, and the moiety which is released at the end of a comparatively short period, and sent home to the work of civil life—chance must decide to which of them each man shall belong. And when once that decision has been given, there must not be substitution under any shape whatever, not even in the exchange of one number for another—of a number, that is, which marks out the holder for a service of years for one which marks him out for a service of months. M. BRUNEL had argued the day before that it is not enough to abolish substitutes, and to incorporate every Frenchman into the regular army, unless every Frenchman is incorporated into it for the same period. The answer to this criticism is that no nation would or could bear so great a tax as M. BRUNEL wishes to impose upon France. To take the entire civil population away from their work for five or even three years is only possible in the imaginations of military enthusiasts. It remains to be seen how far the abolition of substitutes, and the incorporation of every citizen into the army for the period of six months, will mitigate that abhorrence of military life which seems to prevail among the French peasantry.

THE GALWAY ELECTION PETITION.

THE result of the inquiry into the proceedings at the last Galway election has been to show very clearly that the Roman Catholic clergy conspired with the Nationalist party in order to intimidate and coerce the electors. Mr. Justice KEOGH, who tried the case, has reported that the Archbishop of TUAM, the Bishop of GALWAY, the Bishop of CLOMERT, and some fifty or sixty priests were guilty of an organised attempt to defeat the free exercise of the franchise; and he has taken the seat from Captain NOLAN, whose return was secured by means of this intimidation, and has given it to Captain TRENCH, the defeated candidate, subject to a legal point which has been reserved for another Court. The Judge asserts that from the beginning "every avenue of the Constitution" was held by spiritual dictation, and that this election presents the most astonishing example of priestly tyranny which is to be found in the whole history of ecclesiastical intolerance. These are strong words, and they are all the stronger as coming from a Judge who is himself a Roman Catholic, and who, both as a candidate and a judge, has had considerable experience in Irish elections. Mr. Justice KEOGH deserves credit for the courageous frankness with which he has expressed himself; but it is impossible to read the evidence at the trial without seeing that no other conclusion was open to him than that at which he has arrived. Before delivering judgment he had, he said, to study thirty thousand folios of manuscript, several hundred volumes of printed newspapers, and thousands of documents, besides sitting in Court for some fifty and odd days. The story of the election may, however, be briefly told, and it is worth telling on account of the significance of some of the incidents.

As usual in Irish elections, a large proportion of the electors kept away from the poll. There are 6,500 voters on the register, and of these about 2,200 voted for Captain NOLAN, and 690 for Captain TRENCH. The agents of the latter reported that they obtained between three and four thousand pledges; and the evidence places it beyond doubt that it required no ordinary degree of courage to vote for TRENCH, that there was danger even in remaining neutral, and that a great many of those who went to the poll for NOLAN did so under the impression that, if they held back, they would be persecuted in this world and damned in the next.

There seems to be no room for doubt as to the meaning of the part which the Roman Catholic clergy played on this occasion. They were anxious to show that they had command of the county, and could return any man they chose, and they had made up their minds that the best way to prove this would be to support the Nationalist candidate. It is possible that they also thought the Home Rule movement might be turned to good account, especially as a means of pressure on the Government, if they could only get it into their own hands. Under these circumstances it was necessary that they should take care not only that Captain NOLAN had a majority, but that it should be made quite clear to all the world that he owed his majority to them. It is possible that they might have gone to work in a quiet way and have defeated the landlords all the same; but this would not have answered their purpose. It was essential that the Government and the landlords should be made to feel that it was the clergy who had settled the election, and that it was of no use to think of getting a candidate elected except through them. Hence they took the lead ostentatiously at all the gatherings in favour of Captain NOLAN, marching at the head of their flocks, and sometimes riding horses caparisoned in what is called the national colour, with green saddle-cloths and housings. It is proved that the priests canvassed for the Nationalist candidate in every possible way. They went from house to house; they waylaid voters in the streets, at market, and wherever they could find them; they interpolated divine service with inflammatory speeches, and some of them went so far as to assail persons who were present with scurrilous abuse, and to denounce them from the altar. One priest declared during service that all who voted for Captain TRENCH would go down to their graves with the brand of CAIN on them, and on their children after them. Another said they were a disgrace to their Church, their God, and their country, and would certainly go to hell. One of Lord Gough's tenants was refused confession unless he would vote for NOLAN; and the same threat was held out against his wife, who was so terrified that she persuaded her husband to submit. A small farmer declined to vote for NOLAN, and the priests would not attend his sick wife until he gave in. Another priest proclaimed from the altar that any one who voted for TRENCH must be looked upon as a renegade Catholic, and avoided as if he had typhus or small-pox, or any horrible and loathsome disease. Father WALSH admitted that he had publicly recommended that Captain TRENCH's supporters should be "dipped" in the water; and when a prominent member of that party died, a priest said, "Of course, he was bound to die, for I cursed him." The people were told that, even if votes had been promised to TRENCH, the promise must be broken.

Everything was done to excite the people against the TRENCHES. They were accused of exterminating their tenantry, of being hard and unjust landlords; old stories about the killing of St. RATHO and a massacre of priests were raked up against the family. It was perhaps unnecessary for Mr. Justice KEOGH to vindicate the memory of CAHILL from the aspersions of "the audacious and mendacious priest, Father CONWAY," but it is not improbable that the ignorant peasants who were incited to avenge St. RATHO and the murdered martyrs were not aware that those events do not belong to contemporary history, if indeed they belong to history at all. Lord DELVIN was obliged to absent himself from chapel in order that he might not hear himself attacked from the altar. Sir THOMAS BURKE, with Lady BURKE by his side, was assailed at mass. Father LAVELLE intimated that Sir THOMAS BURKE's death-knell had been sounded, and when called to account for his words, he explained that he meant a political death-knell; but it may be doubted, as the Judge observed, whether a Tipperary man with a blunderbuss in his hand would be likely to appreciate this nice distinction. In the course of the trial the defendant cited the opinion of an English officer who thought the election rather tame. It would appear that, if this gentleman really thought so, he was difficult to please. It is true that the "wings" of Galway make but a poor show by the side of the burnings of the Commune, and only one or two lives were lost; but there was excitement enough to satisfy an ordinary taste. It is evident that Captain NOLAN's friends did not rely exclusively on the terrors of another world. Voters were summoned from their beds at dead of night and warned not to vote for TRENCH; others were beaten and stoned; houses were fired into; letters from ROCKS and ROXY were circulated; and the general feeling of terror was expressed by one of the witnesses, who said he knew very well that if he voted for TRENCH he would be started like a hare from the church-door with the priest and all the congregation after him. Sir A. GUINNESS has given a graphic description of the manner in which he had to fight his way to the poll at the head of a party of voters. They were escorted to Tuam by troops, and in the centre of the town were pelted with stones. Sir ARTHUR had his head cut by a stone, and his followers cried out that they were going to be murdered. He was determined to vote, however, and he and his companions did so at the risk of their lives. Mr. BARRETT, another magistrate, whose house was one of those fired into, gave similar evidence. He and a couple of his tenants went to the poll under the escort of a troop of Lancers, some police, and a resident magistrate. On the way they were pelted with stones and mud, and had to go some four miles round in order to get into Tuam by a back way. At the polling-place one of Mr. BARRETT's men was seized by the crowd and frightened into voting for NOLAN, and the other ran away. In another case a man was going to vote for TRENCH, when two priests pounced on him; one held him, while the other made two mystic strokes on his breast, saying, "Now mind what you do"; and the man then said he would not vote.

These are only a few incidents taken at random from a mass of evidence, but they present a lively and highly characteristic picture of electioneering in Galway. It is clear that the priests went far beyond anything that the law could tolerate, and even perhaps further than was actually necessary for their own purposes. They were disposed to be reckless, under the impression—a mistaken one, as we hope they will now discover—that the rules as to intimidation apply only to landlords and laymen, and not to priests. Some of them attempted to extenuate and explain away their conduct, but others justified it, and insisted that, as they were responsible for the spiritual welfare of their flocks, they were bound to take every means of keeping them in a right course. It was enough for the Judge in this instance to show that they had broken the law, and it was not his business to inform them precisely how far they could safely go in the way of spiritual intimidation. It is obvious, however, that some very delicate and difficult questions are apt to arise when a strict definition of this kind of intimidation is attempted. To single out individual electors, to defame their character, to expose them to the contempt and abhorrence of their neighbours, and to drive them beyond the social pale, is of course just as much intimidation as it would be to instigate physical ill-usage. Moreover, it was proved in this case that some of the clergy had violated the canons of their own Church in attacking persons by name during Divine Service. It may be assumed, however, that, within the limits both of ecclesiastical and public law, the Catholic priesthood have at their disposal an armoury of weapons which renders them at all times a formidable and dangerous body. Mr. Justice KEOGH appears to have been startled by the acknowledgment of a priest that he would not hesitate to use the Confessional for the purpose of ascertaining how men voted under the Ballot; but, even without knowing how their flocks actually voted, the priests would probably be able, for a time at least, to terrify them into voting as they wished, by threatening those who disobeyed with the vengeance of an omniscient Power. There cannot, we fear, be a greater mistake than to imagine that the authority of the priesthood will be immediately curtailed by any Acts of Parliament, however stringent. It is only by the operation of counter influences on the minds of those who are subject to this kind of terrorism, by advancing education and enlightenment, that it can effectually be met. It is important to observe that in this instance the foremost opponents of the priests of Galway are themselves Roman Catholics, and it is not improbable that the violent action of the clergy has already shaken their authority over the peasantry, who are just as likely to resent the dictation of the priests as the dictation of the landlords. It remains to be seen what measures the Government will take in order to punish the brutal and unblushing intimidation which is proved to have been practised by the ecclesiastical dignitaries and priests whom Mr. Justice KEOGH denounced with just severity, although perhaps with a needless profusion of Hibernian rhetoric. They have clearly and unmistakeably brought themselves within the range of the criminal law; and it is certain that if they were laymen they would, as a matter of course, have to suffer the full penalties of their outrageous misconduct. The Government is already under some suspicion as to its relations with the priesthood, and a dangerous precedent will be established if the reverend rabble who were let loose on the electors of Galway are not instantly indicted in the terms of the Judge's report.

LORD DALLING.

LORD DALLING, better known as Sir HENRY BULWER, has died before his new designation had become generally familiar. It is not a little remarkable that two younger sons of an untitled family should have obtained the honour of the peerage; but Sir HENRY BULWER, like his more celebrated brother, fairly earned his promotion by a career of prosperous activity. As an English politician he was a Liberal of the school of forty years ago, when ardent reformers were sustained by a comfortable belief that no change which was likely to be accomplished would prevent the country from being governed by gentlemen. After the close of his diplomatic career he re-entered Parliament as a supporter of the party to which he had belonged in his youth; but like ULYSSES among the Ithacans, on his return from his wanderings the follower of Lord JOHN RUSSELL and Lord MELBOURNE may perhaps have felt uneasy under the influence of Mr. GLADSTONE's restless earnestness. Lord LYTTON had long before left his uncongenial allies for the Conservative ranks; and Sir HENRY BULWER was probably glad to take refuge without a nominal change of politics in the serene region of the House of Lords. To him public life had been in no discreditable sense a profession in which he attained more than ordinary success. It is highly improbable that he could in any circumstances have sympathized with schemes of political or social revolution. The great aristocratic families which have done service to the country by their hereditary Liberalism are unfortunately becoming rapidly converted. One of their chief merits consisted in their power of making popular doctrines fashionable among young and aspiring politicians. The Radicalism of young Whigs in the years which immediately followed the Reform Bill was often an introduction to good society; and it was in the highest degree desirable that the lines which separated political parties should be vertical rather than horizontal. The rising Liberals of 1834 were perfectly sincere in their exultation over the defeat of the boroughmongers, in their wish to mitigate the pressure of the Corn-laws, and in their sympathy with the assailants of the Irish Church. A few bolder innovators, including Mr. HORSMAN and Mr. ROEBUCK, threatened the House of Lords; but established institutions were in little danger when Lord MELBOURNE was habitually inculcating on his colleagues the expediency of letting things alone.

Lord PALMERSTON, notwithstanding his utter want of sympathy with extreme opinions, was too accurate a judge of character to be repelled by the vehemence of political aspirants who seemed to him capable of being made useful. Accordingly he interrupted Mr. H. BULWER's Parliamentary career by transferring him at an early age to the diplomatic service. A good linguist, a popular member of society, and in all respects a man of the world, Mr. BULWER justified, under several successive chiefs, the confidence of his first patron in his activity and ability. If he was sometimes deficient in prudence, he must have possessed counterbalancing merits, for during a career of thirty years he was selected for many of the most important employments in his profession. It may be conjectured that he was not in the habit of intentionally allowing his own services to be undervalued. In the fragment of biography which he published under the title of A Life of Lord Palmerston he dwells at disproportionate length, and with obvious complacency, on the transactions in which he was himself engaged in a subordinate capacity. Mr. BULWER was Secretary of Embassy and Chargé d'Affaires at Paris during a part of the prolonged negotiation on the relations of the Viceroy of Egypt and the SULTAN; and he could be trusted to render with perfect fidelity the significant and candid language in which Lord PALMERSTON was at that time in the habit of intimating to the French Ministers his profound distrust of their sincerity, and his determination to be neither baffled nor duped. On one occasion he told the Chargé d'Affaires to hint to M. THIERS, "with all due politeness and with that force of language of which "I know you to be a master," that if he persisted in his Egyptian intrigues, MEHMET ALI would be simply chucked into the Nile, and that the French might in that case spare themselves any further trouble in the administration of their African possessions. The warning can scarcely have been more palatable because it was administered through an agent of inferior rank; and there is no doubt that Lord PALMERSTON sometimes committed the error of giving unnecessary offence in transactions which in other respects proved his sagacity and courage. M. GUIZOT's Memoirs furnish abundant proofs of the animosity which he felt against his English opponent, and probably M. THIERS resented the manner as well as the substance of his defeat in 1840; yet boldness in the conduct of negotiations is a less dangerous extreme than undue timidity. It was a great advantage to a young diplomatist to be trained under Lord PALMERSTON, especially as the Minister never forgot those who had served him.

During his mission to Madrid Sir H. BULWER entered with almost excessive facility into the personal and political combinations of indigenous factions. Court intrigues and management of jealous competitors for office were probably not repugnant to his cosmopolitan taste; and there can be no doubt that he intended to use for the promotion of the objects of his own Government his social influence and his alliances with party leaders. Unluckily it happens that in such cases the formation of friendships involves corresponding enmities; and NARVAEZ, to whom the English Minister had become obnoxious, revenged himself at the cost of an affront to the English Government by dismissing him from the country. The national offence was afterwards compromised or forgotten, and Sir H. BULWER was consoled by the American mission. At Washington he succeeded better than at Madrid, and during his term of office he negotiated with Mr. CLAYTON, then Secretary of State, the treaty which has since been known by their joint names. His last employment was at Constantinople, and it was believed that Lord PALMERSTON, then Prime Minister, was not altogether satisfied with his proceedings; but his subsequent promotion to the peerage may be considered as a proof that he had not incurred the formal disapproval of the Government under which he served. When he returned after a long interval to the House of Commons, he probably found himself disqualified from taking an active part in the political contests of a later generation. On one or two occasions he commanded the attention of the House by speeches on questions within his own department, and he voted steadily with the Government. Although he had in former days been a frequent and ambitious speaker, he never displayed the oratorical powers by which his brother was distinguished. He made the most of a certain amount of literary ability which enabled him to write agreeably on subjects of contemporary interest. An almost forgotten work on French politics and society, published in the early part of the reign of Louis PHILIPPE, was called the Monarchy of the Middle Classes. The work contained a lively and probably an accurate description of the condition of France at the time; but Sir H. BULWER had no claim to the prophetic sagacity which might have suggested that in thirty years the middle classes would go out of fashion.

As a diplomatist Sir H. BULWER belonged to the class which peculiarly excites the irritation of some modern economists. Accomplished, unprejudiced, and adroit, he could scarcely be suspected of painful earnestness in the maintenance of any political cause. His early experience in the House of Commons probably enabled him in some degree to understand the feeling of his countrymen, and it may also have tended to facilitate his relations with American politicians; but he was essentially a professional diplomatist, accustomed to obey instructions and to cultivate society as a professional duty. No other pursuit would have enabled him to make so advantageous a use of social tact and of a perfect manner. It is possible that if he had pursued a political career at home, he might have attained a respectable position in Parliament and in office; but he had scarcely the vigour or substance which would have qualified him for the rank of a party leader. The theoretical and supercilious Liberalism of forty years ago soon ceased to be an inspiring principle of action. Sir H. BULWER and his contemporaries felt a creditable dislike of obsolete paradoxes and of political and economical anomalies, and they also calculated on sufficient grounds that the party to which they belonged would retain power during the greater part of their lifetime. It seemed natural that some of the champions of popular opinion should take the opportunity of finding themselves on the winning side to adopt any career which might tend to satisfy their interests or their ambition. Of Lord Palmerston it may be said without disparagement that he made the most of himself; and he probably passed a pleasant life. Diplomatic employment, especially in the higher ranks of the profession, though it is not unattended by drawbacks, seems to possess great attractions of its own. Eminent soldiers and sailors have been known to prefer diplomatic appointments to high preferment in their own professions; and it is naturally desirable to frequent on equal terms the highest society, and to be engaged in dignified transactions which occasionally relate to great affairs. Except in his Spanish misadventure, Lord DALLING was never connected with any conspicuous failure. His literary pretensions procured him a certain reputation for ability outside the limits of his profession; and his own experience provided him with interesting subjects. Although he never attained greatness or considerable political importance, his death may fairly entitle him to a passing notice.

THE CUSTODY OF INFANTS.

IT is a commonplace that the surest way to make unreasonable agitations powerless is to allow no real grievance suffered by the agitators to go unredressed. Yet, like other commonplaces, it has often been recognized in word without being recognized in deed. The real and the imaginary wants get mixed up in the minds of the public, and the fact that those who ask redress are in the habit of putting forward claims of a less moderate character is made a reason for meeting their demands with indiscriminate refusal. This is especially true of the movement in favour of what are called women's rights. Its promoters maintain that women will never have justice done them till they have votes and can make members of Parliament feel their displeasure. The best and most conclusive answer that could be given to this argument would be to show those who use it that, as a matter of fact, women can get justice from a Legislature consisting wholly of men. Probably the leaders of the agitation would not be turned from their purpose by this discovery. They desire the franchise for its own sake, not merely for the sake of what they hope it will bring them. But there are others—the rank and file of the agitation, so to speak—who desire the franchise simply on the latter ground, and these women would lose a large part, if not the whole, of their interest in the greater object if the lesser were given to them through another channel. This straightforward way of disarming the bulk of the enemy's troops is not always properly valued by the opponents of the women's rights movement. They are too much given to treat the claims put forward by women as homogeneous. They do not sufficiently distinguish between those which are founded on a sense of practical wrong and those which have their origin in abstract theories. And the consequence is that the extreme section of the agitation is continually reinforced by many who would otherwise hold aloof from it. It is the story of Irish misgovernment over again on a smaller scale. Fenianism was most dangerous when it could point to an alien religious establishment and an oppressive land law. The more willing men show themselves to give women what they may fairly ask, the less likely it is that the House of Commons will ever be returned by or be composed of women.

There is a Bill now before the House of Commons which deserves the attention of those who wish to deprive women of the formidable vantage-ground afforded by a real injustice. It consists of only two clauses—the first providing that upon petition of the mother of any infant under sixteen years of age a judge of one of the Superior Courts of Equity in England or Ireland may order that such infant shall be given up to her, and shall remain in her custody until such age, not exceeding sixteen, as the judge shall direct; the second abolishing the rule of law which ignores as contrary to public policy agreements by a father to give up the custody of his children to their mother. The effect of this Bill if it becomes law will be to extend the principle laid down by "TALFOURD'S Act" to children under sixteen, instead of limiting it as now to children under seven. As the law stands at present there are only two ways in which a woman whose husband has been guilty of gross misconduct can keep her children with her against their father's will. She may institute a suit in the Divorce Court, and, if successful, the Court will remove the children of the marriage from the care of the unfaithful husband, and hand them over to the injured wife. Or she may induce her husband to sign a deed of separation in which it is provided that the children shall remain with her. But for the carrying out of this provision she must depend on the honour of her husband or on her ability to show that actual injury—moral or physical—will be inflicted on the children by their being allowed to remain under their father's charge. If the husband is dishonourable enough to repudiate his share of the bargain, the Court of Chancery, regarding such agreements as contrary to public policy, will not enforce this part of the deed against him—unless his conduct has been such as would induce the Court to take his children from him even if no agreement had been made. But the cases in which the Court is of opinion that the children will distinctly suffer from contact with their father are very few, and the facts relied on to create this opinion must of course be proved by evidence. The publicity entailed by an application to the Court of Chancery is very little less than that entailed by an application to the Divorce Court.

The evils of the present state of things are twofold. In the first place, it deprives a mother of the possession of her children under circumstances in which she has a strong claim to have it. In the second place, it tends to drive an injured wife, as the only means of keeping her children with her, either to submit to gross indignities or to subject herself and her children to the degradation and injury of a divorce suit. It cannot be maintained that a husband who by adultery or cruelty has forced his wife to leave his house has any moral right to retain his children with him while they are too young to have any will of their own on the subject. As between the two parents, the one who is innocent and is also likely to suffer most by separation is certainly the one whose wishes ought most to be considered. A man whose love for his children is very keen will hardly injure their prospects by conduct which makes it impossible for their mother to continue to live with him without sacrificing her self-respect. Or, even supposing that exceptional cases do occur in which a man's love for his children is both great in the first instance and unaffected by his having immoral relations with women, it is only fair that, since one or other of the parents must suffer, it should be the one in whose misconduct the necessity has its origin. And if there should be any special circumstances which suspend the application of this principle, they may, under this Bill, be submitted to the judge to whom the mother's petition has been presented, and may legitimately influence his decision. He is not bound to grant the petition unless he thinks fit, and if he does grant it he can surround the concession with whatever conditions he thinks proper. There may be some points on which the operation of this Bill will have to be guarded, and the wife who charges her husband with immoral conduct will, we presume, be bound to prove her allegations, if required. The probable effect of the Bill, however, will be to promote the settlement of such matters out of Court. If the main injustice of the present law is that it deprives mothers of their children, its chief practical mischief is that it sends wives into the Divorce Court who otherwise would never go there. When a husband is unfaithful to his wife, the best thing that the wife can do, in by far the majority of cases, is to come to an agreement by which she and her children can, for a time at all events, live by themselves. She can rarely have anything to gain by making her husband's misconduct public, and the future of the children must always be injured by the results of a public trial. Yet this most obvious and salutary mode of settling matters is one to which no binding force can be given. If the husband consents to sign a deed of separation by which the children are assigned to the mother's care, she knows that if he changes his mind he can set the deed aside at his pleasure. It is contrary to public policy, and as such the Court of Chancery may be asked, and, if asked, will in ordinary cases be bound, to declare it void. If the husband wishes, either from actual ill-feeling to his wife, or from a regard to his own interests, to prevent a separation, she has no choice but either to submit to live with him on his own terms, or to leave him and her children at the same time, or to institute a suit in the Divorce Court.

It has been found that "TALFOURD'S Act" has removed all difficulties as regards children under seven years of age. As soon as the law gave an injured wife the right to claim her children at the hands of the Court, all unwillingness on the part of the husband to enter into a private arrangement to the same effect disappeared. Few men are so unreasonable as to refuse to concede that which, if they do refuse, they can be made to concede. The present Bill will have a precisely similar effect as regards children over the age of seven. The husband will no longer have any motive for refusing to make a private arrangement. On the contrary, he will have every motive for making one, inasmuch as his wife will probably give him some consideration for his consent, while, if he withholds it, she can obtain all she wants from the Court without giving any consideration at all. And when the arrangement is made, it will be as binding as any other legal contract, with the single exception that if the Court is of opinion that the agreement is injurious to the children, it is not to be enforced. This provision meets the case of wives who in their eagerness to separate from an unfaithful husband have treated the interests of their children as something altogether subordinate and unimportant. Whatever practical objections may be offered to this Bill, its object is certainly a good one, and it deserves favourable consideration.

A MANLY AND NOBLE SPORT.

THE arguments which are annually put forward to prove that the annual exhibition on Epsom Downs should be a cause for national thanksgiving have recently taken a more apologetic tone than of old. A respectable minority, too, has shown that it ventures to sympathize with the heresiarch, Mr. Thomas Hughes, who denounces the old orthodox faith as a demoralizing superstition. He probably rather injured his case by dwelling upon the parallel between the Derby Day and Ascension Day. It does not, in our opinion, follow from the respect paid to one festival and the neglect of the other that the House of Commons sets a greater value upon horse-racing than upon Christianity. We could, indeed, suggest some plausible reasons for the belief that the interests of religion are considered as being at least upon a level with those of the Turf. An open avowal of infidelity might not excite quite so much contemptuous ridicule as an avowal of indifference to sport; but, on the other hand, a proposal to suppress the teaching of the Christian religion is probably further from adoption than a proposal to interfere with betting on horse-races. However that may be, the great motive for the rejection of Mr. Hughes's motion was not so much any genuine affection for the Derby as the thorough conviction of the House of Commons that a holiday is not a thing to be abandoned in a hurry. Once break through a precedent resting upon a good old-fashioned tradition, and there is no knowing how far the innovation might proceed. The good old commonplaces about the manly virtue of the sport and the improvement of the breed of horses were put forward merely as a decent screen for the more intelligible motive. Mr. Gladstone's declaration that the House regarded horse-racing as "noble, manly, distinguished, and almost historically national sport," had rather a hollow sound, and he found it necessary to argue that, whilst doing homage to the sport, the House did not take cognizance of the abuses which, after all, were not essentially associated with it. This is a singularly convenient form of argument, for by the simple process of calling the bad results of any institution its "abuse," and the good ones its "use," we may find excellent reasons for approving of any practice that has ever prevailed amongst mankind. Nor is there anything easier than to decide that the abuses are not "essentially associated" with the uses, if the phrase merely means that, though they are invariably associated in practice, we can conceive of them as existing separately. The power of abstraction is that by which the human is distinguished from the animal mind; and no doubt a person of Mr. Gladstone's imaginative power may conceive of a Derby without betting, brutality, and extravagance, just as the celebrated Crambo conceived of a Lord Mayor without his gold chain or robes, and even without his head, legs, arms, or body. Unfortunately, as Mr. Henry Biglow observes of wrongs in the abstract that "that kind of wrong no one ever committed," so we may say that Mr. Gladstone's ideal Derby, apart from all its theoretically separable accidents, has never yet been run.

However, we must not criticize Mr. Gladstone's arguments too closely, for he was plainly going through a mere perfunctory parade of argument, whilst in reality pleading to willing ears for retaining a holiday. He may probably think that horse-racing is an "almost historically national sport," or indeed he may leave out the almost; but we doubt whether in cold blood he would concede to it the conventional epithets "manly and noble." They are indeed vague enough to cover a wide field of eulogy; but we confess that we find some difficulty in making them fit. Granting, for we have no desire to be austeres, that the House of Commons is justified in clinging to every excuse for relaxation, let us ask the wider question, whether the Derby, besides being historically national, is a thing of which the nation should be proud? Is it in any intelligible sense manly and noble? as would it be more accurately, if not more elegantly, described as ignoble and horsey? The question, to our thinking, almost answers itself. A test at any rate may be suggested which will enable us to reach a decided conclusion. Would any respectable person advise a young gentleman of property, just coming of age, to go upon the Turf? Or rather, for that form of inquiry savours a little of the Religious Tract Society, What is the impression made, not upon old ladies or strait-laced pedagogues, but upon the ordinary men of the world, by the announcement that a youth has taken to horse-racing? Does it imply that he probably possesses a taste for art, or literature, or science; that he is likely to be a gem in a social reference, or even an introducer of improvements? Does it even show that he is probably anxious to shine as an accomplished gentleman in the physical as well as in the intellectual sense of the word, and that he is overflowing with superabundant vitality? The answer, of course, is almost too plain to give at length. Every sensible person knows the presumption to be, that the youth has just enough education to keep a betting-book; that his reading is confined to the sporting newspapers, and that the literary luminaries whom he knows are the prophets who write in them; that in all probability his fortune will be crippled, and that it is quite certain that he will have to associate with some of the most finished scoundrels that are to be found in this or any other country. However many exceptions there may be to the general rule, it may be said without hesitation that no class of society is so repulsive to the civilized being as that of the genuine betting-man. It is possible—for human nature is full of contradictions—to find instances in which a taste for the Turf is combined with a taste for better things; but in proportion as a man is devoid of any worthy aims in life he is likely to take to the Turf, and in proportion as he is absorbed in the Turf he becomes incapable of any generous ambition. The facts are notorious, and indeed nobody cares to deny them. In its least injurious form, horse-racing might be a harmless mode of amusement for such men as Lord George Bentinck or the late Lord Derby. As one of the traditional appendages to the character of the British nobleman, a love of the Turf might pass muster. But nobody seriously regards the professional betting-man—the person to whom the Turf affords the chief occupation instead of the occasional relaxation of life—as anything but an unavoidable, yet almost intolerable, nuisance. Even if the lovers of the sport abstain carefully from anything that would fit them to stand at the bar of a criminal court, and draw the line which separates honourable from dishonourable practices at a rather higher level than they seem always disposed to do, it would be simply absurd to say that there is anything "noble and manly" in the amusement. There is something manly in athletic sports, so long as they are free from the taint of gambling; and there is something noble in the field sports which, in their unadulterated form, are associated with a poetical sense of the beautiful in nature. But nobody—except in a Parliamentary sense—would associate such words with a pursuit in which success comes most naturally to the man who is most selfish, calculating, and incapable of intellectual enjoyment. It is not elevating for any man to dabble in the casuistry which systematically confuses the narrow limits within which business acuteness fuses into sharp practice and downright dishonesty; and if we were required to give a chemical analysis of the most thoroughly unhealthy social atmosphere in existence, we should begin by assuming it to be impregnated with the vapours of the Betting Ring. Democratic persons are in the habit of telling us that the British nobleman is effete and ought to be abolished. Whether this is true or not is rather a wide question, but it would be easy to answer if we could tell which type was likely to predominate—the one which takes the horse-dealer or the one which takes the statesman for its model. In short, when we put illusions aside, and assume simply what everybody knows to be true, it must be allowed that it would not be easier to erect a less attractive idol than that which is worshipped on Epsom Downs, or to select a less appropriate age for its worship. Whatever may be the effect of the institution on the breed of horses, there can be no doubt as to its influence on the breed of men. From the distinguished swell who is the object of popular admiration down to the lowest rough who distorts the English language into strange oaths, or scurries for the fragments that fall from the rich men's carriage, there are few who would not have been morally the better if they had stayed at home.

To preach against such customs is of course useless. Sermons which are directed against the absentees from church may be fairly described as elaborate bulls; and it is pretty much the same thing to tell members of the Ring that other classes of the community think their pursuits questionable or worse. They are not much concerned to deny it, and only laugh at an attack which assumes that they care for the opinion of people who do not know the name of the Derby favourite. Moreover, it is possible that there are still ten righteous men in the body, and the degrading influence of the gambling element has not quite eaten out all that was sound, or at least harmless, in the original amusement. The Turf may perhaps be going the way of prize-fighting, but it has some generations of vitality in it still. We do not, however, accept the alternative suggested by Mr. Gladstone, that if the Turf was as bad as Mr. Hughes maintained, Parliament ought to interfere more actively than by refusing to adjourn. There are, as Mr. Gladstone would admit at any other time, plenty of amusements, even more distinctly immoral, interference with which lies altogether outside the proper sphere of Parliamentary influence. How far, in particular, it can ever be desirable for the State to endeavour to suppress gambling by direct legislation is a very difficult question; and even if the Derby had sunk into nothing better, as it is little better, than a lottery pure and simple, it would be a delicate problem whether active interference would be desirable. However that may be, nobody proposes to attempt the discouragement of horse-racing; if the custom is ever to die, it had better expire of itself; but meanwhile we are glad to see the disappearance of the superstition that there was anything wonderful in it to boast about. People talked at it from an awestruck and marvellous about the good order and the general happiness of the proceeding, and some such belief still lingers amongst a certain number of our foreign visitors. The mere facts, however, are easily to be understood, and scarcely afford much ground for satisfaction. A great lottery is being drawn, which has encouraged a vast amount of gambling, and given ample opportunity for every variety of sharp practice within or without the strict limits of honesty; the gamblers directly interested are the nucleus of a vast crowd; formed chiefly of that lovely creature, the London rough, and generally disposed to drink more than is good for it. The rest is coming to be insignificant surplusage, and if dice-boxes were used instead of horses, the essential facts would remain unaltered. What there was once of genuine interest in horse-racing tends to be swamped by the lower elements, and though such interest was at no time characteristic of a very noble type of humanity, yet, when it has quite gone, perhaps Parliament will feel that its excuse for a holiday is becoming almost untenable.

RECENT CHANGES AT OXFORD.

NO places or institutions in the country are supposed by the general public to be so conservative in spirit, and in fact so unchanging, as the Universities; none are really so restless and variable. Old Oxford and Cambridge men who only read the University intelligence in the Times or the Guardian may indeed perceive that there is no small activity, and sometimes plenty of heat, in the local legislatures of both learned bodies; and Oxford at least is known to be occasionally visited by theological storms of greater or less, though latterly of gradually diminishing, intensity. No one, however, could gather from the brief reports in the newspapers the real bearing of the questions which occupy the Congregation at Oxford and the Senate at Cambridge; and still less the nature of the modifications which have during the last few years been made in the system of examination and of teaching. We are therefore disposed to believe that an account of some of these may be of service to many readers whose interest in the higher education of the country is greater than their opportunities of ascertaining how it is conducted. The ecclesiastical disputes which have disturbed Oxford we willingly pass over; nor have we space for a discussion of the social changes which must follow that abolition of celibate fellowships which many of the colleges are carrying out in a rather careless and precipitate way. Neither do we intend to make any reference to Cumnor, which, it must never be forgotten, is by no means a duplicate of the sister University. For the present we propose to call attention only to the instruction given at Oxford, in the methods and quantity of which there have been made during the last ten or fifteen years alterations of the highest importance, alterations which are all the more significant because they show unmistakably what direction must be taken by any further reforms. They have been brought about so gradually that even at Oxford people have not quite realized how considerable the difference is, while the outer world scarcely knows of it at all.

One of these is the organization of college lectures by a combination of colleges. Formerly each of the nineteen colleges undertook to provide instruction for its undergraduates in all the subjects recognised in the degree examinations. Each therefore kept a couple of tutors or lecturers at work upon classical scholarship, one or two more upon ancient history and philosophy, another upon mathematics, and, in a few instances, another upon modern history. Each of these instructors lectured to a class of from four to ten or fifteen men only; each trod the same weary round from year to year; each was doing, or trying to do, exactly what all the others in the other colleges were doing. Any one can see not only what a waste of power there was under this system, but how limiting and depressing its influence must have been upon the teachers. It gave them no variety in the subjects they dealt with; it left them little or no leisure to follow out particular lines of study, and supplied no motive for doing so; since, if they did, they would not be able to turn such special knowledge of one branch as they might have acquired to account by lecturing upon it. Yet nothing is more certain than that to teach well a man must be always learning—refreshing and stimulating his mind by studies directed on a definite plan towards a definite end.

The simple remedy for these evils was discovered about three or four years ago, and has now been applied in a manner incomplete, indeed, but highly beneficial so far as it goes. Two unions or federations of colleges have been formed for the purposes of the Classical School, one of which embraces three and the other six colleges. All the tutors and lecturers of the colleges composing each of these federations meet at the end of each term, and arrange among themselves a joint scheme of lectures for the term ensuing, each undertaking the book or topic to lecture upon which he is supposed to be most competent to treat. The lectures thus settled are then announced in a printed notice, and are open to all the members of these combining colleges, who thus obtain a much wider range of instruction than they could have found each in his own college, while yet they retain their right to have private direction and assistance in their studies from their college tutors. A similar union, embracing five colleges, has been formed by the tutors and lecturers in mathematics; and a third, still larger, which includes at this moment no less than fourteen colleges, by the tutors and lecturers in modern history—a subject in which such combination was peculiarly needed and is pro-eminently useful, since the studies of the Modern History School cover an area much wider than any one, two, or even three college lecturers could be competent to deal with. In this way, an undergraduate belonging to any one of the associated colleges has now an ample field of choice given him, both as respects subjects and teachers, and can, at one part or another of his course, obtain, without any payment beyond his regular tuition charges, oral instruction in pretty nearly every branch of his reading. The benefit extends even further, for although it is only to their own undergraduates that the lectures given by the associated tutors are open free of charge, undergraduates from other colleges or unattached students may make arrangements for attending on payment of a small fee.

The other change which has passed upon Oxford has been much more gradual, but certainly not less important. Twenty years ago, when the first University Commission was exciting the horror of respectable and contented Toryism, professorships were practically sinecures, places of some considerable dignity, moderate emolument, and absolutely no duties. There were indeed in most cases old statutes requiring the holder of a chair to give a course of lectures in the year, and where the payment of the salary depended on such a rule it was usually complied with, but in the most lifeless fashion. Not more than two or three professors gave serious lectures, likely to be of real use to students; the rest were either silent altogether, or went through the form of lecturing in a way which showed that they held it to be nothing more than a form. The whole teaching of the place was in the hands of the college tutors and the private "coaches," and men pointed complacently to the miserable Universities of Germany or Scotland, and asked what could be expected from institutions where there was none of that familiar instruction and moral discipline which distinguished our two great academies. The notion of professors, or at least teaching professors, naturally suggested metaphysics and infidelity. The reformers, however, went on undismayed, and although little was done to change the position of the professoriate generally, several new chairs were founded, several old chairs were better endowed, and by degrees the idea sprang up in the minds as well of the professors themselves as of the community that there really were functions for public teachers to discharge, functions different in nature from, and not necessarily superseding, the action of the college tutors. In this way, owing very much to the influence of the example set by two or three distinguished men whom it would be invidious to name, things have gone on improving until in this present term, out of the whole number of forty-two professors, about thirty are delivering regular courses of lectures to a class, while of the rest nearly all have either announced one, two, or more occasional public lectures, or else are giving private instruction in an informal way to such students as choose to come for it. In merit, to be sure, these lectures considerably vary, but a respectable proportion of them are really valuable; and if they are sometimes defective in taking too narrow a range and treating a subject in too conventional and commonplace a way, this is rather the fault of the vicious examination system by which the University is oppressed than of the teachers themselves, who are frequently drawn away from what they believe to be the best method of handling their topic by the demands of an undergraduate audience which insists on having facts and notions given it that may be turned to account in answering examination papers. Even with this drawback, the more elevated and comprehensive spirit in which subjects are treated by public teachers has begun to tell upon the place. Mr. Lowe, and those others who, with carelessness like his, seem to suppose that nothing is taught at Oxford except Latin and Greek grammar and composition, and that it is practically the private coaches who do this teaching, might be advised to read through the lists of lectures issued by the professors and the leagues of combined college tutors, where they would find instruction offered, not only in the old subjects—classics, philosophy, ancient history, mathematics, and theology, but also in five or six distinct branches of natural science and natural history, in eight or nine departments of modern history, in three or four departments of law; and they ought at the same time to be told that these lectures—although, as respects the professors, there is no rule enforcing attendance—are diligently frequented by the undergraduates, while the old system of coaching with private tutors has shrunk almost to nothing. Of all the charges that are brought against the University, none is less grounded than that of restricting herself to the old-fashioned studies, and making it her chief aim to produce finished classical scholars. The danger to which she is exposed is rather that of attempting in her degree examinations to cover too wide a field, and to treat it, in examining, somewhat too vaguely and superficially. And if the aim of her teaching may be inferred from its result, she aims at producing not learned men or accurate men or refined men, but smart and confident extemporizers upon things in general. The art of writing leading articles is the art which Oxford, thanks to her examination system, has for the last twenty years been teaching; it is one which Mr. Lowe and other "practical men" might have been expected to appreciate.

The conclusion pointed to as well by the development of professional teaching, and the success that has attended it, as by the excellent results of the schemes of combined college lectures, is clearly this—that the reform which ought next to be undertaken is the organization of instruction on a University, and not on a collegiate, basis. A college such as the colleges of Oxford is too small to be a satisfactory unit for educational, whatever it may be for social purposes; the tutor who lectures to his own undergraduates only has a narrow and monotonous round of duties, while the undergraduates who are restricted to their own college tutor have little choice of subjects, even if he is competent, and, if he is not, they are without remedy. The number of students unattached to any college is moreover rapidly increasing, and for them the University to which alone they owe allegiance is specially called upon to provide, opening to them not only the best teaching, but also more frequent opportunities than they now have of mixing with the college students and obtaining the social benefits of academic life. What is wanted for both sets of students, collegiate and unattached, is the provision of abundant oral instruction in all the branches, not only of a liberal, but of a technical or professional education, so far as that education can be given in a middle-sized town where there are no engineering works and no great hospitals; such instruction being thrown open, not only to those students who may be going through their regular course for a degree, but also, as in Germany, to any others who choose to come merely for the sake of hearing the best lecturers. Oxford is still far enough from making such provision, from holding out such intellectual attractions (whatever her material and social ones) as those which draw students from all quarters to Berlin now, as to Göttingen sixty years ago. Her professoriate is in some branches very incomplete, and it is for the most part very ill paid. The combined lecture scheme, useful as it is, must be regarded as a temporary expedient, depending on the fortunate concurrence of a certain number of tutors who might at any moment dissolve partnership, and even now not embracing many of the colleges, and among these several of those where good instruction is most wanted. It is not therefore surprising if many persons hold that the first, and perhaps the only really urgent, measure of reform is the application of a part of the college revenues, now in great measure expended on non-resident fellowships, to the establishment of University lectureships, which shall do in a regular and permanent way what the college tutors are now trying to accomplish by their voluntary action. It is, they urge, only in this way, and by what is another part of the same programme, the further extension of the professoriate, that Oxford can do justice to the enormous field of studies on which she invites her children to enter. And it is only in this way, by making these lectureships and professorships more attractive than they now are, that she can hope to retain the services of her ablest men.

The problem is not free from grave difficulties, but after the prophecies so often repeated of the ruin which was to befall Oxford from one reform or another, it is something to see that she is now more vigorous than at any time since the days of Richard II., and that during the last few years public spirit, a sense of duty, and a real interest in learning as well as in education, have conspicuously increased among her teachers, and have begun to produce results already important and full of high promise for the future.

SEEING THE ACADEMY.

WHY do people go to the Academy? We only realize the power of British art at the opening of May. Nobody wants to go. Artists shrug their shoulders at the prospect of acres of spoilt canvas. The man who "hates art" growls as the moment draws nearer when art will drag him at its chariot wheels. The British maiden yawns prophetically over the crush and the worry to come. Husbands grind their teeth as the annual tribute of a connubial tour through the galleries recurs with the burst of spring. Dowagers deplore the boredom and the middle benches. Even the most abandoned of loungers shivers at the notion of a lounge through Burlington House. And yet in the end everybody goes. We have known, indeed, a steady mind and an inborn antipathy to pictures enable a man to hold out as far as June. But even the steadiest mind is beaten by the necessities of dinner talk and the look of despair when one's neighbour finds herself checkmated in the usual game of pretty talk over the charm of this artist and the vagaries of that. The Academy, in fact, has become an institution; it is one of the grooves of the season, and in the long run people find it easier to run in grooves than to face the bother of keeping out of them. When once, too, the necessity of going is fairly submitted to, there are a good many considerations which alleviate its bitterness. There is the attraction, and something more than the attraction, of a crush. For two months the Academy furnishes a big afternoon drum for all London. It is a crush, too, where you not only meet the people whom you want to meet, but the people whom you must meet, and yet wish to meet as seldom and with as little social inconvenience as possible. It is pleasant when one encounters a country cousin in Pall Mall to evade the looks of piteous entreaty for a card of invitation by a passing "So glad to see you! we shall be sure to meet at the Academy!" Society, too, presents itself here in easier and more picturesque forms than in ordinary crushes. Instead of straining our neck over the staircase to see the lions or royalties of the season, we see them blandly looking down on us from the walls. We can put up our eyeglass and quiz the hero of a hundred fights without a tinge of social impertinence. It is possible to get a good look at the last new beauty without elbowing one's way through a mob of guardians. The Duke whom we were vexed at discovering last night in an ordinary dress-coat revives the dreams of our youth as he shines down on us in the glories of the Garter. All the commonplace of society, indeed, is enshrined at the Academy in a certain air of romance. The tame life of home and the drawing-room is oddly mixed up with a life of wilder and more grotesque imagination than ever visited the dreams of Mrs. Radcliffe or peopled the Castle of Otranto. We hardly recognize the squire in his hunting-coat as he jostles with the Arab Sheikh at prayer in the limitless desert. Andromeda turns from her dragon to stare into the red face of General Blazer. The great surgeon of the period with his tibia in front of him is busy lecturing to a stampede of wild oxen across an Indian prairie. A Highland torrent in full flood sweeps ruthlessly down on a monk in the confessional. We get in fact all the pleasure of a crush combined with the thrill and romance of a sensational novel. It is hard to have to put down Miss Braddon at the crisis of her stories in order to chat with Miss Dullanddreary. But in the Academy one can chat with Miss Dullanddreary in an atmosphere of Miss Braddon.

Allowing, however, for alleviations such as these, there is something amusing in the factitious heartiness with which people throw themselves into the Academy as soon as its hour has come. There is a fashionable superstition that nobody goes before ten, and that early birds pick up very artistic worms indeed. The result of this superstition is that everybody promises everybody else to meet them at eight at Burlington House. There is a wild fiction of early rising and early breakfasts. We swallow our weak tea and our scorched toast, and hurry to the gallery to find of course that the fair one who lured us from our pillow is still comfortably revelling on her own. Only a few melancholy objects are lounging about, and casting looks of malignity on the canvases which have supplanted their own. The morning has indeed its early birds, but they are for the most part persons of an æsthetic turn. The artist whose work has been rejected is hurling bitter scorn at the heads of his successful rivals. He has his little tale of the intrigue which favoured Jones, and of the miserable jealousy which sent Brown howling back to his studio. He knows the secret history of every member of the Hanging Committee, and has gloomy views as to their destiny in an after-world. His æsthetic friend, "who only sketches, you know," lounges beside him with sentiments less bitter, but of yet deeper contempt. He has no kind of sympathy with "popular art." He classes together in a common indifference all artists who "sell." He draws no invidious distinctions between Frith and Millais. His only real love is for works that are "skied" and works that are "floored." He leaves the world to "go safely in the middle," and is alternately on his knees spelling out some "Van-Eyck" little thing in the lowest corner, or on tiptoe straining his eyes at "colouring worthy of Nabuse," but set aloft like Naboth over the doorway. At nine come the critics. You see them jotting down notes in their catalogues, standing at proper angles, tapping their foreheads, frowning and smiling in a critical way. They pump the wandering artist and extract studio-talk out of the æsthetic lounge before hurrying back to the office of the "Thunderer." There is an air of gravity and respectability about their successors as the morning advances and the rooms fill, which tells of May meetings and Exeter Hall. In May, of course, art and piety go hand in hand. A lounge in the Academy is a graceful introduction to the religious meeting of the afternoon. Large white-chokers become numerous in the crowd. It drifts steadily to loyal and Scriptural subjects. Its sympathies waver between the Queen and the Den of Lions. We see it buzzing before the great picture by Mr. Watts, and explaining reverently, but at due length, the mystery of Cain and Abel. It allows itself, indeed, a few excursions into cognate subjects. Eastern pictures are treated as first cousins to Biblical ones, and Mr. Goodall is allowed a place in evangelical interest as a sort of fellow expositor with Dr. Kitto.

But piety passes with noon and the world streams in. The portraits get their innings. There are groups of pretty faces before the heroines of Mr. Millais or the heroes of Mr. Calderon, and each group resolves itself into a jury, and delivers verdicts of "like," and "not like a bit." There is no affectation of art criticism, but a steady buzz of "horrid" and "sweetly pretty." Next to the faces the jurors are most attentive to dress. They discuss the quality of silks, or the "match" of ribbons, with as much vivacity as if they were still revelling in Marshall and Snelgrove's. They are great on "attitudes," and think the air Sir Francis gives to his sitters is perfectly ladylike. A thousand little stories flit about this picture and that. Lady Betty's portrait is the happy result of a love-quarrel with her spouse. Mr. Tinto was "most delightful" while the Countess was sitting to him. There is a world of scandal in the little photograph at which the Duchesse is supposed to be looking. But it is three, and fashion is already ebbing away down the corridors to the fringe of footmen round the gate. City people begin to flock in—portly, important, broad-backed. Their one test of artistic value lies in the red ticket that marks a work as sold. They don't bother themselves with little pictures. They love a big canvas, and a subject with no nonsense in it. They are curious about the prices of things, and go into thrilling calculations as to the number of guineas which would cover Mr. Millais's last production, and how many times one could repeat the proteus if the tale of its cost be true. They like art which "people can understand," and turn away from the elaborate handling of Mr. Lewis with a sneer of contempt. They are strictly social, and think that the Academy should be a place where one can take one's wife. We see the City mother gazing at her children's work, and bustling them ostentatiously past figures in the nude. On the other hand, they can hardly gaze too long at the sentiment of Mr. Feed, or the bustle of Mr. Frith. They like history, and read with intense interest the copious quotations from Hume or Smollett in the Academy Catalogue. The yawning schoolboy of the party is fetched from the background to see Gaveston whispering into Edward's ear, and is told not to forget it when he returns to Dr. Drillem's. But it is the domestic branch of art which appeals most strongly to civic sympathies. They are never weary of babies carried upstairs, and babies carried downstairs. The burly banker whispers pleasantly in his wife's ear as the maiden loiters with her love at the stile. The mother insists that the child who is tumbling in the foreground of the picture below is the very image of little Johnny. It is indeed by the number of such images of little Johnny which she detects that she judges the Exhibition. Rougher tests are being applied by the crowd of country visitors who follow in her wake. The farmer is severe on Mr. Mason's "Harvest Moon," and doubtful about the breed of oxen in Mr. Davis's "Panic." Critics in sporting coats are keen in "spotting" the points of the horses in the equestrian works of art around them. Shopboys come in to get a sight of the lords on the walls, so as to recognize them when they next get an outing in the Park. The "humorous" side of English art gets its full tribute of admiration, and as it sinks in the social scale the crowd at the Academy laughs all the louder at the conventional naughty boy or the sly "kiss in the corner."

One of the greatest social charms of the Academy is that it is a crush where talk is found for one. There is no need to remember whom we met last night at Lady Bareacre's reception, or what we thought of the new tenor at Her Majesty's. We nod to our friend, inquire whether he has seen "Dummy Whist," and pass on. The worn-out topics of ordinary conversation are pleasantly superseded. Millais takes the place of the weather, and Mr. Whistler's grandmother serves as a "common friend." Even when we are pumped dry by a chaperon a glance at the walls restores our conversational fluency. There is a sketch of the Rialto, and we are able to parade our acquaintance with the Grand Canal. The red glow of the Nubian hills which we catch over our cousin's shoulder enables us to reintroduce with effect our famous old story of the Pacha and the Dragoman. If we stop at a picture in despair, and find it is a place where we never have been, it is easy to explain how much we should like to go. Then, too, there are jokes over the Catalogue, and sly quizzings of the mottoes and the titles. Sometimes, too, we are able to take a loftier flight, and to plume ourselves in artistic feathers. A little knowledge of studios goes a great way. It places one apart from the general rush of visitors to have seen a picture before it was hung, or to be able to tell of Jones's doubts as to the proper way in which his picture should be finished; nor is it always necessary to have visited the studios to which one refers. "How different it looks now it is varnished!" implies a previous familiarity with the work in question without committing one to a distinct assertion of the fact. So, too, we may be glad it has "come out so well," or "better pleased with the original sketch." But without lofty flights such as these, there is the endless resource of comparing notes and exchanging likes and dislikes. There is the fertile topic of a comparison with past exhibitions. There are imaginative speculations as to the picture one would like to buy. A dash of artistic enthusiasm is permissible within moderate bounds. Sentiment which would be impertinent at a garden party can be insinuated with perfect propriety under the cover of art. A pretty compliment to a face in a picture may be so managed as to cannon off to the face at one's elbow. A glance at the two rural lovers who are crouching the harvest-field may mean a good deal if the comment sinks into a confidential whisper. A certain tone will give interest even to the name of a picture or to the tags of verse which sprinkle the catalogue. It is difficult for the fiercest of dragons to guard her virgins against flirtations at the Academy. It is a place where it is easy to meet, and where one may meet again and again without the slightest intention of doing so. Lucky crowds and broad-backed gazers shield maidens from their chaperons. It is possible that charming little fingers may be squeezed in borrowing a catalogue, and that charming little messages may sometimes be found in the notes on its contents. After all, it is very difficult to sever between emotion and emotion, and the sense of beauty glides easily from the abstract to the concrete. The Royal Academy would hardly have done its work if it left its scholars dead to the grace and colour around them. But perhaps it is the glamour of life as well as of art, the charm of the crowd below as of the pictures above, which helps us to understand why, after all our protests, we still go to the Academy.

V AND W.

WE have not very lately marked the course of the controversy which was raging a little time back about the pronunciation of Latin. But we have been led into a train of thought which may perhaps enable us to throw some light on at least one corner of the debate. We mean the sound of the Latin V, and, what to our mind is at least as interesting a question, the sound of the ancient Teutonic W. If what we say turns out to be new, so much the better; if anybody has said our sayings before us, let him perish according to the proverb.

One of the best ways of finding out how Latin was really sounded is undoubtedly by seeing how Latin words were expressed in Greek letters. This does not imply that we know any more about the sound of Greek than we know about the sound of Latin. Each language illustrates the other. To us it is proof which needs no further argument that the Latin was sounded hard, when we find that Cicero in Greek becomes Kikēron. The Greek c is sounded hard now; therefore it was sounded hard then; therefore the Latin c was hard also. But the whole force of this argument turns on its second stage. It stands thus. Sounds do not in the course of years get harder, but softer. The English and the Swedish c or k has got softened; the Latin c has also, for, without deciding the question of Cicero, campus has become champs. We might have reasonably expected the Greek c to get softened also, and in some districts it has. But in the prevalent Greek pronunciation it has kept its hard sound; we say "kept," because it cannot possibly have picked it up in later times. Therefore Kikēron was certainly sounded Kikerōn; therefore we infer that Cicero was in Cicero's own days sounded in the same way. That it should in after times come to be sounded in another way was only the common course of things.

But what we are going specially to consider now is the Latin V, and the light thrown on its pronunciation by the Greek writers. And the same inquiry also throws light on the pronunciation of the Greek β. It seems to us that a change in the pronunciation of both letters took place between—to put it safely—the age of Augustus and the age of Justinian, and that the Greek and the Latin letter, which at an earlier time had distinct sounds, came within that interval to have the same sound. We believe that at the earlier date the Latin V had—except in one particular position—the sound of our W, and that the Greek β most likely had the sound of our b, but that the two gradually drew together, and that, by the fifth or sixth century, both had come to be sounded like our v or the German w. Every one knows that the Latin v at the beginning of a word or syllable is in Greek expressed sometimes by υ, sometimes by β. What may not have been so commonly noticed is that the use of υ and β is by no means indiscriminate, or dependent wholly on the taste of the particular writer, but that a rule may be observed according to which the β gradually supplants the υ. We must mark also what each of these ways of expressing the Roman letter proves, and what it does not prove. That Latin initial v should be expressed in Greek by υ proves as much as any evidence of the kind can prove. It is inconceivable that a Greek writer could, at any stage of Greek pronunciation, use υ to express the sound of our v. υ can only express w, as the modern Greeks still use it, writing Wales phonetically Βαλς. If initial Latin v had our v sound, a Greek of any date would scarcely express it otherwise than by β. If he sounded β as our v, it would be the sound itself; if he sounded β as b, it would be the nearest approach to it. Such a form as Βαλπίος proves almost to certainty that the Latin sound was our Valerius. But such a form as Βαλπίος does not go nearly so far to prove that the Latin sound was our Valerius. It goes much further to prove something about the Greek β, namely that it was sounded like our v. In a language which had at least no one letter to express our w, Valerius would be a very fair substitute for Walerius, but no one would express Walerius by Valerius. On the other hand, if Valerius was the Latin form, in a language which had no letter exactly answering to our v, Valerius would be the nearest substitute. That is to say, the use of Greek β to express Latin v is consistent with the theory that the Latin initial v was English v; but the use of υ is not consistent with the theory that it was English v. And again, if Latin v was w, this is quite consistent, and more than consistent, with Greek β being English b: it is hardly consistent with Greek β being English b. On the other hand, if Latin v was English v, this is quite consistent with Greek β being English b. That is to say, the argument is in favour of Latin v being English v, and of Greek β being English b. If then we find Greek β steadily supplanting Greek υ as the way of expressing Latin v, the consequence seems to be that this marks a change of pronunciation in the Latin v; that in fact, during the time over which our evidence spreads, its sound was changed from that of w to that of v.

In one position indeed our evidence seems to show that the change began almost in the earliest time about which we can get any information at all. Polybios regularly uses the υ as the equivalent to the Latin v at the beginning of a word, and not only at the beginning of a word, but also at the beginning of a syllable when a consonant goes before. Thus he not only writes Βαλπίος, but also Βαλπίος. Vulturius he writes Βαλπίος, which is exactly analogous to the Danish ulf for the English wolf or the local pronunciation of ooman for woman. But when the v comes in the middle of a word between two vowels, he uses other ways of spelling. Thus we have (viii. 27) Αἰβίος, and again (xxviii. 3) Ουαῖος. This, to our mind, goes a long way to show that the Latin v between two vowels had a different sound from what it had at the beginning of a word, or even when following a consonant; and it also goes a long way to show that the Greek β and the υ following a had much the same sound. In the former case this leaves hardly any doubt that the initial v was our w, but that between two vowels, where the w sound is not easy to utter, it had already taken, or perhaps had from the beginning, the sound of our v. And it looks very much as if the Greek υ had already its present sound of u or eu. It may also possibly show that the β already had the v sound, though this does not necessarily follow, as it might be used merely as an approximation. We next looked through a book of Dionysius, and found the initial ou universal; but when we come to such a name as Flavolius, he appears in the Greek as Φλαβόλιος, a piece of evidence of exactly the same effect as that from Polybios. A book of Appian gives us the initial ou in every case; it also gives us Δίκιος, and, what sets us thinking again, it gives us Ὀκταύσιος. The Roman lives of two volumes of Plutarch give us Ὀκταουανός, Ὀκταβία, Φλάβιος, Σερουίλιος, Ὀκταύσιος—a heap of inconsistency which looks as if either the v sound between two vowels, though in use long before, was still only an alternative sound, or else as if the ou was sometimes used even where it did not express the sound owing to its being the received way of expressing the Latin v. But the use by Plutarch of such a form as Ὀκταύσιος calls us back to the use of Strabo, who not only constantly uses the ou at the beginning, but also has Ἐλουήριος, Παταύσιον, Ἀρτουήριος—where the ou seems singularly inconvenient—and moreover he has Βαλλάσιος for Bellouaci, the v here disappearing altogether. He has also Γιταύσιον answering to Polybios's Ὀκταύσιος; he has Νοβουμάρου for Numum Commum; and, though he commonly has Προβίνα, in one place, in our book at least, he has Ραβίνα. But we should not build much on this last, as no name could be more likely to be altered by a transcriber in the days when Ravenna was the head of Italy and was always written with a β. All this looks the same way as the evidence we get from Plutarch; but in Plutarch we get something else—namely, the first traces of the use of the β in the beginning of a syllable, and even at the beginning of a word. Thus we get Φουβία; and, though ou is the form regularly used at the beginning of a word in the life of Lucullus we hear of Βουκωνίος. In Dion the β makes further advances. Oddly enough, two competitors for the Empire are written in different ways; Βετίλλιος gives way to the superior fortune of Οιδεσσαιανός, and Ούβιος, who, though he fell sick, recovered, follows the spelling of the conqueror. On the other hand, we get Σερουίλιος and Ὀκταύσιος and Σαλυνδίνιος at an earlier time, and even Φουλονία. But we have Σιβήρος, even when he is spoken of in times earlier than his own. Mount Vesuvius is Βασβιον; but at a later time still Αἰλίος, in whose name one would have thought the β would be a relief, appears in the somewhat awkward shape of Ἀοβίος. Here is no very certain rule, but on the whole it looks as if Dion had a tendency to use the ou in the older names when he was copying from earlier books, and to use the β in names nearer his own time, when he was expressing his own actual pronunciation. Pausanias has Ὀκταβία. When we get to early Byzantine times—what from a Western point of view we might be tempted to call Ravenna times—the initial ou still holds its ground, though it is very often exchanged for the β. But in the middle of words the β seems to be universal, except when it is now and then exchanged for the v, which by that time, at all events, no doubt had the same power. And thus we find such names as Fales, Valentinianus, and the like, most commonly written Ὀβαλῆς, Ὀβαλεντινιανός; but sometimes, in our Bonn edition at least, Βαλῆς, Βαλεντινιανός appear beside them even on the same page. Zosimos, too, who more commonly uses the ou, still talks of Βικτωρ, and of Βήρος, the Vetus of the time of the Antonines. But we always seem to have the β in names like Ἰσβαρόν, Ραβίνα, Σιβήρος, except when for the latter we get the alternative form Σιβήρος. To us it seems plain that by this time both the Latin v and the Greek β in the middle of words had universally the sound of our v. About the initial the case is not quite so clear. It is possible that the sound of w may still have been striving for existence, but it is more likely that the use of ou was simply an archaism of spelling, which was kept on after the v sound had come into general use in pronunciation.

Now comes the other question, to us at least as important, the pronunciation of the Teutonic w. The Teutonic names which in their Latin shape begin with v, but which an Englishman is most inclined to spell with a w, are in the early Byzantine writers spelt as indifferently with the ou and with the β as are the purely Latin names. Thus the Vandals are commonly written Βανδαί or Βανδαί. But we find Ουανδαί as well. Valamir, the father of Theodoric, appears as Βαλαμύριος, but Olympiodoros writes the name of Walia or Valia Ὀβαλίας, and Vitiges, as he is called in Latin, appears in the Greek of Prokopios and of Menander as Ὀβίτιγος. This is the more to be noticed, as we have Βαλνθός and Βαλνθίνος on the same page. To us this goes strongly in favour of the w sound as the true pronunciation in these Teutonic names. If the sound were w, we can understand that a Greek might use β—our v—as the nearest equivalent of any single letter; while, if the sound were v, it is hard to see why a Greek writer should use ou, unless it was simply because that form had become established in Latin names.

The conclusion then to which we came by dint of our own small reading was that the original sound of the Latin v was w, except when it came between two vowels, when it seemed to have the v sound, at least as an alternative, even from the days of Polybios. From this it was not unnatural that the v sound should first extend itself to cases in which it began a syllable, but not a word, and last of all to the beginnings of words themselves. Thus we have found Αἰβίος from the beginning; Φουβίος marks the second stage, while Βαλβίος marks the last stage of all. While we were musing over all our conclusions, we found, not for the first time, how difficult it is to say anything which some German scholar has not said already. After this article was begun we chanced upon an essay by Professor Dittenberger, in the German Zeitschrift für vergleichende Sprachforschung, headed "Römische Namen in griechischen Inschriften und Literaturwerken." To our shame, we had only made use of books, and had not thought of turning over the "Corpus Inscriptionum," but it was something to find that in the Professor's far more elaborate treatment of the matter, in which the question of ou and β fills but a very small place, there was at least nothing, as far as we could see, which showed us to be wrong. He says nothing as to the w sound, which we fancy that few German scholars would very willingly admit, and we cannot follow his argument that the use of both ou and β proves that neither of them represented the Latin sound. But his facts are the same as our own. The chief points to be noticed are the existence of one or two isolated examples of early date, one at least as early as the Polybian age, in which the initial β is found in Βαβία (Vibia) and Βαβίριος. The inference which we should draw from this would be that the Greek β had got its present sound of v earlier than we had fancied. While most writers represented the w sound by the more accurate but often very awkward-looking ou, a few from the beginning chose rather to express it by the approximate single letter β. As v itself gradually got the sound of β, this practice naturally became more common. Then Professor Dittenberger brings out a class of forms which we had only casually mentioned, where the Latin v is wholly left out in the Greek form, as in that of Βαλλάσιος. Such forms as Φαβίριος for Favonius, and some further varieties of Octavius, Ὀκταύσιος and Ὀκταίος, illustrate this, as does Νοβέμβριος for November. The striking thing about this, as it seems to us, is that it follows the old analogy by which Greek threw away the digamma. Ὀν and εἰς, answering to ovum and ovis, are exactly analogous to these late forms. The other point is that now and then, in Italy at least, ou supplants β in a good Greek word as Σεουαστός for Σεβαστός. This must have been mere confusion. The stone-cutter must have remarked that ou and β were often interchanged, and he must have thought that he was using the more correct form by using the ou. We cannot believe that any Greek ever said Sevastos; but even this confusion is again an argument for Sevastos against Sebastos.

MR. HARCOURT ON THE INVASION QUESTION.

THE recent discussion at the United Service Institution, and the newspaper controversy to which it has led, have excited public interest in a matter which is of vital importance to every Englishman. The issue which Mr. Vernon Harcourt has raised is whether or not the national insurance policy is sufficiently large and sound to cover all the risks which history, reflection, and analogy lead us to regard as within the limits of reasonable probability. Mr. Harcourt admits that an invasion is abstractedly possible, but affirms that it is so improbable that it may be looked on for all practical purposes as impossible. He disclaims all intention of dogmatizing on the subject, and modestly declares that his only object is to provoke a discussion which may elicit the opinions of scientific military and naval men on a point on which it is essential to arrive at a definite conclusion. It can scarcely be said, however, that he very successfully acts the character of a humble inquirer after truth, for he plunges with abundant intrepidity into a consideration of matters which belong exclusively to the very highest branches of the art of war. Mr. Harcourt in effect maintains that, owing to our insular position and our naval superiority, it is only necessary to keep up an army sufficiently strong to furnish reliefs to our colonial garrisons. Our first line of defence, the fleet, is, he considers, impregnable; a second line of defence is therefore, according to him, unnecessary. But what should we think of an engineer who, relying on the strength of his outworks, dispensed altogether with an enceinte? Let us, however, proceed to formulate his statements and examine them one by one. In his last letter to the Times, written after the discussion at the United Service Institution, and therefore presumably embodying his latest convictions, he propounds a problem of which the following is an abstract of the conditions. Point of the enemy's departure 300 miles distant, the possession by ourselves of 50 ironclads, 30,000 infantry of the line with reserves, 10,000 cavalry, 5,000 engineers, and 300 guns, what force would be required to invade this country? According to Mr. Harcourt, the three elements of the problem are to prepare a sufficient flotilla, to effect the passage in the presence of our fleet, and to disembark in the face of an hostile army. But Major Adams justly asks, Why 300 miles? why not from 22 to 300 miles? There are other countries in Europe besides Germany, and it is not impossible that either by force or alliance Germany might obtain either active assistance or the use of a port of embarkation considerably nearer to our coasts than 300 miles.

It may be urged with respect to France that she is by no means likely to condescend with Germany, that she has every reason to hate Germany, and every reason to love England. Such may possibly be the case at present, but it is not the present alone, but the future also, that we have to deal with. Did not Metternich say that Austria would one day astonish the world with her ingratitude towards Russia, and was not that prediction signally fulfilled in the Crimean war? Who can foresee the political combinations of the future, especially as regards so vain and fickle a nation as France? It will not be time to arm ourselves when the emergency we now deem so distant shall have arisen. Military organization cannot be accomplished in a day, and the efficiency is a plant of very slow growth. Our military organization

Britain, including the garrisons of Ireland and the Channel Islands, are really as follows:—32,991 infantry of all ranks; cavalry, including officers, 5,359 mounted dragoons; artillery, 276 guns; engineers, including engineer train, 2,270 of all ranks—giving a grand effective total of about 35,000 bayonets, 5,000 sabres, and 276 guns available in Great Britain to repel an invasion. But Mr. Vernon Harcourt talks of reserves. According to the estimates for 1872 the number of army reserve men, first class, is 10,000; but from them we must deduct one-fifth as resident in Ireland, which would give 8,000. There remain the second class army reserve and the auxiliary forces. Of the former a large proportion are enrolled pensioners, only fit for garrison duty; while as to the latter, it would be mad in the extreme to pit our second-rate troops against the well-drilled soldiers who alone would be employed in an invasion. Granting, however, that the numbers of our auxiliary forces might compensate for their military inferiority, it is very certain that even if every man borne on the rolls of either the army reserve or the auxiliary forces were forthcoming when called upon—about which we have our doubts—some weeks would elapse before they could be made ready to take the field, and be incorporated with the active army. It is therefore on the regular army alone, numbering, as we have shown, about 40,000 sabres and bayonets and 276 guns, that we must—setting aside the question of Ireland—rely to sustain, at all events, the first brunt of the enemy's attack. This force, moreover, is scattered all over Great Britain, from Inverness to Plymouth, and notwithstanding the advantages of telegraphic and railway communication, it could not be concentrated to meet, say, a landing on the coast of Essex, Kent, or Sussex, under forty-eight hours at the least. We must also remember that the point of concentration would necessarily, in accordance with all the axioms of war, be at some distance from the coast; that some time would be occupied in organizing the army after the arrival of its different battalions, squadrons, and batteries; and that at first, admitting that our control arrangements were excellent—a very gratuitous admission by the way—the force would for some days be in the position of a ship newly commissioned. Moreover, to concentrate our whole force on one spot would be to invite defeat, for we cannot suppose that the enemy would not attempt diversions and feigned attacks, to be converted into real ones if judged advisable. Supposing our army assembled in the north of Essex to repel a landing threatened by a large hostile fleet. Well, that fleet turns out to be merely a lure, and the main force of the enemy suddenly disembarks, as Colonel Baker suggests, between Shoreham and Newhaven; what would be the time required to transport our army to the scene of action, or rather to the new rendezvous, which must be at least ten miles from the coast? 35,000 infantry with staff, according to the experience of the French and Germans, would require about 40 trains; 5,000 cavalry about 30 trains; and 60 batteries of artillery—the proper proportion for the force—about 120 trains. Allowing for the administration, control, hospitals, &c., only 10 trains additional, 200 trains, each with 2 engines, would be necessary. Allowing that each train started a quarter of an hour before its predecessor, that there were no stoppages on the way, and that both lines were used, the last train would not be able to set off till twenty-five hours after the departure of the first. We must also assume that the requisite rolling-stock was present, and that large bodies of men could embark and disembark from the carriages simultaneously. But, granting the most favourable conditions, the most perfect arrangement and the employment of several lines, we are convinced that a force such as we have enumerated could not be transferred to its new scene of action under forty-eight hours; and in the meantime the false attack might have been converted into a real attack. We are rather too prone to over-estimate the value to us of our complete network of railways. For long distances, and to bring up a force to a remote frontier, railways are no doubt most useful; but in our small island they are chiefly important as enabling us to concentrate our forces in anticipation of a landing; when the landing had once taken place, they would serve little purpose beyond that of bringing up stores and carrying away the wounded. It has been distinctly ascertained that the military value of railways increases with the length of the distances to be traversed; and all our distances are comparatively short.

Let us now place ourselves in the enemy's camp, and proceed to consider his difficulties. The first is, as Mr. Harcourt says, to provide means of passage. Unfortunately, notwithstanding his assertions, the Germans, not to speak of other nations, possess an ample fleet for the purpose. It is evident that he had totally overlooked the number of steamers belonging to the different companies carrying passengers and goods to the Hanseatic and other ports. These steamers are each capable of transporting for a short voyage 3,000 infantry or artillerymen, a battery without horses, and ammunition and food for a month; or 1,000 infantry or artillery, 300 horses, and ammunition and food for a month. Of such steamers there would be, according to Colonel Baker, sixty available. These would be quite competent to convey three German corps d'armée, numbering about 100,000 fighting men and 276 guns, with of course a reduced establishment of train horses and carts, which latter they would obtain on the theatre of war. It is possible also that more than one trip would be feasible, and that a large number of sailing vessels might be towed. As to provisions for a month, England is so rich in supplies that the amount might without mistake be reduced by one-half. Neither would it be requisite to bring over as first the full proportion of cavalry, amounting to 10,404 of all ranks, for there are few districts in England suited to the action of large bodies of horse, and, as we have seen, we should only be able to muster 5,000 sabres. As to the difficulties of the passage, even supposing that we retain for ever a superiority in number of ironclads to the united navies of the world, Mr. Harcourt proceeds on the assumption that our whole fleet will not only be always in British waters, but in the precise portion of British waters traversed by an invading force. Our fleet has not only the whole coast of Great Britain and Ireland to watch, but also colonies in every part of the world; and, moreover, a series of disasters such as those of which our ironclads have lately been the victims might occur again, and on a more extensive scale. A blockade has become, according to the Royal Commissioners appointed to consider the defences of the United Kingdom, almost impossible. All that our fleet could do would therefore be to attack an enemy during his voyage. But there are such things as deceiving and eluding a protecting fleet under cover of darkness or by means of fog. Mr. Harcourt dwells upon the time required for the passage and the disembarkation, and quotes some musty instances in support of his theory. The French occupied, it is true, ten days in reaching Civita Vecchia and sixteen days in reaching Algiers, but we are not told how many sailing vessels there were among the transports. We have little doubt that, with powerful steamers in moderately favourable weather, 300 miles could be traversed in forty-eight hours; and how, as Major Adams asks, would it be if the distance were only twenty-two miles? Then as to disembarkation, Mr. Harcourt quotes the instances of the Crimea; but he has overlooked the case of Sir Ralph Abercrombie's army, which landed in the course of a few hours, notwithstanding that the enemy's cavalry charged our infantry the instant they stepped on shore, and kept up a terrific fire of artillery on the boats. An invader in these days would probably use steam launches and tugs of light draft, by means of which an entire army could be landed between sunrise and sunset. Mr. Harcourt lays great stress on the fact that we possess a large number of field guns, and he talks of an army of 30,000 infantry, 10,000 cavalry, and 300 guns. He is apparently not aware of the fact that there are limits to the number of guns which can be usefully employed, and that when those limits are exceeded artillery becomes rather a source of weakness than of strength. The best proportion of guns to bayonets and sabres is considered by the most eminent authorities to be about 3 per 1,000; yet to under 40,000 sabres and bayonets Mr. Harcourt would assign no less than 300 guns. Such a number of pieces would, according to Colonel Hamley, take up when on the march twelve miles of road. Arguing on this false premise, Mr. Harcourt assumes that the enemy would observe the same proportion. He considers also that an invader would bring no fewer than 5,000 engineers, whereas the proportion observed by the Germans is 924 of all ranks to a corps d'armée of about 42,000 men of all ranks; and an ample proportion that would be, seeing that an invading army would have to engage in but few if any sieges.

As far as we can judge, the Germans or French could, with proper preparation, transport 100,000 fighting men to our shores for the main attack, employing half that number on a demonstration to be converted, if expedient, into a reality. Let us, however, halve these numbers, and suppose 50,000 men employed on the main, and 25,000 on the false, attack; could we without long previous notice of a contemplated invasion promptly concentrate on any one spot a force equal in numbers and efficiency? This is the real question of which a solution must be sought. To us it appears perfectly feasible with good management to land 50,000 men on our shores, and we see nothing extravagant in the supposition that such a force might seize and retain, for some days at least, possession of a large and rich tract of country. We might ultimately annihilate the enemy, but when once he had eluded our fleet we could not arrest his disembarkation. Have Englishmen realized to themselves what the consequences of such an event would be? Uhlans at Reigate and Guildford; Brighton, Shoreham, Lewes, and Newhaven paying heavy ransoms; every house in those places filled with hostile soldiery; farmers' stock ruthlessly swept up by the enemy's flying columns, gentlemen's mansions pierced with loopholes, the trees in their parks felled for abatis; the mayors and chief inhabitants of the towns carried off as hostages, fortunate if they were not shot as a reward of patriotism; cities and villages given to the flames because the local Volunteers had fired a few distant shots at a cavalry patrol; trade, commerce, and public business at a standstill; the Funds down to forty or less; husbands, fathers, brothers, sons torn from their homes to serve in the auxiliary forces; their carts, carriages, and horses everywhere pressed into the service of the contending armies; thousands of Englishmen lying dead, dying, or wounded, and the land full of weeping women. All this would be the inevitable consequence, not of a successful invasion, but of the mere temporary occupation of a small portion of our island. Do we like the prospect? are we prepared to run the risk? If not, let us make whilst we have time such preparations as shall render an invasion so utterly and glaringly hopeless an affair that it shall not enter into the minds of our neighbours even to think of it.

SOUTH AFRICAN POLITICS.

THE condition of South Africa curiously illustrates the tendency of our colonial policy during the last twenty years. We have allowed the descendants of Dutch settlers in the interior to constitute themselves into semi-independent States. The Transvaal Republic was established in 1852, and the Orange River Free State two years afterwards. The discovery of diamonds has given to this country an interest which otherwise it could hardly have attained, and the House of Commons has this week been asked to express its opinion that the prosperity of South Africa would be promoted by federation and railways. There were probably few members who had taken the trouble to peruse the papers which contain the history of the establishment of British jurisdiction in the remote district to which the diamond diggings have lately given a world-wide celebrity. It appears that a question of boundary had been long pending between Captain Waterboer, chief of the West Griquas, and the Orange River Free State, and that the disputed territory, in which diamonds have been largely found, has been by official inquiry ascertained to belong to Captain Waterboer, who has ceded the same to the Cape Colony, and thus the convenient result has been attained of bringing under British authority a district which otherwise was likely to have fallen into a condition of anarchy in which it would have been unprofitable to itself and troublesome to its neighbours. Happily in this instance expediency and justice seem to have arrived at an identical conclusion. It is only twenty years ago that boundaries were thought to be sufficiently ascertained by such loose phrases as "three hours' ride from the Mission Station of Pniel," and lately the "diamondiferous" land around Pniel has been sold to eager purchasers by the square yard. It may be strongly suspected that if this district had remained under the authority of Captain Waterboer, chief of the West Griquas, or of President Brand, of the Orange River Free State, it would have been unceremoniously "jumped" by diggers, who would have established a title practically irrefragable by possession. The appearance of a British magistrate and policemen was welcomed by all the settlers in the district who had any property which they could lose by violence, and it is satisfactory to learn from the blue-book lately published that a result almost universally desired was attained by legal means. As lately as last December President Brand and his Volksraad at Bloemfontein were in a condition of energetic protest, by correspondence, against the proceedings of the Governor of the Cape Colony, who, in transmitting this protest to his Government, reported that meanwhile British officers were in undisputed exercise of all public functions throughout West Griqualand, and that everything was going on quietly and satisfactorily at the diggings.

It is not perhaps surprising that President Brand considered himself equal to governing this district, but unfortunately those who would have been his subjects do not seem to have concurred with him. He informs Sir Henry Barkly that, "in order to meet the wants and requirements of the large population from different nations assembled at the Berlin Missionary Station, Pniel," a separate district had been formed and a Landdrost and other officers appointed to it, and the necessary measures taken by the Orange Free State Government "for the due and proper administration of justice, and the maintenance of law and good order." As regards what measures were necessary for these purposes opinions unfortunately are liable to differ. President Brand doubtless considered that the Government of which he was the head was the best in the world, and that the people of all nations who had collected at Pniel and Dutoitspan were particularly fortunate in having a Dutchman to govern them. We believe, however, that the prevailing opinion among the diggers was, that the magistrate of the Free State was a respectable but rather feeble old gentleman, and that his police were the greatest scoundrels unchanged. Indeed, the black executioner of the sentences of this magistrate was principally occupied in flogging his white-skinned representatives. It had become quite clear that if British authority did not interfere, the diggers would have to supplement the benevolent measures taken by President Brand for their comfort and happiness by some tolerably energetic proceedings of their own. The worthy Landdrost of Pniel, Mr. Truter, having, like his Government, omitted protests against all and sundry disturbers of his jurisdiction, allowed himself to be prevailed upon to desist from exercising it, and his policemen probably relapsed into their original occupation of thieving. His Master, President Brand, addresses Sir Henry Barkly with a proposal for arbitration between himself and Her Britannic Majesty as independent potentates, and he also sent a "Plenipotentiary and Diplomatic Agent" to London, whom however Earl Granville and also Lord Kimberley politely declined to recognize, on the ground that the official communications of the Free State ought to be addressed to the Governor of the Cape Colony. It would indeed be impossible for Downing Street to receive all the diplomatic agents who might present themselves. We heard lately that the Government of His Majesty the King of the Fiji Islands had opened a correspondence with Earl Granville, and although this country is very unwilling to acquire fresh possessions, yet it would be almost better, as a matter of convenience, to absorb the Fiji Islands than to have the trouble of corresponding with them as an independent power. In South Africa there are we know not how many such States or Republics which assume to be independent. There is the Transvaal, or South African Republic, and the Orange River Free State, and we heard lately of one Theodor Dome, who, "with other Europeans," issued a declaration of war against the South African Republic on behalf of we cannot tell exactly whom. There are also Western Kaffraria and Natal, besides the original Colony of the Cape of Good Hope. These would be the elements of the Federation which has been lately recommended in the House of Commons, and probably that is the result to which South African politics are tending. Without impugning the justice of the award by which the diamond diggings have been declared to appertain to West Griqualand, we are nevertheless tolerably certain that by some means or other British authority would have been substituted in that district for the government of the Free State. Indeed, Sir Henry Barkly, in a despatch to Lord Kimberley of 18th December last has virtually admitted that this would have been so. He quotes a prediction from a Transvaal newspaper that the British Government "having done so much, will and must do more." And he proceeds to say that if the diamond discoveries should extend northwards as predicted, and the whole country up to the Maquassi River be occupied by British diggers, "it may indeed prove impossible to avert such a consummation." Undoubtedly if Sir Henry Barkly had not intervened, the diggers would have ejected the representative of President Brand, in spite of protests, and would have set up a government of their own. We do not know whether they would have called it the Diamondiferous Republic, nor whether they would have insisted on sending a representative with a diamondiferous wife to Downing Street and St. James'.

It is not the least embarrassment of colonial policy that we must either govern all these out of the way places or leave them to govern themselves, whereupon they speedily develop into presidents and prime ministers and plenipotentiaries, and proceed to correspond with our Foreign Office on equal terms. The phlegmatic Dutchmen of the Orange and Vaal Rivers care little probably for any pleasure except tobacco, but if adventurous Englishmen get into their country they may conceive a troublesome desire to distinguish themselves in politics. We therefore should feel favourably disposed to almost any scheme of federation which would combine all these Governments as early as possible in one; but the progress of South African civilization depends upon its wealth, and its commercial and agricultural activity. It begins to appear as if the diamond-digging had been overdone, but if the gold-fields lately discovered should prove productive, a fresh and more vigorous colonization would begin beyond the rivers, and the worthy Presidents of the two Republics would be reduced to a chronic condition of protest against interloping Britishers. We do not suppose that a railway will be made between Natal and the Orange Free State simply because, as Mr. R. Fowler says, there would be no tunnels and no steeper gradient than 1 in 32. But it is tolerably certain that at no distant time such a railway will be commenced, and English capital will doubtless eagerly demand to be invested in it. The proposal for federation will not perhaps be greatly advanced by Mr. Fowler's motion, but it is almost sure to be adopted. Mr. Knatchbull Hugessen indeed went so far as to declare that it would be for the advantage of both the Dutch Republics to be brought again under the jurisdiction from which they ought never to have gone away. The resolution to allow them to depart at least temporarily in peace was adopted both by Sir John Pakington and the Duke of Newcastle, so that both parties in politics may divide the honour or reproach of a supposed improvement in colonial policy, which is now confessed to have been a mistake. This appears to be the usual course of what some people call progress in political affairs. A step is taken with much applause which after twenty or thirty years has to be recalled. At the point of Mr. Knatchbull Hugessen's speech which we have now reached, a tribute to the interest which South African affairs excite in England was afforded by an attempt, which however was defeated, at a count-out. Members rushed into the House with as much alacrity as if it had been suddenly discovered to be diamondiferous, and, having rescued the debate from impending collapse, they rushed out again with even more alacrity, and doubtless resumed the task of "comparing" on next day's Derby, which we may hope proved diamondiferous to some of them. A speaker in the debate stated, that even bishops who disputed about the road to heaven agreed as to a railway to the gold-fields, so that this work will doubtless proceed. Advancing civilization will, we fear, either obliterate Presidents Brand and Erasmus and their Volksraads or drive them to establish Dutch Republics in some remote region where large game and even niggers may still be shot as in the good old time. No protest in any language will suffice to turn the locomotive engine from its iron path.

THE SALMON FISHERIES.

LOOKING to the scarcity of fresh meat, it is gratifying to hear that the salmon fisheries of England are in a prosperous condition. Much has been done in the last ten years, and much may still be done, to protect and increase the breed of salmon. Public attention has gradually awakened to the necessity of restraining the liberty which has for many years existed of pouring sewage and the refuse of mines and manufactories into our rivers. The Inspectors of Salmon Fisheries express the hope that even the Thames "may one day become a salmon river." They believe that the Dovey is naturally one of the most promising salmon rivers in Wales, but unfortunately the fishing interests are very much impeded by the dirty water which comes out of the lead mines. The Dovey has of late been of a better colour than in former years, because some of the mines have ceased to work. Still, however, fish, and especially the smolts in the spring months, are killed every year in considerable quantities by the lead pollutions. The pools in the river are also becoming filled up by the rubbish from the mines. The Dovey runs quite clear on a Sunday when the mines are not at work, and the water comes down clear on Monday morning, so that fair angling can be obtained till the lead water comes down the river. The Dyliffy mines are the great offenders in this matter. The river which runs from these works down into the Dovey looks like a river of milk, and there is not a living thing in it. An offer was made to the proprietors of the Dyliffy mines of a large piece of bog land, for the purpose of filtering the water from the washings, but the offer was refused because it would entail a little expense. The Inspectors of Salmon Fisheries, in their recent Report, express the hope that the proprietors of the Dyliffy mines will reconsider their decision, and adopt some means of purifying the water.

We not only share this hope, but we further think that if an obvious duty is not voluntarily performed, compulsion ought to be applied. That which is now being done in the valley of the Thames ought to be done everywhere. Let the law say that noxious matters shall not be poured into rivers, and means will be found of disposing of them upon land. It is now some years since a Commission of Inquiry reported upon the condition of the rivers of the West Riding of Yorkshire. The cloth manufacture, which was originally attracted to that district by the purity of the water, has rendered the water disgustingly impure. We are many of us familiar with the inky colour of the tepid streams of the Aire and Calder, which have been of late years required to carry, not only all the liquid refuse, but much also of the solid refuse of the district. It had become quite common to "tip" mining rubbish into these rivers, as if their capacity were inexhaustible. These abuses have lately risen to such a height as to compel reform. The water which comes naturally to these towns being polluted, other water must be conducted to them from a distance; and when the cost of fetching water exceeds the cost of removing the refuse of mills, it is probable that these rivers will be permitted to return to something like their original condition. This, indeed, is what is happening to the Thames. It is found more costly to poison water than to leave it pure, and so nature is allowed to operate in her own way. At this moment, however, the towns above London are only beginning the necessary arrangements. This Report promises that the sewage of Oxford "will shortly be kept out of the Thames." Mr. Buckland adds, that the state of the river upon which the members of the University take their daily pastime in rowing is perfectly horrible, and he wonders that the fathers of the undergraduates, "as representing the future strength and intellect of the country," do not take up the case and insist that the evil shall be abolished at once. This, however, is more easily said than done. The only practicable alternative to pouring sewage into a river is to spread it over land; but too frequently when the local authority looks for land for a sewage farm, it is met by strenuous opposition on the part of the landowners, who fight to the last against any proposal for selling their land for a public purpose at a high price. The Thames, however, is tolerably free from the greater nuisance of chemical works such as those on the Rhymney in South Wales. The owner of those works denies that anything deleterious goes into the river, but Mr. Buckland produces evidence of injury. "The caddis-worms, water-crickets, bull-heads, have all disappeared; even the ducks, snipes, and water-ousels are getting very scarce. Under these circumstances, it is natural that the fish should also suffer."

As regards the refuse of mines, it must surely be possible to do in Wales that which is compulsory in Germany. It is the duty of a Government Inspector in that country to satisfy himself that the water escapes perfectly clear. The consequence is, that the river which flows through Ems, receiving all the water from the dressing works at Holtzappel and other places, is absolutely full of fish. It is suggested that the "slime" which remains in catch-pits when clear water flows away may be made into bricks, and thus applied to useful purposes. A new enemy to salmon has appeared in the petroleum works which have lately been established in the valley of one of the best of our rivers, the Dee. Mr. Walpole, the colleague of Mr. Buckland, reports a case which went before the magistrates of this district, but both his facts and his law are slightly obscure. It appears that he inspected the Alyn, a tributary of the Dee, and found the smell and taste of tar distinctly perceptible in the water twenty miles below the nearest oil-work. A miller assured him that after floods fish were continually killed, and washed down from the river above. The state of things grew worse and worse as he ascended the river to a point near which two different works were situated. He found that the water below the lowest of these works was so poisonous that a minnow placed in it sickened immediately. But the water above these works was equally foul, and the foreman insisted that he could not be expected to send it on more pure than he received it. It became consequently necessary to proceed to the higher of the two works, and here a similar experiment was attended with similar results. The remainder of the fish which had been brought for experimental purposes were placed in water taken from above the works, and showed no signs whatever of discomfort or sickening. The case would have been clear against the upper works but for the further fact that "a colliery discharged its ochreous water into the river" near the same point, and "it was impracticable to distinguish between the mischief occasioned to the river by each of these workings." It seems to have been admitted that oil and coal together poisoned fish, but it was considered as not certain that oil alone or coal alone would have had this effect. But suppose that A. pours oil refuse into a river, and that it meets coal refuse poured in by B, and that the two combined poison fish, can it be said that A. or B. has poured in refuse "to such an extent as to cause the water to poison fish"? The magistrates, as we understand, considered that this could not be said, and therefore declined to convict. They seem to have required evidence that the oil refuse or the coal refuse was the sole cause of poisoning, which evidence from the situation of the works could not be produced. It appears to have been thought insufficient to offer evidence of the opinions of chemists or other persons as to the deleterious quality of oil refuse, and probably opinions might differ widely. We find that an owner of chemical works upon the Rhymney told Mr. Buckland that in his opinion sulphuric acid "acted as a tonic to the fish," and possibly the owner of the oil works upon the Alyn might have declared his belief that the refuse of them did the fish good, and almost enabled their constitutions to support the pernicious influence of the adjoining colliery. We can only say that, if the magistrates correctly understood the law, it needs amendment.

It is difficult to estimate the extent to which the productive power of our rivers might be developed by judicious measures of protection to the breed of salmon. One valuable characteristic of this species of food is that it conveys itself to the consumers, and perhaps improves during the journey. That favourite of economists, the pig, is sometimes with difficulty persuaded to move in the direction of a butcher's shop, and he is apt, moreover, to waste in travelling. But the salmon goes rejoicing and thriving on his way to make sport for the angler and food for the angler's friends. How that food may be largely increased in quantity appears from the statement that a grating has been lately fixed at the head of the Shropshire Union Canal, through which millions of salmon fry, produced in the Dee, formerly found their way to destruction. Each tiny individual thus preserved would be capable of growing, under favourable conditions, into a splendid fish, and that which has been done upon the Dee to ensure, however imperfectly, these conditions, has been done or will be done upon other rivers. The enactments for the protection of salmon fisheries require the intelligent co-operation of all classes of society for their enforcement. Cases of violent breach of these enactments by poachers are not uncommon, but the law which punishes such outrages is likely to be supported by public opinion, which is more than can be confidently asserted in reference to the poaching of four-footed game. The salmon does not feed upon the farmer; and the farmer, by help of rod or net, may feed on him. The construction of passes has been carried out sometimes under the inspection of Mr. Buckland and his colleague, and sometimes under the influence of indigenous zeal, which has a tendency to outrun discretion. Mr. Walpole is disposed to think that the work of opening streams is in some instances being carried on too rapidly. "To pass the fish into a country where there is no machinery for protecting them is obviously to throw temptation into the way of poor men which they may find it difficult to resist." If it were possible by means of School Boards or otherwise to teach poor men to allow salmon to grow to a good size before killing them, we should think that every fish-pass in the country would be an addition to its resources. The river is the poor man's park, and even in this crowded and high-priced country it is still possible at the end of a day's fishing to understand that "the bounty of nature" is not a mere poetical expression.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

IV.

IN the Academy romantic styles vastly preponderate over classic styles, and naturalistic treatment and pre-Raphaelite tendencies have of late years been greatly mitigated by sentiment and the sense of beauty. Romance in art is a natural offspring of romance in literature, and accordingly our exhibitions abound in pictures responsive to Shakespeare and other poets who have gained for England a foremost position in the romantic literature of Europe. The element of romance, whether in painting or in writing, it is not always easy to define. According to Schlegel, a critic addicted to startling paradox, the classic drama was subject to law and order, while the romantic drama reverted to chaos. It would seem nearer to our immediate purpose to point out that romance enters art whenever stringent fetters are unloosed and human nature is permitted to speak out freely and passionately. It may be deemed an interesting coincidence that an Academician whose collective works would not inaptly illustrate the meaning attached to the word "romantic" bears the name of an author identified with the birth of the romantic drama. Mr. Calderon, R.A., is, in fact, a descendant of Calderon the dramatist, whose works serve as a connecting link between the romantic literature of Southern and of Northern Europe, between the romantic drama of Spain and the romantic drama of England. As it happens, however, Mr. Calderon has not identified his art with the land of his ancestry; he has shown a preference for

Shakespeare, for Shelley, and even for Waller; and the last-named poet, who marks the descent of noble romance into weak sentimentality, furnishes him with a text for his principal picture of the year, "Summer" (219):—

The ladies, angling in the crystal lake,
Feast on the waters with the prey they take;
At once victorious with their lines and eyes,
They make the fishes and the men their prize.

Flirtation in a boat, a lobster lunch on shore, a fish hooked by a charming young lady, are capital ingredients for picture-making. Moreover, the public seems to be charmed with a certain crudity of colour; the greens, the whites, and the browns arrest attention by contrasts which approach discord. The scene has the merit of being eminently festive; indeed the picture wins popularity rather by pleasing incidents than by subtle art-treatment. The best among the many boating parties to be found in this year's exhibition is undoubtedly "Fair, quiet, and sweet lies" (997), by Mr. Fildes, an artist hitherto chiefly known by book illustrations. The painter leads the fancy in the sunny summer time to a sylvan river where swans and lilies float; soft music steals upon the waters; a youth and maiden join voice and instrument while two listeners lend their spirits "to the influence of mild-minded melancholy." The river bark pauses on "the downward stream" in a pleasant place of bowing leaves, and the painter has been at great pains to bring as it were the foliage, the water, the boat, and its inmates into musical accord with the song. All art, and especially romantic art, is or should be rhythmical; Coleridge in lines on the "Eolian Harp" speaks of the "rhythm in all thought"—"a light in sound, a sound-like power in light." When light "palpitates" and colour pulsates, when forms melt and lines intermingle, then may it be said that a picture is rhythmical or musical. The actual results gained by Mr. Fildes are widely different from the effects obtained by Veronese; yet the principles involved, if not identical, are analogous, so true it is that Venetian modes of treatment are the clue to romantic styles. We are sorry to say that the praise we have bestowed on the picture of Mr. Fildes cannot be extended to "Pleasant Recollections" (1015), by Mr. Brooks. This painstaking and somewhat agreeable product is neither real nor ideal; it is merely commonplace. A fourth water-party we owe to Mr. Hennessey, an American who falls into Transatlantic colour at the season when trees wear the garb of autumn, and the landscape shimmers in Turneresque play of gold, red, and blue. "Summer Eve, Long Island Sound" (179), is in its treatment of colour akin to the manner which Mr. Cropsey some years since made familiar to English eyes. The work is brilliant, clever, and eccentric. It has been said that Americans, under the transmuting power of climate, are in course of assimilation in body and mind to the aboriginal inhabitants, and certainly American artists seem to bear out the notion by an uncouthness and savagery that pertain to barbarism rather than to civilization.

Colour has more than ever taken possession of our English painters—a colour which is not so much a reflection of nature as a response to emotion, a colour fanciful and decorative that holds fellowship with that spirit of romance which, as we have seen, asserts potent sway in the Academy. Mr. Walker, A.R.A., Mr. Mason, A.R.A., Mr. H. Hardy, and others are conspicuous examples of this tendency; their manner is abnormal, one-sided, and moody. Yet Mr. Walker's "Harbour of Refuge" (227) is after its kind a master-work. The scene is laid in a grass-grown quadrangle with chapel and almshouses around, and a statue of the founder in the centre. The time is evening; the inmates too have reached the evening of life; sunset fades in the saffron sky, broad shadows gather on the ground, and in this place of refuge and of rest poor aged pensioners sit quietly at ease or walk up and down at leisure. The only haste and energy is in a stalwart and remarkably ill-formed mower, whose awkward movement seems to endanger his own legs; "The man's scythe will cut off his leg" is a remark we have more than once heard. We do not know that the painter means to point an allegory, and yet this figure might suggest old Time with a scythe, or the "reaper whose name is death"; even as the grass and the flowers are cut down, so shall the aged and infirm be gathered to the last garner. Mr. Walker is almost the only water-colour painter who has thoroughly mastered oils; the handling, the texture and impasto, in firmness, solidity, yet transparency, leave little to desire. But the colouring, notwithstanding that it has been brought into absolute keeping, is too hot for ordinary tastes; the picture is as a highly seasoned dish over-dosed with curry-powder. If an antidote be wanted, it were well to turn to Mr. Leslie's deliciously cool "Elopement" (183); here we have silver instead of gold, and pearls instead of brickdust. Even the lady in this imminent elopement is cool as a cucumber; she sits on the river brink wistfully waiting for her lover, who comes to fetch her in a flat-bottomed boat. A background of ample walls, old gables, and clustering chimneys, with ancestral elms and clamorous rookery, suggests, not the penniless suitor, but a well-to-do country squire. Very exquisite is the pencilling of branches and leaves against the lucent sky of sunset; the reflections in the water take on the sombre tranquillity of twilight. Mr. Leslie is one of the comparatively few painters who can bring figures into absolute unity with the surrounding landscape; he depends for sentiment on tone, his colour permits no discord. In a different way Mr. Boughton, this year scarcely at his best—plays with monotones and yet escapes monotony. He composes a triptych which might be called "The Spring-time" (579) the birds are coming and a maiden listens; the "summer is gone on swallows' wings," and two maidens mourn "The Flight of the Birds" (580); "thirdly and lastly," as preachers are wont to say, on "The Coming of Winter" the birds are dying. This pretty play on the changing seasons is possibly better suited to poetry than to painting. The colour, though somewhat sandy brown and black throughout, is not without response to the sentiment, and among several points to commend may be mentioned a careful study of foreground, apparently painted out-of-doors on the spot. Mr. Storey is another artist who deals in quiet concord, even when he approaches discord, as in "The Course of True Love never did run smooth" (400). The two girls, though of the dumpy sort, are not without grace, but the painter muddles their complexions; indeed, the technical qualities displayed are far from the clear, silvery tones which some years since, in "The Dancing Lesson," attracted favourable notice. The figure of most expression is that of the huffy lover, who trudges away in high dudgeon, resolute, yet irresolute; one leg lingers as if it would turn and relent, but the square back presses onward obstinate and determined. Mr. Storey has a nice insight into character; he looks at life with childlike simplicity; he sees nature clad in grey because he seeks quietude; grey is the garb of cool tranquillity, red and yellow the drapery of hot passion. Very charming is the child seated among "Little Buttercups" (331). The picture has the simplicity of "The Age of Innocence," by Reynolds.

Grey, like black, is accounted the negation of colour, and therefore perhaps it happens that in schools expressly of colour, such as the Venetian and the English, positive colours preponderate. The use of grey, indeed, is by certain of our painters—as, for example, by Messrs. Linnell, father and son—accounted a surrender of power. Such artists forget that nothing is weaker than incoherent rant; when colour breaks into violence we are reminded of the words, "The loud laugh bespeaks the vacant mind"; true strength lies in moderation. At all events, the blazing sunset (664) by Mr. Linnell, sen., appears to most eyes to be in excess of the modesty of nature. How intense colour may be brought into subjection and tone is sufficiently obvious in "The Harvest Moon" (125), by Mr. Mason, A.R.A. It may be objected that the artist's manner has been exalted into mannerism; it may be urged that in this moonlight pastoral the figures are shadowy, unsubstantial, and ghostly, the forms unpronounced, the limbs drawn with a knowledge which breaks down. It may be pleaded, however, in reply, that the painter at the outset makes an unconditional surrender to shadowy sentiment and poetic impossibility. Just as Claude may be supposed to have looked at nature through a Claude Lorraine glass, so may we imagine that Mr. Mason uses a Mason glass. At any rate the uninitiated public stand in need of some such optical medium or patent contrivance. But, the conditions once granted, the conclusion follows by what may be termed pictorial logic. A keynote is struck ecstatic as that of the nightingale, and then the artist plays his variations around the central theme. The composition, thoroughly Italian in its poetry and pathos, recalls strains which we have heard by peasants of the Abruzzi at Christmas-tide before images of the Madonna. This troop of harvest labourers, returning home at nightfall, are impelled passionately onwards. Only perhaps by long sojourn in Italy, by contact with a past which happily still lives in the present, can this poetic impossibility, this grand unreality, find place in modern art. "As You Like It" (489, 490, 491), a composition in three parts, displays to disadvantage that romance of colour and of sentiment, coupled with that infirmity in form, which constitutes the style of Mr. Arthur Hughes. The figures are crowded and confused; the design falls to pieces; the picture is without ground-plan; the painter, however, is never wanting in refinement and sense of beauty. A composition of something more than promise, by Miss Starr, from "The Merchant of Venice" (348), proves what by this time should be only too well known, that Shakespeare is at once the most easy and the most difficult of authors for a painter to deal with; easy because every character may be borrowed and appropriated from the theatre as if it were a stage property, and difficult because we have a right to expect from a picture more than from the stage; difficult also because Shakespeare, like nature herself, can seldom, if ever, receive full justice or adequate illustration. The scene between Portia and Bassanio, as painted by Miss Starr, is wanting in emphasis and nerve; the figures stand uncertainly, the colour falls into monotony; and these shortcomings are unexpected when we remember other pictures by this foremost female student of the Academy. The work of the ladies is this year disappointing. We should say, judging from oratorical displays at a recent suffrage meeting, that women are greater experts in the use of the tongue than of the brush. "Silvius and Phebe" (627), by Mr. Putnam, A.R.A., is more up to the mark than other Shakespearean pictures of the year; the characters are creatures of the woods and fields; Silvius looks lovesick and silly, while saucy Phebe is bewitchingly pert. But the artist is apt to repeat himself; painters who do not come to a standstill learn that in art, as in nature, there is never-ending variety in colour, form, and incident. The power of calling up new and original ideas is one of the rarest of gifts, whether in literature or art. Such faculty, if we mistake not, may be recognized in a self-sustained composition, "The Sacred Tribute to King Edgar" (358), by Mr. H. Hardy. Noble figures, sportsmen of the olden time, bear tribute of wolves' heads; the dogs, eager for the booty, are equally good in form and colour. The colour is not free from the anomalies of the new school. Certain pictures in which we have noticed some of these anomalies whose opposing warp and woof vie for pre-eminence; the fabrics so abundantly imported from Japan make their influence felt within the Academy.

The problems in what may be termed the science of chromaticism, now in process of being worked out in our Exhibitions, promise new developments to art. Of the old school, bold in creative faculty, and balanced in colour, Mr. Poole, R.A., remains as an immovable landmark. Elected Academician twelve years ago, he has postponed till now the gift of his diploma work. It is always interesting to observe what character a great painter may select when, after a long and arduous career, he makes his appeal to posterity. Mr. Poole has oscillated between tragedy and romance. "Solomon Eagles and the Plague of London" was as terrible as Poussin's "Plague of Athens;" on the contrary, "The Goths in the Garden of Italy," and "The Song of the Troubadours," were decorative and emotional. In presenting his diploma work, "Remorse" (309), he reverts to tragedy. The handling has that uncertainty which may be accounted the penalty of original had drawing never got the better of. But the conception is even epic. It has been conjectured that this nude figure, almost colossal in proportions, which holds an intermediate place between Fuseli and Michael Angelo, may be intended for Cain, the murderer and the outcast. A lion devouring its prey, a child sleeping with dead doves, fill up the composition; mountains crowd round as if in witness, a stream rushing by roars reproach. "Remorse," the title which the picture bears, seems to be echoed from the surrounding hills. To assert that the artist has realized all the ideas which he may have suggested were indeed to bestow excess of praise on this vague vision, this muddled mystery. But, at all events, this creation of genius, when it shall finally join company with the diploma pictures of Hilton, of Eddy, and of Fuseli, may serve as a connecting link in the continuous story of our English school. There is never an Exhibition of the Academy which does not comprise at least two generations of men; even our contemporary art has its chronology, for between venerable Academicians and rising Associates there is a great gulf fixed.

THE DERBY.

IT is a sign of the times that fifty-eight members should vote against the adjournment of the House of Commons for the Derby Day. The motion was inopportune, and deserved to fail; for, as Mr. Gladstone pointed out, the adjournment is looked forward to by many who care a great deal about having a holiday, but nothing whatever about the Derby. The evident wish of the House is that its officers should not be deprived of one of their few customary holidays; on the narrower ground of suspending the business of the country for the sake of witnessing the Derby Mr. Hughes would obtain many more adherents, particularly as the claims of the Derby to rank as a great national festival rest more on past tradition than on present fact. Mr. Gladstone was right in pointing out the undesirableness of mixing up the question of holiday or no holiday with a discussion of the real or presumed abuses of the Turf; but in hinting that if the House decided to take cognizance of those abuses it should not confine itself to a barren protest—for the abolition of the holiday would be nothing more—he must have forgotten that his own Government has not only acknowledged the existence of those abuses, but so long as three years ago undertook to deal with the most glaring of them. Yet, though by a Bill of a single clause which would meet with no opposition in either House they might extend the Betting Houses Act to Scotland, they have never troubled themselves to accomplish even this simple and elementary instalment of Turf reform. But if the Legislature declines to take notice of Turf questions, the Executive, at any rate, might display a little more activity in the use of its authority on the Derby Day. One of the annual incidents of this noble and historic festival is thus described in the Morning Post of Thursday:—

About ten o'clock the roadway again became filled with the homeward bound carriages, and owing to the reckless way in which some of these were driven, several persons were knocked down between the Horns and Newington Church, where the crowd was very great, the people being intermingled with the carriages. Some of the persons thus knocked down—chiefly ladies and boys—were severely bruised, and were taken into different doctors' shops, where they were attended to. In the confusion that prevailed the police were unable to identify and take into custody any of the offending drivers by whose recklessness the injuries were inflicted. "To add to the confusion, at various parts the roughs got up sham-fights for the purpose of plundering the persons foolish enough to look on, and from complaints made as to lost watches, purses, pins, &c., they must have reaped a good harvest. The police being fully occupied in attending to and regulating, as far as possible, the vehicular traffic, the numerous gangs of thieves were enabled to pursue their operations almost without any interference."

Yet in a leading article the Morning Post of the same date pronounces that "it may be safely said that of the myriads who thronged to Epsom yesterday, the enormous majority returned all the better for their excursion." So that it would appear there are still some people in existence who believe in "the fun of the race."

The Derby of 1872 was the first run over the new course, which commences at a very short distance indeed from the old course, but is much easier. The first part is still uphill, but the ascent is much less severe; and a still greater improvement is that there is a greater scope of ground at the start for marshalling a large field. There was abundant room for the twenty-three starters on Wednesday to stand abreast without unduly pressing on one another, and in consequence the starter had a very easy task, and the delay at the post did not occupy three minutes. It must be confessed that, according to general opinion, the moderate quality of the majority of the runners was so fully established that the decision of the race was awaited with unprecedented indifference. Prince Charlie was the centre of whatever interest was excited, and the questions whether he was a roarer, and, if so, whether any roarer, however splendid his capabilities, could win the Derby, were eagerly debated to the exclusion of all others. So high an authority as Dr. Shorthouse has lately argued at considerable length that Prince Charlie is not a roarer, and that the affection which causes him to make a noise is quite distinct from roaring, and is not calculated to prevent him from winning a long any more than a short race. But many other experienced judges did not hesitate to pronounce him a confirmed roarer; and, anyhow, whatever might be the truth about the technical name for the cause of the noise, there was no doubt about the noise itself. And it seems to a common-sense observer difficult to understand why, if a horse's respiratory organs are perfectly free and unimpeded, he should make a noise at all. Public opinion, rarely at fault in the main about these great races, had, we think, steadily settled down to a conviction that Prince Charlie was a roarer, but that he was so good a horse, so superior to all his opponents, and gifted with such speed—the more formidable on account of his enormous stride—that it was quite possible for him to win, despite his infirmity. But public opinion, as expressed in the usual manner, clearly pronounced that Prince Charlie would either win easily or be beaten easily. Hence Prince Charlie started first favourite, but no one would back him for a place. And public opinion was, so far, perfectly right. The next positions in public favour were deservedly held by Cremorne and Queen's Messenger; and, as between them, the fair questions for argument, according to their public running, were whether Cremorne would beat Queen's Messenger by his superior speed, or Queen's Messenger beat Cremorne by superior staying powers. Of course the public form of Cremorne was the better; yet it was urged that on more than one occasion he had run like a non-stayer, and that he lost the Two Thousand simply from inability to retain the advantage which, a hundred yards from home, had to all appearances placed the race at his mercy. Beyond these three, what where we to look for that had not been signally defeated by the leading favourites? According to all public form of this year, none of the Newmarket Biennial horses could be expected to get within lengths of Cremorne or Prince Charlie; nor could there be much hope for any, save Queen's Messenger, who finished behind the same pair in the Two Thousand. Then the casualties of training had disposed of candidates who might have been formidable—Onslow, Nuneham, and Bethnal Green; and for many a long year the search for an outsider has proved an unremunerative speculation. It was the general belief that the Derby would be very much a replica of the Two Thousand, Prince Charlie being a sort of reserved problem, as much of fear as of hope; and the result justified the belief, though the long-expected outsider did come at last, and ran so prominently as to split the second and third in the Two Thousand. We never remember to have seen so few people in the paddock as on last Wednesday—a significant circumstance, as showing the apathy with which this Derby was regarded by those who are usually most ready to avail themselves of the opportunity to inspect the most notable horses of the year. All the twenty-three runners came into the paddock, but after walking about for a short time, Queen's Messenger and Patriarch were taken over to the foot of the hill near the starting-post. The rest were soon saddled, and walked about in the paddock till the time came for the preliminary canter. We may say that Prince Charlie and Cremorne looked, as at Newmarket, as well as their admirers could have wished, that Wenlock and Almoner were pictures of condition and good training, that Bertram's appearance attracted considerable commendation, that Drummond was short of work, and that The Druid, who promised at one time last year to come quite to the top of the tree, was all to pieces and wholly unfit to take part in a race like the Derby, and that very little notice was taken of the two outsiders, Marshal Bazaine and the Makeshift colt, whose names have been brought forward somewhat prominently during the last ten days. Nor did we hear a single person who had seen the Makeshift colt speak a word in his praise; on the contrary he was called clumsy and coarse-looking, and as unlike a Derby winner as well could be. In the preliminary canter none were more admired than Almoner and Wenlock. Prince Charlie, the most docile and best-tempered horse in training, moved easily over the ground, while Cremorne pulled hard at his jockey.

We need not give a complete catalogue of the twenty-three competitors, most of whom will be more in place in less important contests than the Derby. We may mention, however, that Ruffie and Patriarch were started to make the running for Almoner and Queen's Messenger respectively, but that they were wholly incompetent to fulfil their duties. They merely helped to get in the way, and Ruffie was also able to contribute to the inevitable scrimmage at Tattenham Corner, to the no small disadvantage of Bertram, Queen's Messenger, and the Makeshift colt. What little running was made during the first part of the race was done by Westland, an almost unknown son of Narbonne, and it struck us that the pace was slow for the first three-quarters of a mile. Wenlock and Cremorne were always near the front, and Prince Charlie occupied a good position to the top of the hill. By many who saw how delicately he was ridden down the hill at Newmarket it was felt that this would, independently of his roaring, be the critical point of the race for him; and great anxiety was manifested to see his position and how he was going as they came round the corner into the straight. And, lo and behold! the hill or the roaring, or both put together, had done for Prince Charlie, and his stride and his speed were alike unable to bring him again near the front. At the moment they turned the corner, Cremorne, who had escaped the mischance that happened to Queen's Messenger, Bertram, and the Makeshift colt, rushed to the front and took the lead, which he never afterwards lost. Wenlock, who ran fast and well for a mile and a quarter, then gave way, and at the distance Cremorne seemed about to win in a canter, for Queen's Messenger—not at all the sort of horse to recover from a serious disappointment—had been fairly knocked out of his stride, and, though rapidly making up a good deal of lost ground, was galloping in a rather confused, sprawling style that forbade any hope of his catching the leader. Opposite the Stand the Makeshift colt, who had been comparatively unnoticed, his colours not being very conspicuous, challenged Cremorne, and a hard and punishing struggle ensued, which ended in favour of Cremorne, who was fast tiring, by a short head only. Ten yards more, and the outsider would have won. Three lengths off Queen's Messenger, who was eased when victory was plainly out of his reach, was third. Wenlock was a moderate fourth, Bertram fifth, and the remainder were widely scattered. Prince Charlie was of course not persevered with after a single call on so generous but unfortunate a horse had been responded to gamely but ineffectually. The winner ran straight and gamely, but he would unquestionably have won with far greater ease had the course been two hundred yards shorter. As it was, he was within an ace of repeating his Two Thousand failure, and losing the Derby by failing to maintain the signal advantage he had gained. His splendid speed is sure to bring him to the front just when to come to the front is, for a real stayer, to achieve certain victory; but then, in the final run in, he goes slower every stride instead of faster, and comes back to his horses instead of going further away from them. It was so in the Two Thousand, and it was so in the Derby; and in the Derby, he it remembered, his opponent at the finish was a raw green colt who had never seen a race-course before, and who in this his first race had met with a serious disappointment. The victory was well earned, and highly popular; but it will hardly be sufficient to hand Cremorne down to posterity as a real good stayer. Neither Cremorne nor the Makeshift colt is in the Leger, and the way is so far made plain for Queen's Messenger, who will also be suited by the course; but the first and second in the Derby have a chance of meeting in the Drawing-room Stakes at Goodwood, though Cremorne will have to carry 10 lbs. extra for his Epsom victory.

REVIEWS.

HOOK'S LIFE OF ARCHBISHOP PARKER.*

THE volume which Dean Hook now gives us contains, like the one which went before it, a single Life, but a Life of great moment in the series which he has undertaken. The last volume contained the Life of Reginald Pole; the present contains the Life of Matthew Parker. Parker, as Dr. Hook several times tells us, was not a great man, but he held a great position in a most important time, and his personal character was certainly not without influence on the course of events. It was in his time, and in a large degree by his means, that the Church of England finally put on its present shape. He and the mistress whom he served embody, more than any other persons, the position which that Church finally took up at the end of a period of endless shiftings to and fro. If "the Reformation" happened at any particular time, it certainly was under the reign of Elizabeth and under the primacy of Parker that it did happen. The first Primate of All England appointed after the final throwing off the authority of the see of Rome, the first who was consecrated according to a reformed ritual in the English tongue, Parker eminently represents the new state of things which was then finally established. But he no less eminently represents the continuity of that new state of things with the old. The congé d'élire under which Parker was elected Archbishop is a very speaking document. It does not contain a word to imply that any great revolution was going on, still less that any old Church was being pulled down or any new Church set up. Everything bears the stamp of antiquity. The Queen issues the documents by virtue of her "fundamental" powers, powers which we may conceive at pleasure as being derived from Æthelberht or from her own father, but which at all events were possessed and exercised by Mary in the case of Pole, just as much as by Elizabeth in the case of Parker. It sets forth that the metropolitan church of Canterbury, "by the natural death of the most reverend father and lord in Christ, the Lord Reginald Pole, Cardinal, the last Archbishop thereof, is now vacant and destitute of the solace of a pastor," and the Dean and Chapter are required to "elect such a person Archbishop and pastor who may be devoted to God and useful and faithful to us and our kingdom." Of course it is easy to say that all this is mere legal formality, in no way representing the real state of the case. The congé d'élire does not bring out the fact that there was anything unusual about the circumstances of Parker's election, though they undoubtedly were very unusual. But the point is that, though the circumstances were unusual, they still were not such as involved any change in the usual form of such a document. And this was in itself something. The fact that Parker was not, in the eyes of any one concerned, appointed to any new office in any new Church, but was simply chosen in regular order, to fill a vacant office in the existing Church—that Pole was still, after the breach with Rome, described as "the most reverend father and lord, the Lord Reginald Pole, Cardinal," and that the church of Canterbury was said to be by his natural death "vacant and destitute of the solace of a pastor"—is the legal expression of the legal and historical continuity of the new state of things with the old. We may even conceive that the document was studiously so drawn up that it might in the clearest way express that continuity. And all this belongs strictly to the domain of history and law, and does not trench at all on the domain of theology proper. The purely theological question is, Did the consecration of Parker or of any other Bishop endow him with real spiritual powers which, without such consecration, he could not have possessed? Was it of any real importance to men's souls that an order of men so consecrated should be kept up? With questions like these history proper does not meddle at all. It does not even search very minutely into the personal belief of Archbishop Parker, or of Queen Elizabeth, on such points. But history is concerned with the facts that, whatever were their exact views as to the nature of the episcopal succession, whether they did or did not think it necessary for the existence of a Church, they acted in such a way as to make, not the greatest but the least, breach possible between the new state of things and the old. We may be pretty sure that, whatever the Queen thought in her own mind, her prelates and statesmen did not look on what divines call the "Apostolic Succession" as something absolutely essential to the being of a Christian community. The position which they took up with regard to the Reformed Churches on the Continent, the occasional admission of men who had had only Presbyterian ordination to offices in the English Church, makes this pretty plain. At the same time, men who insist on this point sometimes forget that it is possible to hold as high a view as any one likes of the Christian ministry, and yet to hold that the office may be conferred by Presbyters as well as by Bishops. Exalted views about the priesthood and a belief in the sole ordaining power of Bishops do commonly go together, but they are in no way logically tied together. But what really concerns us in the matter is that those who ordered things in Elizabeth's reign at least did not look on the rites of consecration and ordination as superstitious and ungodly, and that they thought it worth taking a good deal of pains to preserve, in fact and in form, the unbroken succession between the new state of the Church and the old. These are facts; the question whether they did rightly or wisely in so doing is quite another matter, and a matter which we gladly leave to theologians. The question of the spiritual succession is for them; it is the outward succession, the outward continuity between the Church before Parker and the Church after him, which is a matter of law and history, and with which alone we have to deal. It is not always easy to steer clear of theological quicksands on one side or the other. The strictly impartial historian, who simply sticks to the historical facts, is liable to be assaulted on both sides. In acknowledging the historical fact he may possibly offend those who attach spiritual importance to it, because, while going so far along with them, he declines to go further. On the other hand, it is equally likely that he may offend those who are so fiercely set against the theological doctrine that they will hardly endure the historical fact, and are stirred up to wrath at its statement, as if it involved the theological position which they dislike.

We say all this, because of the exact degree to which, in considering the present volume and the time with which it deals, we can keep company with Dr. Hook. Our facts and his are pretty much the same; but we look at them from somewhat different points of view. What to him is of importance theologically is to us of importance historically. It is of great importance to Dr. Hook to show that the consecration of Matthew Parker was a good and valid consecration. The fact one way or the other does to him make a real difference in the theological position of the English Church. The old dispute about Parker's consecration really involves three questions. First, Was there any regular ceremony of consecration at all, in opposition to the Nag's Head story? This is purely a question of fact. Secondly, Was the ceremony which actually took place such as to be a valid consecration of a Bishop? This is a question of Canon Law. With both these the historian is concerned; with the former in a greater, with the latter in a lesser, degree. But beyond both lies the further question whether it really mattered to Parker or anybody else whether he was validly consecrated or not. This is a question of pure theology with which the historian does not meddle. History can look quite calmly on those who held that, however regular the consecration may otherwise have been, yet, as being done without reference to the centre of unity at Rome, it must have been of no spiritual validity. It can look equally calmly on those who are so indignant at the notion of any spiritual validity at all as hardly to put up with the facts which may be con-stood as implying a regard for it. And it can look as calmly on those who believe that the spiritual position of the English Church, or of any of its members, depends in some way on the fact or on the canonical validity of the consecration of Parker. Yet, of the three classes, it has in the present matter the greatest degree of sympathy with the third, simply because they are the class which has least interest in perverting the facts of history. Dr. Hook in the present volume repeatedly tells us that the object of Elizabeth and Parker was not to establish a Protestant sect, but to reform the old Catholic Church of England. To Dr. Hook this position is of strictly theological importance. From our point of view we pass over the strictly theological bearing of the position as not coming within our range. But the historical facts implied in the position we fully accept. Nothing can be plainer than that it was the object of Elizabeth and Parker to preserve a legal and corporate continuity between the unreformed and the reformed Church of England. And we hold that Dr. Hook does a real service, not only to his own school of theology, but to the actual facts of history, by bringing this truth prominently forward. So again, with regard to another point, closely connected or rather in truth identical with this one, we hold that Dr. Hook does good service by pointing out, though here again he stops to point it out a little too often, that England was not, during the period which we call the Reformation, divided into two parties by a hard and fast line. The real state of the case will never be understood unless we take in the fact that for a long time the spiritual forefathers of the later Roman Catholics and of the later Protestant Dissenters were simply two parties within the one national Church, who severally held that reform had gone too far and that reform had not gone far enough. We do not always admire Dr. Hook's vocabulary of party-names; abstractedly the name of "Anglo-Catholics" is in our eyes even worse than "Anglo-Saxons"; for "Anglo-Saxon" is a perfectly good word if it is only used in its right meaning, while "Anglo-Catholic" seems to us to have no meaning at all. All that is to be said for it is that it follows the analogy of "Roman Catholic," and that since the early days of the Tractarian movement it has passed into vogue. We are still more puzzled when Dr. Hook, if we rightly understand him, sometimes applies the name "Protestant" in a special way to those whom elsewhere he calls "Anglo-Catholics." But, notwithstanding all this, Dr. Hook does a real service to historic truth by bringing out the true position of those who, at Elizabeth's accession, must have formed the great mass of Englishmen. Cecil undoubtedly went to mass during Mary's reign; we conceive that Parker himself, as he stayed in England, must have done so also. Were they hypocrites, taking part, to save their lives or their goods, in a worship which they looked on as sinful and idolatrous? We see no necessity for thinking so. On Dr. Hook's showing, they would of course have wished to change the mass for an English service altered in many respects, but their feeling against the mass need not have been stronger than that which strong High Churchmen and strong Low Churchmen feel nowadays towards the doings of one another. That is to say, the dislike to the mass did not go so far as to oblige them formally to secede from the religious body in which the mass was practised. We have in earlier articles spoken of the apparent inconsistency of those who went a long way in the path of change under Henry and Edward and then drew back under Elizabeth. But it is plain that their scruples were hardly expected by Elizabeth herself. When she offered the primacy to her sister's minister Wotton, when it could even be believed that she offered it to Abbot Feckenham, it is plain that she hoped to carry with her what we may call the party of Thirby and Tunstall. Of course the gap kept constantly widening. The enemies of change kept going back, the friends of change kept going onwards, till, long before Elizabeth's reign was over, there was a hard and fast line between Papists and Protestants, or whatever we are to call them. When the Pope excommunicated the Queen of England, when Romish zealots advocated her murder as an act of religious duty, the breach was complete. The point to be borne in mind is that no such hard and fast line can be drawn at Elizabeth's accession.

In another notice we hope to look at some of the events of Parker's life more in detail. At present we will only add that, while again declining to commit ourselves one way or another on the question of pure theology, we regard Dr. Hook's general position as one which history will very gladly accept.

CREASY'S COLONIAL CONSTITUTIONS OF THE BRITANNIC EMPIRE.*

WE quite agree with Sir Edward Creasy that an increase of knowledge and interest on the part of Englishmen as to the great mass of colonies and dependencies which make up the British Empire is greatly to be desired, but we doubt very much whether this desirable knowledge will be imparted or this interest created by such a book as he has given us. A dry and jejune account of the history of each colony, followed by pages of statistics of the boiled-down blue-book order as to the constitutional position and the relation of each to the Government at home, however creditable it may be to the industry of the author, is singularly tantalising to the world at large. The book is hardly minute enough for a book of reference, and as a book of general information it is simply unreadable. Its one merit lies in its excellent maps. There is no kind of philosophical power nor any of those literary graces which sometimes atone for the absence of it; the style is bare and lifeless, and the reflections are utterly commonplace. Of the curious problems which our colonial history may be said to have solved, or of the even more curious problems which it is just beginning to work out, we hear hardly a word. The great movement for colonial federation (to take a single instance) is perhaps the most interesting of all the questions which at present concern the welfare of our dependencies; but if some account is given of its progress in North America, we are treated simply to a casual reference to it in the case of the West Indian islands, while the most important of its developments, the proposals which have emanated from Victoria for a general union of the Australasian colonies, are left, so far as we can see, without any mention at all. We are afraid that a statistical gazetteer of this sort is hardly likely to dispel the apathy with which Englishmen endure, and only just endure, the discussion of colonial questions. It is very well to urge the magnitude of the interests involved, and to appeal to our national pride in an Empire on which the sun never sets. Mr. Martin is no doubt right in telling us that "the colonies and dependencies of Great Britain embrace about one-third of the surface of the globe, and nearly one-fourth of its population"; but a debate on colonial topics passes unread even by the most constant reader. There is something, no doubt, which ought to startle and excite even a middle-aged member of Parliament in the statement that the Queen has more Mahomedan subjects than the Sultan, that she is the greatest Brahminical sovereign in the world, and that she ranks next to the Emperor of China as a Buddhist ruler. But all the eloquence of Mr. Grant Duff has not yet succeeded in preventing India from acting as a dinner-bell on the House of Commons. The results of this absolute indifference of public opinion are provoking enough. It is no slight evil that the colonists themselves resent and are estranged by it from the mother-country. It is a yet worse evil that the absence of real information leaves the public ear open to the maudlinings of Ginx's Baby and of the laureates and social philosophers who propose to sweep away colonial independence by way of finding a clear field for the street Arabs and broken down crossing-sweepers of "imperial" England. But perhaps the greatest mischief of all lies in the loss of political intelligence which must spring from the steady refusal of English thinkers to contemplate the working and issue of some of the most remarkable political experiments which the world has ever seen.

The first and most prominent of these is, of course, the introduction of responsible institutions into the colonies themselves. We are so accustomed at home to the steady working of constitutional government, so used to see Tories go out and Whigs come in, that we are apt to forget how delicate a process it has always proved to transplant the institutions with which we are so familiar into other soil than our own. Political speculators, on the other hand, have been apt to regard such a transfer as almost impossible, to plead that the political condition of a country must grow slowly out of its social circumstances, to denounce Parliamentary institutions as unfit for a purely democratic society, and to sneer at "paper constitutions." Now whatever force there may be in this sort of reasoning, whether in the case of Burke or De Tocqueville, it is quite certain that our colonies possess "paper constitutions," that the institutions of England have been transferred, apparently without much damage, into the midst of absolutely democratic societies, and that these institutions have taken fair root, and are working satisfactorily. No doubt they have been modified in the transfer, and will be yet more modified as time goes on; but this of itself throws light on a question often discussed, whether political institutions can bear artificial modification at all, while the character or tendency of the changes which the new conditions have produced furnishes an endless field of political speculation. The introduction of representative institutions is all the more remarkable as an experiment from its having been a deliberate one, not a concession extorted from the mother-country by pressure on the part of its offshoots, but a voluntary gift made on the distinct grounds of justice and expediency. If not the most notorious, it may probably turn out to have been the most important result, so far as the after-history of the world is concerned, of the Reform Bill of 1832. From the revolt of America up to that time, the tendency of our colonial administration had been in the opposite direction. The old independence of the "plantations" was rudely contested. Not only was the dominion of the Crown absolute in colonies acquired by conquest or cession, but in the so-called free colonies the older self-government was reduced to little more than a form by the influence of the Governors over their nominated Councils, by the power which the Colonial Office exercised of disallowing all Acts which met with its disapproval, by the practice of dealing with public lands as subject directly to the Crown, and by the reservation of colonial appointments as a part of English Ministerial patronage. The system was partly undermined by the abandonment in some measure of this monopoly of office, and by the new commercial policy of the mother-country, before the great change which swept almost the whole of it away; but the words of Lord Durham, when introducing responsible government into the Canadas, imply a revolution in our political ideas on the whole subject. "If in the hidden decrees of that wisdom by which the world is ruled it is written that these countries are not for ever to remain portions of the Empire, we owe to our honour that when they separate from us they should not be the only countries on the American continent in which the Anglo-Saxon race shall be found unfit to govern itself."

* The Imperial and Colonial Constitutions of the Britannic Empire, including Indian Institutions. By Sir Edward Creasy, M.A., Author of "The Rise and Progress of the English Constitution," "The History of England," &c. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

When Burke distinguished "the Constitution of the British Empire from the Constitution of Britain," the first was a far simpler matter than it is now. Over the whole of its vast colonial dominion the Imperial Parliament is supreme, but the supremacy is exerted in very different ways and in very different degrees as it passes from one colony to another. Without dwelling on the exceptional instance of the Channel Islands, or on military posts such as Aden or Gibraltar, we have "Crown colonies" like the Straits Settlements or those of the African seaboard, where legislation and administration are absolutely in the hands of the Government at home; colonies like Ceylon, where this purely Crown rule is tempered by the retention of the Roman-Dutch law of previous conquerors; colonies like the Mauritius, where a consultative, but non-official, Council is chosen by the Government itself; or like Natal, where the Council is still consultative, but elected by the colonists; colonies like that of the Cape, possessing representative institutions, but not responsible government; or, finally, like Canada or the bulk of the Australian colonies, in full possession of both. Almost every shade of constitutional life is to be found in the group of British dependencies, and with each shade comes a difference of relation towards the mother-country. It is difficult in some instances to see on what principle the constitutional character of our various possessions is determined; why, for instance, Trinidad remains purely a Crown colony, while most of its fellow-islands possess representative institutions. Still, however much colonies may differ from one another, the connexion with the mother-country binds the whole group together. It is perhaps a proof of the future which is reserved for the principle of federalism, that the tendency of our colonies just now appears to be in favour of a federal relation both towards the mother-country and amongst themselves. The grant of representative institutions, the establishment of responsible government, the possession of full legislative power over internal affairs, commercial independence—such are the gradual steps by which Canada or Victoria has risen from the condition of the bailiwicks of Bern to that of the Canton itself. In yielding to the colonies the control over the military force raised within their bounds England is exactly reversing the process which the revisers of the Swiss Constitution attempted the other day. But in spite of the common talk on the subject, the freest English colony is no more independent than a Swiss Canton was after the Treaty of Vienna. The central Power reserves to itself the right of peace and war, it conducts all diplomatic transactions, it reserves to its Courts the ultimate appeal from those of its dependencies. The supremacy of its Legislature, although cautiously exercised, is still undoubted; it nominates in every case the Governor of the colony, and through him appoints to colonial offices, and exercises control over colonial legislation. Finally, it reserves to itself the right of annulling all Acts of the colonial Legislature which seem prejudicial either to the well-being of the colony or of the Empire at large. It is plain that, with a control so extensive as this, our colonies can hardly be regarded as the independent Republics which careless politicians are in the habit of styling them. But their relation to each other is tending to become as federal in character as their relation to the mother-country. Antigua is taking the lead in a federation of the Leeward Isles; the process of union is being slowly carried on in Canada; it is the obvious future of the Australian colonies. To the political student nothing can be more interesting than to watch the manner in which this double federation is being brought about, and the way in which the newer relation must of necessity modify the old. But for the statesman, whether of the mother-country or the colonies, we can hardly conceive a process of more delicacy and difficulty.

From all purely colonial problems such as these India stands apart. It is in fact not a colony, but a dependency. Of its one hundred and fifty millions of subject inhabitants, only one hundred and thirty thousand belong to the conquering race. Of these, again, one-half are soldiers governed by military law, and the bulk of the other half are officials controlled by the regulations of the service to which they belong. It is only in the sense, therefore, of an administrative machinery that we can talk of a "Constitution" in the case of India. But, viewed in this way, it is worth far more attentive study than English political speculators have as yet devoted to it. The administration of India is necessarily despotic, but it is a despotism tempered by checks which arise naturally from local circumstances, but which could hardly exist elsewhere. No such trust has ever been confided to a single man as is confided to the Governor-General. He governs, in fact, at his will a country as large and a population as great as that of all Europe with the exception of Russia. But he governs it under the control and supervision of the Parliament at home, in strict responsibility therefore to a Power which, though too ignorant of India and too remote to fetter his action on points of detail, prescribes his main lines of policy, and holds him sternly accountable for the justice and wisdom of his rule. Not only, however, is this home control exercised by a Secretary of State under the advice of a Council composed of retired Indian officials, but each half the Governor-General is expected to sit in personal conference with the councils of a Cabinet of Ministers, not by himself, but by the Government of India. He may, and on occasion does, override the peculiarities of this pro-consular system, he is bound to ask their opinion and to see it placed elaborately on record should any difference arise. Nor is this all. He governs through a service highly organized and with definite political traditions and associations of its own, each member of which is accustomed and encouraged to place his own opinion and its grounds before his official superiors, even when yielding to their will. It is in this singular combination of "government by reason," with the most absolute independence of action in case of necessity, that the position of the Governor-General is so unique. It is in supplying us with new administrative and constitutional forms such as these, that the study of dependencies and colonies is of political utility. We should have been glad if Sir Edward Creasy had discussed even one of the many problems which the facts he has collected so vividly suggest.

MR. BUCHANAN AND THE FLESHLY POETS.*

SOME months ago an article on what was called the "Fleashly School of Poets" appeared in one of the magazines. It purported to be written by "Thomas Maitland," a name previously unknown to literature, and handled very severely the poetical compositions of Mr. Rossetti and Mr. Swinburne. It was afterwards discovered that "Thomas Maitland" was in reality Mr. Robert Buchanan, and Mr. Rossetti and his friends protested indignantly against the unfairness of one writer of poetry disguising himself, like a bravo in slouched beaver and muffled cloak, in order to attack his more successful rivals, and indirectly, if not directly, to praise himself. For "Thomas Maitland" referred to Mr. Buchanan by name, and accused Mr. Rossetti of borrowing ideas from his verses. The controversy sputtered hotly for a week or two and then went out. The personal question at issue seems to us to be a very small one, and it is a pity it should not be forgotten. But as Mr. Buchanan has thought it worth while to trouble the public with it once more, and as he seems to be still unable to comprehend his own or his editor's error in the matter, we will say just one word about it. Mr. Buchanan explains that the alias was affixed to the essay "in order that the criticism might rest upon its own merits, and gain nothing from the name of the real writer." The answer to this is, we think, that under the circumstances the article would not have gained by the name of the writer being frankly avowed. In the form in which it was published it professed to be a candid estimate of a particular school of poetry by an independent and impartial writer. If it had been known that it was in reality one poet decrying the works of his rivals in business, its impartiality would at once have been suspected. We are speaking now, of course, of the effect of the article on what is called "the general reader," who is not supposed to be in a position to weigh criticism to much purpose for himself, and who, coming across a critic whom he believes to be unprejudiced and disinterested, is disposed to accept his judgment accordingly, but who would be put on his guard if he knew that there was, or might be, a professional animus lurking under the affectation of judicial candour. In the old romances we occasionally read of a knight of tremendous prowess and overpowering reputation, who found it necessary, in order not to alarm antagonists too much, to enter the lists with closed vizor and borrowed shield; but Mr. Buchanan is hardly a combatant of this description. There is no reason to suppose that his name carries with it an oracular authority which would be fatal to the free exercise of private judgment; and, on the other hand, it is conceivable that the general reader would appreciate the necessity of examining his dicta more cautiously when aware of the peculiar relations of the critic to the objects of his criticism. At the same time, as we said before, the question is really a very small one; and it might have been more dignified on the part of Mr. Rossetti and his admirers to deal with Mr. Buchanan's essay on its merits, if they thought it worth while to take notice of it at all. But it is characteristic of a sect or coterie to resent criticism as in itself an outrage, and to assume, with or without reason, that it can only spring from personal malevolence.

There is a good deal to be said about the unwholesomeness not only of Mr. Rossetti's and Mr. Swinburne's poetry, but of the atmosphere of mutual admiration in which they and their associates appear to live and move and have their being, and which is destructive, not only of healthy vigour, but of some of the best impulses of art. But, apart from the question of Mr. Buchanan's good taste in putting himself forward as advocatus diaboli, it may be doubted whether he has shown himself capable of doing justice to his case. He has now republished his essay in a revised and expanded form; but, unfortunately, the flippancy, the arrogance, and the distemper of the original article still remain. The impression with which one rises from the perusal of this pamphlet is that the writer must be suffering from a morbidly quick and sensitive perception of unseemly suggestions. He seems to be continually sniffing for nastiness, and sometimes we cannot help thinking that his imagination detects odours which no one else would perceive. Mr. Buchanan would appear not to have cultivated with much success the poet's faculty of looking at the best and purest side of things. He begins by telling us how, coming up to town from a remote retreat in the Highlands, he looked about to see "all that a man with eyes can see." What had most impressed him in former years were such things as these:—"The listless imbecility and superficiality of the moneyed vulgar," "the shapelessness of women who feed high and take no exercise," and so on. But now he is fascinated by a horrid thing which threatens and paralyzes him. He sees it on every side—in the street, on the stage, in books, on canvas. It is, he goes on to tell us, Legs. There is a well-known form of disease in which the patient is pursued by beetles or snakes, or other nasty things, always swarming before his eyes, on the floor, the walls, the roof. Mr. Buchanan is haunted by legs. He has sought refuge, it would seem, in sweet-stuff shops as the most innocent places he could think of; but even there, in defiance of the debuter puerie, "among the commoner sorts of confectionery may be seen this year models of the female leg, the whole"—but here Mr. Buchanan goes into details which we prefer to leave in his own pages. There is, he allows, nothing to be said against legs in themselves and in their proper sphere, but he protests against their being "obtruded into every concern of life," and he objects especially to legs in sugar. It is only in "the higher circles" that Mr. Buchanan escapes from this distressing exhibition; but still his uneasy modesty finds no relief; for although he sees no legs in the drawing-room he is confronted with other sights which make him long to borrow Tartuffe's handkerchief. We are not prepared to defend all the eccentricities of what ladies call full dress, and it is impossible to deny that an unpleasant taint of sensualism is observable in various branches of literature and art. But we certainly pity the state of mind of any one whose modesty is outraged every time he goes to an evening party, and who is put to the blush by the voluptuous images of children's sweet-stuff. We are surprised that Mr. Buchanan does not see that in making these confessions he exposes himself to an obvious retort from Mr. Rossetti and his friends. To the pure in spirit all things are pure, but Mr. Buchanan's purity is of that uncomfortable kind which is constantly detecting unclean and lascivious suggestions in the most unlikely quarters.

* The Fleashly School of Poetry, and other Phantasies of Robert Buchanan. London: Street & Co.

Mr. Buchanan intimates that he at one time thought of treating the Leg-disease in its relation to painting, music, literature, the theatre, and society at large; but he reserves this great work for a future occasion. For the present he is content to deal with sensualism only in so far as it affects contemporary poetry. On reflection Mr. Buchanan may perhaps be disposed to postpone indefinitely the publication of his magnum opus. If we may judge from the present example, it may be doubted whether his mode of treatment is not on the whole rather worse than the disease to which it is applied. We have heard of a well-known prelate delivering a sermon on the weaknesses of the flesh for the edification of a militia regiment, which from its suggestive warmth of tone produced an effect the very reverse of that intended. We are afraid Mr. Buchanan has fallen into a similar error. He has no difficulty in showing that there is a great deal of wanton nastiness in Mr. Swinburne's early poems, and that Mr. Rossetti's writings also contain passages of a highly offensive kind. It has been suggested that Mr. Swinburne has been overwhelmed with moral reprobation on account of his free-love heresies, while Mr. Rossetti conciliates conventional propriety by confining himself to nuptial confidences, and practising his erotic pranks under a certificate from Doctors' Commons. For our own part we think the old-fashioned notions are the best, and that there are some subjects which poets and artists had better let alone, or which, at least, they are justified in touching only when they have a distinct and important moral purpose in view, and not mere dalliance and sport. Honest plain-speaking is an excellent thing in its way, and possibly the world might be better for a little more of it. But honest plainness of speech is not the characteristic of the Fleashy School, any more than simple straightforwardness of thought. It is their sickly self-consciousness, their emaculated delight in brooding over and toying with matters which healthy, manly men put out of their thoughts, not by an effort, but unconsciously, by a natural and wholesome instinct—it is, in short, their utter unmanliness which is at once so disgusting, and, so far as they exercise any influence, so mischievous. And on the whole we are not sure that Mr. Rossetti's poetry is not more mischievous in its way than Mr. Swinburne's. In the latter there is at times a fitful breeziness from out-of-doors, while with Mr. Rossetti the shutters seem to be always closed, the blinds down, there are candles for sunshine, and the atmosphere is of a close heavy kind that reminds one alternately of the sick-room and the conservatory, so that one longs, even in the midst of genuine admiration for so much artistic subtlety, to fling open a window and let in some honest daylight and some good fresh air. At the same time, while there is, as we think, much that is unhealthy in the author of the "Blessed Damsel" as well as in the author of "Dolores" and "Anactoria," the most objectionable of their writings necessarily appear far worse when carefully extracted and served up by themselves, as in Mr. Buchanan's pamphlet, than in their original form. A reader who was not sharply on the look-out for such things might pass over not a few of them in a book without detecting the evil meanings which Mr. Buchanan has exerted himself to make quite plain; while other passages of which probably no one could mistake the purport look even more repulsive when detached from the context. In some of the expurgated editions of the classics the naughty passages used to be collected into supplements, where any one with a taste that way could find them at once without the trouble of searching for them; and Mr. Buchanan's brochure is a handy catalogue of a similar kind. We certainly cannot recommend it for general perusal. Even Baudelaire, we should imagine, must be less harmful in the original than when his foulest is condensed, pointed, italicized, and generally elucidated by Mr. Buchanan's purring ingenuity. There is much autobiographical matter in the pamphlet which can hardly be said to have any present value. Some day perhaps it may be interesting to the world to know that Mr. Buchanan relishes Walt Whitman, that he "beguiles many an hour, when snug at anchor in some lovely Highland loch," with Paul de Kock, and that generally he is well up in selectos literature, and not at all a purist. To some there may seem to be an inconsistency in any one who enjoys Walt Whitman being shocked by Mr. Rossetti, and put to the blush by the latest fashion in lollipops whenever he enters a confectioner's shop. There is unhappily a spreading taint of sensualism, which may be traced in various directions at the present moment, but it may be seriously doubted whether such productions as this pamphlet are not calculated rather to minister to than to check it.

LIFE OF SIR HENRY LAWRENCE.*

(Second Notice.)

LORD MACAULAY was once indignant, and not unjustly, with an editor who, in publishing an edition of his speeches, made him talk about "the Pandects of the Benares." Mr. Merivale does not need to be informed what sort of a thing a Pandit is, and where Benares is situated. But there are misnomers and misprints, as well as innumerable errors, in the two volumes before us, especially in the second, for which the editor, by his own admission, must be held mainly responsible. It is no answer to urge that Indian terms are strange, and that Oriental spelling is capricious. We shall give a few examples to justify these strictures. At page 120 it is stated that Lord Dalhousie was forty-two years of age when appointed to the office of Governor-General. The truth is, he was barely thirty-six, having been born in 1812, and nominated in 1847. In November 1852 Sir H. Lawrence is represented as writing to congratulate the late Lord Hardinge, then in England, on his promotion to a viscounty. The fact is that the title was conferred in 1846, after the first Sikh war, as may be seen in any contemporary history, or in Burke. The congratulations probably referred to the succession of Lord Hardinge to the office of Commander-in-Chief, vacated by the death of the Duke of Wellington in September 1852. Kerowlie, a chieftainship in Rajpootana is in one place obviously meant for the hill-station of Kussowlie. Malikari is put for Motharee, or Chumparun. The grandson of Runjeet Sing was Nao Nihal, and not Rao Nihal Sing. Kagnath is put for Raghunath; Nil Main for Nil Mani; holder for biddar; the well-known and able Sikh Dewan or Chancellor is mentioned as Daana Nath and Dina Natta, instead of Dinonath; Sheikh Imamuddin becomes Namuddin, and so on. We apprehend Jowehia Sing to be intended for Jawahir Sing. We doubt very much if there can be such a mountain as "Paraputnath" visible from Khatmandoo. There is doubtless a Parasnath in the Himalayas as elsewhere. The word "nugger," or right, is put into the mouth of a Rajpoot prince, when probably "nyaya" or "huk" was said and written. Then we have Coooper for Cooper, Hogge for Hogg, and Reynold for Reynell Taylor. Natives do not wear chupans, but chupans. Pootlee, English readers require to be told, means puppet, or, in Carlylese, a sham and windbag. Mr. H. C. Tucker was not at Allahabad during the mutiny, but at Benares, at which place he nobly earned, and got, his O.B.ship. We may observe further that an offensive paragraph about the views entertained by Mr. George Campbell, the present able Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal (p. 260, vol. ii.), might very well have been omitted. It is not just, and Sir H. Lawrence himself, on a calm review, would have been the first person to strike it out. Again, at page 383, Mr. Merivale says that, "as Lord Canning died in India," Sir Henry, had he lived, would have succeeded to the Viceroyalty; and the editor then goes on to say, that Sir W. Denison succeeded on Lord Canning's death. The real state of things is, that Lord Elgin relieved Lord Canning, in India, in March 1862; that the ex-Viceroy died in England, in June of the same year; and that Lord Elgin died as Viceroy in the Himalayas in November 1863, after a rule of some twenty months, whereupon Sir W. Denison was summoned from Madras until the arrival of Lord Lawrence. All these mistakes might have been avoided if the editor had only taken the trouble to send his proofs to some member of the family, or to some unattached Indian officer, at home on furlough. His position as biographer, and his connexion with the India Office, rendered this duty as easy as it was imperative. Putting aside these annoying blunders, the letterpress is good. The correspondence is well-selected and well woven together; the character is drawn without adulation, and without concealment of those imperfections which do not, after all, impair its high worth and dignity; and the result is that we have a valuable addition to that mass of biographical literature which conveys more sound and practical teaching than volumes of homilies and sermons.

We now take up Lawrence's career as Resident of Nepal. No place at a native Court can be other than important, although, owing to the extreme jealousy of English interference or advice, and to its comparative isolation, there is much less to do at Khatmandoo than there is at Mount Aboo, Hyderabad, Baroda, or even Cashmere. While there, Lawrence actually witnessed a Suttee, and his description of this extraordinary rite might, with a very few alterations, take the place of that given by Diodorus Siculus as an episode of the contest between Eumenes and Antiochus, at an interval of some twenty centuries. He had also ample leisure for those literary pursuits of which, as giving significance and variety to his active career, he had always been fond. But the time was at hand when he was to put in practice his early theories and speculations in a wide and a worthy field. Major Broadfoot, who had been brought up from the Tenasserim Provinces to succeed Colonel Richmond on the frontier, was killed as he was riding close to Lord Hardinge in the Sikh entrenchments at Ferozshah. Lawrence was at once sent for to fill the vacancy, and with a promptitude worthy of Napier himself he joined the camp of the Sutlej in five days. After the battle of Sobraon the Governor-General, as he told the Sikh Vakil that he would do, dictated peace under the walls of Lahore. The tract called the Jullunder Doab, comprising three fine districts and lying between the Sutlej and the river Beas, was annexed, and Mr. John Lawrence was sent for from Delhi and made its Commissioner. It is curious that Mr. Merivale gives the Chenab as the boundary of this tract in one passage, and in another calls it the Cis-Sutlej division. The boundaries are as we have given them above, and the Commissionership has always been known as that of the Trans-Sutlej districts. The occupation of Lahore, the transfer of Cashmere to Maharaja Gholab Sing, and the administration of the empire of Runjeet by a Council of Regency, with Lawrence at its head, for the benefit of the minor who is now amongst us as a visitor, with other incidents, have long been matter of history, and we need not now dwell on them. Mr. Merivale refers to the slight émeute at Lahore, which was apparently caused by the conduct of a sentry who wounded one of a string of bullocks at a gateway. In reality, the affair was a protest against cow-killing. Mr. Merivale does not mention a well-known saying of the time which Sir Herbert Edwardes would in all probability have recorded. Edwardes, while riding through the streets of Lahore in attendance on his chief, who wished to quiet the people, was struck on the head by a brickbat, and it was said that, in revenge for the ill-treatment of the sacred animals, the cows, the Sikhs had broken the head of our "Brahmicide Bull"; this being the nom de plume which is alluded to in one of the letters, and under which a few years previously Edwardes had written a series of animated papers which had brought him into notice. The refusal of Sheikh Imamuddin to deliver up Cashmere to our ally and tributary, and the conspiracy and trial of Lal Sing, are now forgotten except by the diligent student of Indian history. But Mr. Merivale, quoting from the Calcutta Review, truly remarks that the "feat of compelling the culpable Lahore Durbar, with its chief conspirator, Lal Sing, at its head, to make over, in the most marked and humiliating manner, the richest province in the Punjab, to the one man most detested by the Khales, was the real victory of the campaign." It illustrates some of the best points in Lawrence's character—his tact, firmness, personal influence, and power to carry out a settled policy in defiance of all opposition and intrigue.

* Life of Sir Henry Lawrence. By the late Major-General Sir Herbert Benjamin Edwards, K.C.B., K.C.S.I., and Herman Merivale, Esq., C.B. &c. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1872.

We must pass over the events of the second Sikh campaign. Lawrence left India for a time, with Lord Hardinge, trusting that matters would run a smooth course in his absence. He returned within the year to find the Sikh army in the field, the Regency dissolved, annexation impending as a positive necessity, and the great Proconsul, as he has been termed, ready to avail himself of the services of Lawrence and his brother in making the country of the Five Rivers not merely a barrier against invasion from the North, but a well-ordered and civilized province, if not a model to other Presidencies and administrators. The story of the pacification, settlement, and progress of the Punjab has often been told in Anglo-Indian literature. After making every allowance for the favourable circumstances of the period, the picked officials, the eminent talents of the two brothers who were the mainsprings of the Commission, the wide arena, the large discretion conceded, and the vigorous will of the Governor-General, we must still pronounce this policy to be an unprecedented success. For nearly four years did Henry Lawrence labour as President of the Board at Lahore, and the termination of his connexion with that body and with the province was brought about by circumstances which, if annoying to a quick and sensitive spirit, are not in the least derogatory to his fame and character. This epoch, fraught with administrative triumphs for the Government and with benefits for the population, gave rise to important differences between Henry Lawrence and his brother John, which ended only as such discussions must end in any Cabinet, Council, Board, or Commission in the world. The story is fully and impartially told by Mr. Merivale. Henry Lawrence held views in regard to the native aristocracy, rent, free grants, resumptions, proprietorship, tenant-right, and so forth, very dissimilar to those of his brother. For some time these controversies were productive only of delay, deliberation, and ultimate good. After a while they became an impediment to business, and almost a discredit to the State. Lord Dalhousie sided with the younger brother, and, taking advantage of a hint as to retirement thrown out by the President of the Board, made him the offer of the Residentsip of Rajpootana. This was accepted by Henry Lawrence, not of course without mortification; the Board was dissolved, a Chief Commissionership was created and bestowed upon John Lawrence, and the elder brother retired from the province where years before he had gained his first diplomatic honours, and where he had so successfully laboured to reconcile a proud and warlike population to the burden as well as to the advantage of our unbending rule. Mr. Merivale appears to think, and so do we, that Lord Dalhousie's conduct was neither unjust nor unreasonable, and that, in fact, he had no option in the course which he took. Any Viceroy and leader of men, more especially one of the vigorous and determined character of Lord Dalhousie, must be allowed to enforce his own policy, through his own agents, in his own fashion. And however the personal friends and adherents of Henry Lawrence—and they were neither few nor unimportant—might regret the termination of the controversy, it could have ended in no other way. The extremely creditable part of the affair is that it produced neither alienation nor personal ill-feeling between the two brothers. They continued to correspond on terms of regard and affection to the end, and, as Lord Campbell remarks of the two brothers Scott, they stood that trial of prosperity which is often a more searching test than very marked inequality of fortune. But it must not be imagined that Lord Dalhousie undervalued the character and services of Henry Lawrence. He retired from the Punjab with honour and emoluments to fill what was then the highest post at the disposal of Government, the Residentsip in Rajpootana. That of Hyderabad, when vacated by General Low for a seat in Council, was offered to him soon afterwards; and we learn for the first time from these volumes that it had been the wish of the same Governor-General to send Lawrence to Oudh about the time of annexation.

In Rajpootana Lawrence found a by no means uncongenial field for the exercise of his talents, in temperately advising, quietly reproving, and honestly encouraging, its high-spirited chiefs; and here, as elsewhere, his just perceptions of Oriental character preserved him from the error of soothing folly and exalting vice. But there now befell him a calamity to which all official worries, disappointments, or vicissitudes were as nothing. The health of Lady Lawrence had been for some time declining, and she died in January 1854. These two volumes contain abundant proof of the strength, delicacy, and purity of her nature, of the admiration and respect which she inspired in her own circle, and of the devotion with which she was regarded by her husband. No more worthy Englishwoman has ever shared the honours or lessened the sorrows and anxieties of an Indian career.

The remainder of Lawrence's career in Rajpootana has some interest, but little of animation. In spite of failing strength and irreparable bereavement, he still continued at his post, devoted to work, and full of original plans and useful speculations in politics. The end was now nigh. General Outram, who had been sent to Oudh, which was a hotbed of controversy, was required for the Persian campaign, and Lawrence was selected by Lord Canning to fill the vacancy at Lucknow. He reached his post towards the end of March 1857, when the first low mutterings of thunder had already announced the gathering of that tempest which was destined to dissolve an army, to reduce an administration to chaos, to bring to light no trifling array of defects and errors, and yet to result in the sudden making or vindication of many noble names. If anything could have arrested or crushed the rebellious spirit of the sepoys, it would have been the presence and attitude of men like Henry Lawrence. But things had gone too far to be arrested by earnest expostulation, charm of manner, or personal influence. It is, however, mainly due to Lawrence's foresight, choice of situation, and collection of supplies and ammunition, that the garrison of Lucknow was enabled to make that stubborn and splendid resistance which has added another name to the catalogue of memorable sieges. On the 29th of June Lawrence led out his small force to the disastrous battle of Chinhut. On the evening of that day the siege may be said to have commenced. On the morning of the 2nd of July the shell was fired into the Residency which cost Lawrence his life. The affecting details of this incident, which are recorded by eye-witnesses, we shall not attempt to weaken by analysis or epitome. Nothing can be in better taste or keeping than the account selected or given by Mr. Merivale of the closing scene. The soldier and statesman was buried near the place where he fell, like another commander some fifty years before, amidst the roar of cannon which the foe was sullenly firing. The spot, amid the mouldering walls of the Residency, is already familiar to a score of tourists, not to speak of hundreds of Anglo-Indian officials.

Indian statesmen will find much food for thought and reflection, and something to criticize, in the opinions recorded by Sir H. Lawrence on some of the vexed problems of their time. But one point in his character cannot be too strongly recommended for imitation. A considerate patron of natives, zealous and vigilant for their rights and privileges, and tender to their very prejudices, Lawrence was never for one moment blind to the radical defects of the Oriental temperament. One of his maxims was "that he never yet saw a native the better for yielding to him." Of the Rajpoots he writes that there is "little of any truth or honesty in them, and not much more manliness." In all his dealings with prince or peasant, envoy or subordinate, astute Brahmin or distrustful sepoy, there is the same courtesy and generosity, the same unvarying good faith and honour, and the same acute perception of the national vices. Some writers and administrators act towards the Hindoos as contemptuously as the countrymen of Cain the Censor would have acted to the Greeks of the Lower Empire; others accept success in a competitive examination and the veneer and varnish of English literature as complete testimonials to moral and political worth, and are quite willing to believe that a young native who can quote Milton and write a speech in English must necessarily be fitted to rule over a subject community of Asiatics and Europeans, and to represent the governing power on the banks of the Jumna or the Jhelum. Lawrence was the slave of no such idols. He read the native character as a practised Oriental scholar reads off his Persian manuscript; but he showed, in his sayings and doings, that happy mixture of conciliation and firmness which commands reverence from Orientals, and by which they must be ruled. Amidst all his dislike to annexation and encroachment, it is somewhat startling to find that he would have been quite prepared to take the kingdom of Nepal if the Ghoras gave trouble, and so to complete "a splendid frontier in the Snowy Mountains." In respect of Afghanistan he correctly marked out one part of the policy which was subsequently adopted by his brother, and consummated by Lord Mayo. He deprecated what several alarmists and editors have advocated, "poking interference," and the deputation of an armed force beyond the Khyber. In one or two other points his prescience seems to have been at fault. It has been found prudent and politic to send money, and not men, to Cabul. And it is not "nonsense to put natives into Council, or to make them Sudder Judges." On the contrary, three natives have in succession justified their elevation to the bench of the High Court of Calcutta; and their nomination to Councils, in all three Presidencies, has had the double effect of gratifying national self-love and of bringing a fund of practical experience to the discussion of various troublesome questions. What natives are not yet fitted for is an executive position which demands impartiality in dealing with conflicting interests, vigour and promptness in action, and readiness to assume responsibility.

The happiest conception of Lawrence's career was the asylum which bears his name. It is designed for the education of the children, especially the daughters, of English soldiers. To this object he gave his time, his savings, and his influence; and the institution which he erected at Sanawar, near Kussowlie, on the first ridge of the Himalayas, has served as a model for similar institutions elsewhere. A tablet to the memory of Lady Lawrence adorns the walls of this asylum; and we may here mention, what apparently has escaped Mr. Merivale, that an excellent statue of her husband may be seen in St. Paul's. The eldest son, who entered the civil service, was killed by a fall from a bridge while travelling through the Himalayas during the Viceroyalty of his uncle, and the posthumous and hereditary honours are now borne by Sir Henry's grandson. One little girl, called after the sister so often named in the correspondence, lies buried at the hill station of Subathoo, and a son and daughter still survive their high-minded father.

The reader of this biography will hardly need to be informed that Henry Lawrence was often hot and impetuous, sensitive to criticism, and prone to assume that men were personally hostile to him when he could not exactly have his own way. But these are precisely the infirmities which we might expect in a quick, thoughtful, and chivalrous temperament. Like all who are born to lead, he founded an official school of his own, and his memory is still cherished by numerous adherents and friends. Not to speak of the proffered Viceroyalty, which he did not live to hear of, he had, in his day, esteem and honour sufficient to stimulate a laudable ambition in the profession and in the country in which these volumes will have the widest circulation and will create the liveliest interest. But the story of such a life and death, of difficulties so manfully encountered, of earnestness at the last so tempered by charity, and of duty so nobly performed, may well be read with advantage by young Englishmen of every class and profession.

LUCY FITZADAM.*

WHEN it falls to our lot to read a new novel by an unknown author a faint hope sometimes occurs to us that we may be witnessing the first appearance of a Miss Austen or a Miss Brontë. Every now and then we see that some bold critic announces that such a phenomenon has actually risen above the literary horizon. A good many years, however, have elapsed since any such confident announcement has been justified. We would not say that the art of novel-writing is decaying; for some authors of established reputation are still amongst us, and, as we may hope, are still capable of repeating their early triumphs. But it is about time that new candidates for the higher honours of the profession should be making their appearance; and whenever we come across a few sentences showing real freshness of imagination, or a touch of genuine humour, we hope for a few moments that our weary waiting is about to meet with its reward. Lucy Fitzadam, the book before us, is certainly not destined to create such a sensation as Jane Eyre or the Scenes of Clerical Life. Indeed, we may say at once that it is not likely to be a popular story. In spite of certain merits, it has, as we shall presently remark, some very serious faults, and faults which are precisely of the kind most likely to hinder a decided success. And yet it also has merits sufficiently rare to justify the hope that its author may do well when she has gained more literary experience. We do not mean to say that she is likely to rival the eminent novelists whom we have mentioned; nor, indeed, is it ever safe to assume that faults which we set down to inexperience may not grow more instead of less conspicuous. Unluckily the cases are numerous in which the tares have more vitality than the wheat; and the good qualities which have led us to prognosticate success make themselves less evident at every successive attempt. However, it is our duty to be critics, not prophets; and we shall therefore be content to indicate the merits which induce us to expect better things from the author of Lucy Fitzadam, and the faults which at present materially interfere with our enjoyment. Which of them will succeed in choking the other is a question which must be left to the decision of time.

We may say then that, in the first place, the author has a pleasant sense of humour, and a keen perception of character. Although the novel is in the form of an autobiography, and the lady has to describe her successful lover, he is not, singular to relate, an unmitigated prig, or an impossible mass of perfection. The writing reminds us occasionally of Miss Brontë, though it does not venture into the same flights of rhetoric, or deal with the same vehement passions; still we seem every now and then to catch the same tone, though the resemblance is perhaps heightened by the fact that the scene is partly laid in the district of Yorkshire described in Jane Eyre and Shirley. The eloquence, however, is tempered by a good deal of pleasant ridicule bestowed upon her own girlish impulsiveness by the supposed autobiographer. Then there is much smart but kindly satire of life in a small country town, and of the religious eccentricities of various old maids and clergymen. Unluckily these good qualities are wasted on a story of extremely awkward construction. The author, we should fancy, is unduly troubled by the fear of being dull. Her unfortunate heroine is kept constantly on the move, and we have in the two volumes sketches of life in Somersetshire, in a London suburb, and in Yorkshire. Such a shifting of scenery, unless well managed, is apt to be prejudicial to the due harmony of effect. It is the more vexatious in this case because we cannot help fancying that the young lady is sent on her travels, not from regard to the exigencies of the story, but because the author had a few descriptions of these different districts on hand. The consequence is that the devices by which these movements are brought about are of a very clumsy character. The heroine, for example, receives an anonymous communication in London, to which place she has retired for no very intelligible reason, stating that her lover is the father of an illegitimate child born in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Instead of acquainting her lover, as she was bound to do in common justice, with this imputation on his character, she goes off by herself to Yorkshire, ostensibly that she may inspect the register of births, which could throw no light upon the subject, but really that she may give an opportunity for a description of the moors near Ingleborough and Penigent. The whole expedition is otherwise palpably absurd and beside the purpose; and, what is worse, it involves maintaining a very silly mystery and then telling the story backwards, after the dreary old fashion, by a long series of mutual explanations. We will venture to suggest to the author that, though we have no objection on principle to murder, seduction, or any other desirable mode of giving interest to a novel, we always resent having the narrative dealt out to us in this vexatiously roundabout method. Nothing, we take it, was a greater mistake in point of art than the old custom favoured by Sir Walter Scott, and other less eminent authorities, of trying to cheat readers into taking interest in a story by concealing from them half the essential points till the last few pages. A story which has not enough intrinsic interest to bear being told straightforwardly is, as a general rule, a story which is not worth telling in any way to grown-up readers. The artifice is a childish one, or, at any rate, is only pardonable in fictions of very skilful construction. When the story, as in this case, is complicated, and yet uninteresting, it is not made more lively by being presented to us as a series of conundrums. We are only too apt to give them up.

In consequence of these defects, which are probably the result of the author's insufficient confidence in her powers, the story fails to produce the effect which the power of some passages encourages us to expect. It contains many good characters, touched with real skill and delicacy, and yet they bother us by their mutual misunderstandings and the complicated situations which they occupy with regard to each other. Our attention is demanded to particular details, such as the discovery of an old packet of letters, which afterwards prove to have no sufficient influence on the development of the narrative; and we venture strongly to recommend the author, on her next attempt, to take a simple plot worked by a smaller number of actors, and to spend more labour in making her situations intelligible and less in perplexing them by unnecessary mystery. The pleasantest part of the book is perhaps the character of the autobiographer herself, a young lady who, except that she is described as pretty, reminds us vaguely of a softened edition of Miss Brontë's later heroines. She is a quiet, demure little person on the surface, but with a capacity for strong emotion and for unexpectedly taking up very vigorous lines of action. She is indeed more young-ladylike and fickle in her proceedings, and has a keener eye for some of her own absurdities. She becomes the ardent disciple of a young ritualistic clergyman, who soon goes over to Rome, and then she is carried away by the enthusiasm of a stern Calvinist preacher. Presently, however, she is reconciled to her lover, a powerful young man, rather of the muscular type but not quite idiotic, and speedily discovers that his views, which are of the Broad Church variety, are the only ones that can satisfy her aspirations. She writes a letter to the questionable heroine, who is on the point of perversion, and expects to bring her to reason by arguments contained on three or four sides of a sheet of note-paper. This well-meant effort at serving the truth fails; but that is a fate which has attended many elaborate treatises of several hundred times the length; and, after all, it is possible that the persecuted Mrs. Thain had already read such arguments as this:—"My dear Margaret, the Romanist and the Dissenter alike sneer at her as a compromise. They are right in their definition, and only wrong in their decision. She is a compromise; but therein lies her chief glory and her brightest hope." The sentiments are excellent; but a more experienced controversialist would scarcely have expected them to be decisive in their influence. Miss Fitzadam, indeed, is not an experienced controversialist, nor even a strong-minded lady, in spite of her enthusiasm, and her impetuosity, and her lively emotions. But she is an agreeable young woman all the same, and with much more vitality in her than nine-tenths of the heroines whose acquaintance we are doomed to make. Round her are grouped a variety of people who are all more or less amusing in their way, such, for example, as the provincial "man of Rome," who prefaces his lecture on music to the native Lyceum by the statement that he possesses no knowledge of Handel, Mozart, and others, and that what he does not possess he cannot communicate, and who then plunges into an account of the influence he has exerted during a residence of eighty years in the town; then states that he has written to the Secretary of State, suggesting the legislative protection of nightingales, and received no answer; and winds up by quotations from Dryden about heavenly harmony and the celebrated epigram as to tweedledum and tweedledee. Then we have a good specimen of the absent-minded and benevolent friend of the family, who is fond of vindicating the ways of Providence, and observes, opropos of the severe illness of the father of the family, whose progress to health is unpleasantly slow, that "all the mightiest operations of nature are gradual and inensible. Take, for instance, the earthquake." These and a good many other sketches show a happy, if not a very profound, vein of humour, which comes into agreeable contrast with more serious passages. We will not, however, indulge in any more quotations, which, to do them justice, must be given at greater length than our space will afford. We will content ourselves with observing that, if we have not discovered the coming novelist in the author of Lucy Fitzadam—a person for whom we may not improbably have still a long time to wait—we are glad to admit that her first attempt is creditable, and shows capacities which, when she better understands her own strong points, may be turned to much better account.

* Lucy Fitzadam. An Autobiography. 2 vols. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1872.

KING'S SIERRA NEVADA.*

THE general scientific results of the Geological Survey of California conducted by Professor Whitney have already formed the subject of an interesting volume, the forerunner, we are glad to be assured, of others dealing with the subordinate divisions or aspects of the inquiry. So practically inexhaustible, as well as so comparatively new, are the geography and physical character of this part of the American continent, that we are predisposed to welcome any contribution to our knowledge which comes to us at first hand with the guarantee of personal observation and experience, or with the authority of technical acquaintance with the class of facts under investigation. The adventures and experiences of the surveying party have been treated in a less severe or more popular manner by Mr. Clarence King, a member of the Professor's staff, in Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada. With enough of scientific detail to afford a clear and instructive outline of the natural features of that most remarkable country, Mr. King's narrative combines a liveliness of perception and a graphic skill in portraying what meets his eye which will serve to recommend his work to the larger class of readers in general. Whether in face of the stupendous scenery of this mountain chain, or in the companionship with new and abnormal types of life here forced upon the traveller or the explorer, he shows that he possesses the gift of making himself thoroughly at home, together with the art of admitting his readers into fellowship with what he sees and sympathetic enjoyment of what he feels.

Mr. King devotes his opening chapter to a rapid survey of the mighty range of Western America in its general aspect—the whole series of rocky fastnesses which seem built up as a bulwark against the slowly invading billows of the Pacific. The grandest by far is the Sierra Nevada, a long and massive uplift dividing the arid desert of the Great Basin and the boundless Californian wealth of plain and valley. To the Sierras belong a structure and a physical character which are individual and unique. Their geological history goes far back to a time when the Atlantic and the Pacific formed one ocean, from whose accumulated depths of sand and stony debris was gradually upheaved in Palæozoic, or perhaps even in Asiatic ages, what is now the upper ridge of that mighty crest from which a wide continent stretches away on either hand from sea to sea. The result of the official survey is to refer to an early date in the Jurassic period the main elevation of this great sea-floor—a series of continuous upheavals, forming the mountain framework of the Western States, reaching as far east as Middle Wyoming and stretching from Mexico probably as far as Alaska. We should like to see Mr. King's proofs of the sudden outpouring of "wide zones of granite" through the yawning fissures and ruptured arcs of these Jurassic rock masses. Are we to infer that the granite is found widely and evenly overlying sedimentary deposits? Such at least is not the way in which we should expect a geologist to speak of merely eruptive or intrusive veins of igneous rock breaking, however widely, the continuity of aqueous stratification. It was probably a shrinking of the mass of the continent which in the late Tertiary period tilted once more the floor of the ocean, thickly laid from cretaceous and early Tertiary deposits. During all this period the Pacific waves were away the western base of the Sierra Nevada, while wide and deep cañons were furrowed out of the mountain ridges by torrents which poured their freight of detritus in volumes into the sea. Then appeared the present system of coast ranges. The intermediate depression or trough, as it is called by Mr. King, forms the valley of California, and is therefore a more recent continental feature than the Sierra Nevada. Subsequent to this was the second great igneous outbreak, when sheets of lava poured down the slopes of the Sierra, when along the whole Pacific coast innumerable volcanic vents opened forth their fountains of fire, and groups of islands were thrown up from the bosom of the sea. Next came the Glacial age, when the Sierras formed one broad field of snow, when gigantic glaciers scooped out the forms of valleys, and scored their marks of growth and descent upon the rocky slopes. Finally ensued the present condition of mountain and valley which Mr. King makes it his task to portray. For the execution of this part of his work he thinks fit to apologise as desultory and inadequate; but it is only fair to him to bear in mind that his book is not so much of a scientific or systematic kind as a sketch of travel and adventure.

Whilst on duty at the Mariposa gold mines during the winter of 1864 Mr. King had been led by many observations of the High Sierra to fix upon a vast pile of white peaks, calculated by him to lie near the head of the King's and Kaweah rivers, as the crowning summit of the Nevada range. Induced by his representations, Professor Whitney during the ensuing summer proceeded to organize, under charge of Professor Brewer, a commission to explore and survey the new Alps, to which the author was attached as assistant geologist. From their camp, on an outlying spur of the great granite barrier, where their equipment was organized and the training of their Indian guides matured, Mr. King and his chosen companion Cotter set forth upon one of the most desperate enterprises recorded in the annals of travel, the ascent of those tempting peaks pronounced inaccessible by the experienced heads of the Survey. Lost for three days to their party below, who had sadly begun letters home reporting them missing beyond hope, this adventurous pair strove against physical risks and sufferings from climate exceeding all that we have heard from the lips of mountaineers. Each had to carry a knapsack forty pounds in weight, and their shoulders were soon worn into a black and blue state. What with barometer, compass, pocket-level, wet and dry bulb thermometer, note-books, cooked beans and venison enough for a week, with wraps and cooking utensils, they were terribly handicapped over this precipitous upward course. Frozen venison and miserably tepid tea, made by the aid of shavings from the barometer case, formed a poor breakfast after a night spent upon a sheet of granite, the pair hugging together to get warm. Their backs gradually petrified until they "whirled over and thawed them out together," and dozed again, "chocking themselves up with bits of granite inserted under their ribs and shoulders." In the face of the hard sheer front of precipices, only broken here and there into splintered projections, crevices, or shelves of granite, the sole chance was to lasso by a skillful upward throw some block or spire of rock, and haul up themselves and their precious load, dangling often over abysses thousands of feet in depth. Once safely landed upon the thin blade of a ridge thus perilously scaled, they had to work slowly along astride, only to find on reaching the summit the mighty gorge of the King's cañon, five thousand feet deep, forbidding their advance to the north, and the broader, though less deep, valley of the Kern river to the south. Their only hope lay in a descent of the Kern side of the defile, which, aided by the lasso, they effected by successive slides or drops from shelf to shelf, reaching the lowest level by a glissade and summersault down the long smooth snow slope, shooting out with the momentum like cannon-balls well nigh to the middle of the frozen lake. Through the thin transparent ice film, which cracked in all directions under them, they could see far down into the depths below. Our great wonder is how the precious barometer, generally borne with such gentle solicitude and care, survived the tremendous series of shocks. From the base of the great white mountain, climbing at first with difficulty in the dim moonlight two hours before dawn, the adventurous climbers, leaving their knapsacks at their camping place, and taking only their instruments, made good their foothold from ledge to ledge of the opposing granite wall, and at noon clasping hands over the top-most crest, reverently named the grand peak Mount Tyndall. To their surprise two still higher peaks were to be made out through the glass, to one of which, whose glorious summit, apparently inaccessible, is considered by Mr. King the highest point within the United States, they gave the name of Mount Whitney, disowning in consequence Shasta, with its volcanic peak of 14,400 feet, the ascent of which by the author, told in a later chapter, forms one of the most vivid incidents in the work. His book being unaccompanied by any kind of map or geographical outline whatever, the reader is unfairly thrown upon his own resources for the means of verifying a point upon the globe for which neither latitude nor longitude is given by the writer who announces the discovery. An omission so strange as this is enough to take away all scientific value from Mr. King's work. There are not many readers who have at hand the maps of the **Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada*. By Clarence King. Boston, U.S. :

United States Survey. We may add that whatever pretensions our author may possess to a critical knowledge of the fine arts must be forfeited by his ridiculous profession of belief that Gothic architecture was directly inspired by granite forms:—

As I sat on Mount Tyndall, the whole mountains shaped themselves like the ruins of cathedrals—sharp roof-ridges, pinnacled and stained; buttresses more spirited and ornamented than Milan's; receding doorways with pointed arches carved into blank facades of granite, doors never to be opened, innumerable jutting points, with here and there a single cruciform peak, its frozen roof and granite spires so strikingly Gothic, I cannot doubt that the Alps furnished the models for early cathedrals of that order.

Of the Yosemite Valley, the towering grandeur of El Capitan, the mystic beauty of the Bridal Veil, or the giant vegetation of the Mariposa and the Merced, Mr King has not much to add to the very full and interesting Official Survey put forth by the Government of California, and reviewed in our columns a year and a half ago. There is, however, much force and picturesqueness in his description of a Sierra storm to which he and his party were exposed on the brink of the great cañon, where the granite wall went sheer down three thousand feet. Cowering under their blankets, the weight of which gradually became harder to bear, the party, freeing themselves by a sudden effort, found around them snow a foot and a half in depth. The great firs below were seen like solid cones of snow, now and then unloading themselves when severely bent by a sudden gust, and filling the air with dry white powder. During a momentary lull in the fury of the storm, a loud roar from Capitan heralded the fall of an avalanche, which, gathering volume and swiftness as it rushed from the dome-like summit to the brink, leaped out two or three hundred feet into space, filtering through the air till it floated like a silver cloud and reached the valley depth in faint blue mist. The Cathedral, Three Brothers, and Cloud's Nest, shot off in turn their mighty loads of snow, filling the air with their thunder, their pulverised masses sinking into the sea of purple cloud below. The tempest breaking out again with redoubled fury, effects on an unexampled scale of grandeur were displayed. "Strange games seemed to be played by the whirlwind with the fall of the Yosemite, of which the whole lip was filled to the brim, and poured forth its broad torrent of white." At one time a gust rushed upon the lip of the fall with such force as to dam back all its waters, the white pile or column retreating upwards until not a drop of water poured down the wall. This sight, familiar to all who see much of falls or shoots of water on a lesser scale, must have been inexpressibly grand where a flood of the volume of the Yosemite rushed over a cliff two thousand feet and more in height. Gathering strength after a while, the torrent overcame the wind, rushed out with tremendous violence, leaped a hundred and fifty feet straight out into the air, and fell clear to the rocks below, dashing high and white again, and breaking into a cloud of spray that filled the lower part of the Valley for a mile. At times the whole mighty cataract swung to and fro like a pendulum. Anon the whole mass was gathered up in a fathom, and whirled back over the summit of the walls. Mr King got out the theodolite to measure the angle of its deflection, which he found to be carried round an entire semicircle. "A very frequent prank was to loop the whole twenty-six hundred feet of cataract into a single semicircular festoon, which fell in the form of fine fringe."

While showing himself to possess an eye and a pen for the most impressive aspects of nature, Mr King is, if possible, even more at home in delineating the native features of character. In the "Newtys of Pike" he has given us a sketch of the raciest and most original kind. Wanderers twenty years before from Pike county, Missouri, widely known for his hogs, Mr. Newt, a keen New Englander, and his wife, the daughter of an Arkansas judge, had sought out a snug rancho, which at the end of ten years was improved into "the neatest little warm fence this side of Pike county." Here our traveller came by night upon the whole family asleep in the open, with their feet to the fire, ill-covered by a heap of old and half-bald buffalo robes. Besides the father, mother, and two small children, there lay Susan, a "mighty girl," waxy over the fire her "number eleven shoes"; the factotum, as it turned out, of the family, the door of the honours to guests, the special guardian of the family wealth in hogs, two acres of which she tended with affectionate pride, knowing each particular hog by its physiognomy, having, as she said, "growed with 'em." After assisting at our traveller's toilet by the brook, this Nausicaa of the Far West accepted with maidenly joy the offer of his pocket comb and glass. A magnificent rough-rider, whom no amount of bush-jumping could dismount, Susan on her prancing mustang set her guest upon his way with maddening repetitions of what, it would seem, forms the adieu of the backwoods—"You'll take care of yourself now, won't you?" backed by the father's significant, not to say inviting hint, "That—that—that man what gets Susan her half the hogs!" The family heart has meanwhile unbosomed itself in the course of a chat which makes a most amusing chapter. In "Kaweah's Run" there are descriptive powers which go far to raise the race for life of the high-couraged, faithful horse of the Tulara prairie to the level of a rivalry in prose with the Ride to Ghent. Throughout his book Mr. King gives signs of literary power which needed but to be wielded with more regular effort, to be trained in more artistic methods of handling his materials, and to be supported by greater skill and taste on the part of his publisher, to bring Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada up to the highest standard among compositions of its class.

MY WIFE AND I IN QUEENSLAND.

A BOOK of travels must, generally speaking, be badly written if it does not raise in the reader's mind a strong desire to go and see the places described. At one time or other there is scarcely a country that we have not vowed we will visit as soon as we shall have attained that length of purse and that freedom from all engagements which will allow us to turn our steps East, West, South, or North, as our fancy may guide us. We have projected many a tour to the Arctic regions, and hope to spend one winter at least high up in Smith's Sound, where we may see all the wonders of the Northern lights and be repaid for one long night by one unbroken day. We have pored over the map of the Pacific, and looked forward to the time when in our yacht we shall sail from one island to another, and see the rings of coral enclosing each their patch of the bluest water. We have even been so far seduced as to long with Mr. Wallace to visit the Eastern Archipelago and to brave all that assemblage of horrors, animate and inanimate, which those regions can boast of, in the desire to see nature in her unrivalled luxuriance. Our chief difficulty is how to divide the years that we may be able to spare for our travels, and how to choose in whose track we shall follow. We could, we think, willingly join in a game of Follow-my-leader over the world; but when we have Darwin, and Baker, and Palgrave, and Livingstone, and a host of others to show the way, our leaders are so many, and the path which each takes is so inviting, that we scarcely know which to follow, and so perhaps in our perplexity may end by remaining at home. To all this, however, there is one exception. We can read of Australia without becoming restless, and we can watch from the Thames or Mersey some large ship setting sail for Sydney or Melbourne without having the smallest wish to embark. In that vast continent there is no doubt variety to be found, stretching as it does over nearly thirty degrees of latitude. But what Mr. Darwin says of one of its great divisions may with equal truth, we believe, be said of all. He tells us in his Naturalist's Voyage Round the World that "the extreme uniformity of the vegetation is the most remarkable feature in the landscape of the greater part of New South Wales. Everywhere we have an open woodland, the ground being partially covered with a very thin pasture, with little appearance of verdure." Mr. Eden, who has spent eight years in Queensland, gives exactly the same account. He says:—

One of the great peculiarities of Australian scenery is its sameness, which is so remarkable that when you have been a few miles in the bush, you are as well acquainted with the features of the continent as after a journey of months. In nothing was I so much struck with this as in the rivers, which, whether large watercourses and dignified by the name of "river," or small tributaries called by the less sounding appellation "creeks," are exactly the same in every particular except size. I confess I always was under the impression that a river had water in it, but find that water is the last thing necessary to make one in Queensland.

Unvaried as are the natural features of the country, there are no associations about it to give it an interest and dignity of its own. Not only is it a continent without a history, but it is a continent without antiquities. There are nowhere to be found in it those vast remains of races long past away which are to be met with among the haunts of the red men of North America. And while it has little to reward the traveller, it has in a high degree all the discomforts which are bad enough in themselves, but which can nevertheless be borne when every day's journey is rewarded by its own scene of beauty or tradition.

Queensland seems to us to possess in the highest degree all the disadvantages and none of the advantages of the other great colonies of Australia. Some few years ago it was puffed up as a second Garden of Eden, but those who return from it scarcely seem to have succeeded in discovering its merits. Last year we noticed (Saturday Review, June 24, 1871) an interesting account of this colony by "A University Man." The author fairly enough owned, as we pointed out at the time, that his want of success was due quite as much to himself as to the colony. At the same time the picture that he drew seemed to be as truthful as it was uninviting. Still a country, however uninteresting to the traveller, may no doubt be admirably adapted for the colonist; and so long as it can afford in abundance the necessities and comforts of life, it can do without natural beauty and historic associations. Mr. Eden does not give us his balance-sheet, nor let us know in what state he quitted Queensland after eight years of such hardships and labours as a small farmer in England would look upon as intolerable. We fear, however, that he must have returned home empty in pocket, as we know that he returned "broken in health." Yet he seems to have been on the whole well fitted for colonial life, though he had all his experience to gain on the spot. He was not like "A University Man," incapable of severe bodily toil, nor averse to it. He was ready to turn his hand to anything, from dressing for two months together sheep with the foot-rot, to driving tunnels lying on his side at the bottom of a shaft in search of gold. On one occasion, he tells us, he walked 430 miles in seventeen days, and yet could have gone on further, he was "in such first-rate condition." And yet, after reading his book through, we can only find one thing in which he did not lose by leaving England and going to Queensland. He preserved his dignity. A gentleman may work with his hands as hard as he likes if he does it on the other side of the world, and may come back and publish an account of his daily toil. If his account is interesting, he will be all the better received by society. In the long sea-voyage home the marks of toil wear away from the hands, and manual labour, like the view, has enchantment lent to it by distance. As Mr. Eden says:—

* My Wife and I in Queensland: an Eight Years' Experience in the same Colony, with some Account of Polynesian Labour. By Charles H. Eden. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

A fact which should be borne in mind by all people reading Australian books, or who bend their thoughts in that direction, is, that in that country no one loses caste by performing bodily labour, indeed it is just the reverse, and the more a man can do for himself the better he will get on. I have seen an officer, late of a crack dragoon regiment, drive a dray laden with firewood to a house, sell, unload, and stack it himself, receive his money and drive off; and have met him that evening at a ball at the same house, and by virtue of the prefix to his name taking the hostess down to supper.

How much disappointment would be avoided if men who are too indolent or too fastidious to set to hard work in England would bring home to themselves the truth of this before they embark in search of a fool's paradise in Queensland! A shepherd's life in Australia, as in Arcadia, has cast around it, no doubt, a certain haze of poetic fancy. This haze, however, we have always found at once dispelled when we have on a summer's day met a flock of sheep on a turnpike road. Two months of tending sheep with the foot-rot is bad enough anywhere, but in Queensland labour seems to be attended by a host of miseries. There, as indeed everywhere else in Australia, there are great droughts, and in many places the water that can be found is often so foul that the thirsty labourer, before he can venture to drink it, has to boil it to get rid of the scum. With the drought come vast clouds of dust, and scarcely less vast clouds of flies, both of which cause a most painful form of eye disease. "During the summer," Mr. Eden says, "every two men you meet out of three have either the sandy or swelling blight—a species of ophthalmia. The first is insufferable torture, the feeling being that of hot sharp grains of sand between the eye and the eyelid." The other is not painful, but in Mr. Eden's words, "most disagreeable." The eye merely swells up to "the size of a flives or cricket-ball," having been poisoned by "flies coming off putrid carcasses." The only way to escape these flies indoors is to build your house without a single window in it. Mr. Eden insists greatly on this point, and says, "Neither do I approve of windows in any shape or form, for the darker a room is the less you are worried by flies." As there is no variety of prospect to see, and scarcely any books to read, a window may perhaps be easily dispensed with. But if darkness keeps out the flies, it does not keep out the snakes, which "render life hardly worth having, infesting the houses and getting into beds." So abundant are they that Mr. Eden says that, in his daily walk of a mile to fetch milk for his baby, "I don't think I ever went without seeing three or four deadly snakes cross the track close under my feet." Besides snakes there are poisonous centipedes, some nine inches long, equally fond of the house, which can inflict a wound the effects of which last for months. As if these were not enough, there are scorpions, tarantulas, white ants, bulldog ants, tree ants, huge hornets, mosquitoes, and sand flies. In the deep pools in the rivers there are alligators, one of which dragged down the ferryman who, in his rotten canoe, foundered when taking Mr. Eden over a river. There come also sudden floods which sweep away the labour of the whole year, hailstones which "riddle corrugated iron," and cyclones which tear "a new oilskin coat into ribbons in a minute." Should the lonely shepherd escape from all these miseries, he is likely enough to get his skull smashed in by a native's "nullah-nullah." Mr. Eden's brother-in-law and one of his shepherds were on different occasions both murdered in this manner. The death of a white man in each case leads to a savage retaliation on the natives, who get hunted down, not only by the whites, but by their own countrymen, who are enrolled in what is called the native police. From Mr. Eden's description it is easy to see that the native police differs only from the Cuban blood-hounds in so far as one pack is commanded by an Englishman, the other by a Spanish American. And yet there must be something in Queensland that counterbalances to no small extent those disadvantages, for Mr. Eden, when leaving his home in the bush, talks of "the happy time we passed there, enhanced as it was by the freedom from all worry and anxiety." We should as soon have expected to find the Egyptians as they pursued the Israelites to the Red Sea talk of the happy time they had just passed during the plagues of Egypt, enhanced as it was by the freedom from all worry and anxiety. Perhaps it is in the absence of all the bondage of respectability that the real charm is to be found. Many of us are already beginning to get impatient for our yearly month or six weeks of life on the mountains, where we may gratify to the full all those rude longings which after so many generations of civilized life have not yet become tamed down, but are still left us in no small force from our wild forefathers. There are others who must be wild the whole year through, and who regard a black coat and a hat with as much disfavour as the Australian savage does the scantiest of all garments. Such persons will find every desire gratified in Queensland, where respectability seems to be at its lowest ebb. Many young men, moreover, though they have no strong liking for the wild bush life, are nevertheless shipped over there by their friends, who are weary of their excesses in England and think that on the other side of the world, in some mysterious way, they will become reformed characters. As Mr. Eden remarks:—

There is a most erroneous opinion indulged in by many right-thinking people in England, that if a young man is wild and dissipated, the knock-about life of the Colonies will bring him to his bearings, and that in a few years he will steady down. Never was such a fatal error. Any vice which is established, even whilst under the restraint of a little self-respect, will break out with tenfold violence in a land where there is no vestige of restraint, and where these things are barely looked upon as wrong.

However much men may try to throw off all respectability, it is not in human nature to be entirely without an object of respect. In Queensland the power of hard drinking seems to be looked upon with admiration, and to come as near as anything else to those qualities which in England show a man's fitness for the office of churchwarden or common councilman. A man of whom it can be said that he is "a good drinking man" is, as our author tells us, "highly esteemed." Unfortunately, before that high reputation can be attained, the vast quantity and vile quality of the spirits needful to be drunk, combined with the excessive heat of the climate, sweep off numbers, the promise of whose youthful envious fate does not suffer to be fulfilled. Mr. Eden, however, was fortunate enough to come across one hero who managed before breakfast to swallow down "fifteen alcoholic drinks, and seemed not a whit the worse."

Mr. Eden has a long chapter in defence of the importation of Polynesian labour into the colony. From his own account it is evident that he must have seen but very little of the general working of that detestable system, and that from the experience of his own small plantation he judges of the whole. He was well served by a body of some twenty islanders, and from the smallness of his own party, and the strength and peculiarities of these Polynesian gentlemen, he asserts that he could not have oppressed them even if he would. They spent their Sundays in roaming through the bush, and, as he subsequently learnt, provided themselves with a cheerful Sunday repast by hunting down the natives. There is this to be said for them, that the natives would just as readily have eaten them as they ate the natives. Even, however, if this amiable weakness for that food which is generally known in the Pacific as "long pig" is looked upon as a complete proof that they are not people to be easily oppressed, it may nevertheless raise some degree of hesitation in the mind of any one who is thinking of establishing in Queensland a cotton or sugar plantation. It is good, no doubt, to be freed from all kinds of temptation, and from none more especially than from the temptation to oppress those beneath us. But whether the deterrent motive should consist in the liability of being turned into a Sunday dinner for one's labourers is another question. We would advise any one who has thoughts of settling in Queensland first to read Mr. Eden's book. Though the style is rather heavy, the matter is interesting. It does not read so well as Colonial Adventures and Experiences, by A University Man, to which we have already referred. Nevertheless it contains much more information, and would be a more useful guide, if any eccentric persons are still bent on settling in Queensland.

THE HOUSEHOLD COOKERY BOOK.*

NOTHING proves more thoroughly that our Continental neighbours are very far in advance of us in culinary skill and resource than a study of those methods which are accounted practical and elementary in the writings of Urban Dubois. His Artistic Cookery was far above us, of course; and we marvelled from our low level at his triumphal fabrics of paste and sugar, even when we could but smile at the grandiloquence wherewith he dilated on achievements in the field of taste which match those of his Imperial masters in the field of arms, and which apparently never failed to grace the board of German potentates whilst besieging Paris. But when, next in the series, was announced Cosmopolitan Cookery, and we thought to find with the dishes and sauces of all nations a condescension to rather obtuse and untravelled understandings in the ways of cookery, it must be owned that the result was disappointment; the recipes, as various and strange as the climes in which each was popular, involved appliances, resources, meats, and, above all, culinary nicety only conceivable in England by "Fin Rec" and the "Gastronomic Club," and the privileged circle which writes, as distinguished from that wider one which reads Knife and Fork. Even now, when the author's theme is cookery for the household, and the aim culinary instruction to the smallest kitchen, with lessons professedly limited to the furnishing a family meal or catering for a very limited guest-table, the thought that is most constantly present with the English reader and reviewer is, "Are not all these things greatly above us? do we not need to go to school again? should there not be a professorship of gastronomy, with a staff of peripatetic lecturers to go about and instil rudimentary ideas into those who purvey and those who consume the food which it will then be the Household Cookery Book's function to teach us how to dress? M. Dubois credits us with more civilization than we have attained unto, and "pitches his projects too high," through a fond belief that the grammar of gastronomy has been mastered far more widely and thoroughly in this country than is really the case. Even below the range of his Household Cookery Book there is room for something more elementary still; for the number of households capable of putting to full proof the excellent variety of his suggestions and methods is, we suspect, far more circumscribed than his philosophy dreams or conceives. It may be doubted, indeed, whether the English character can be educated into setting very great store upon fertility of invention as to hors-d'œuvre, made-dishes, and kickshaws; if it can, the Household Cookery Book, a little redressed, might very fairly become its manual in this branch of science. Yet there is wanting still a lower handbook furnishing data which every one ought to know in regard to what M. Dubois naturally deems the first business of life.

* The Household Cookery Book: Practical and Elementary Methods. By Urban Dubois, Author of the "Artistic Cookery," and the "Cosmopolitan Cookery." London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1872.

And this not only for the instruction of the mass of our cooks, who have yet to learn accuracy in weighing, timing, manipulating, and discriminating, but also of their masters and mistresses, and those whose palate they profess to serve. For example, at the outset of M. Dubois's "Household Cookery" there are some excellent hints as to carving at table—an art not to be allowed to die out so long as there are dinners à la française as well as à la russe, or, as is very much the case at moderate English dinner-parties, a kind of compromise between the two. We cannot indeed say that we take kindly to the "carving scissors" figured in p. 1, of which the author says that the combination in it of carving-knife and scissors makes it a great resource to those who know how to use it skilfully. But unless carvers take lessons in private, there would be a risk of unskilful handling, and it is perhaps better to endure the ills we have than to introduce at the table a third implement to which an unskilful dissector, sitting at the hostess's right hand, may at any time promiscuously resort to cover his own awkwardness, and delay the hopes of those who await a chicken wing or a merrythought. It seems doubtful whether three tools at disposal instead of two would enhance the opinion which is required in carving a roast turkey, or the avoidance of the rock-a-head which our oracle warns of in the shape of such carving "as damages the gastronomic appearance." But, discarding the scissors question, we desiderate a common ground as to skilful and economic carving, which is a little obstructed by the difference of joints figured in this book from those which we know under the same names. The leg and the saddle of mutton drawn in pp. 7-11 are not cut à l'anglaise; and here and there the author's English is ambiguous, as when he uses the term "lengthwise" of slices carved, if we may judge by the illustration, rather slantwise, or, as he would say, "transversally." No doubt many useful wrinkles about neat and symmetrical carving do occur at the threshold of Dubois's "Household Cookery"; but he would have added to his boon if he had given some data or calculations of the quantity of meat which an experienced carver ought to get off a joint of a given weight. It is not long since we heard on good authority of the cook of a college in one of our Universities deliberately affirming that in cutting slices off a cold joint of eighteen pounds weight he could only utilize four pounds for luncheon common. The inference must be either that he wished it to be supposed that the waste in trimmings, which in reality would in such a case be nil, was excessive, or else that he counted on a widespread ignorance of culinary economies in the minds of bursars and undergraduates. It is some index to this ignorance that, though every one cries shame on the cook in this instance, no two housekeepers would agree as to the proportion of available slices which ought to have resulted.

It may be urged that the Household Cookery Book presupposes a knowledge of such details and minutiae, though the best elementary treatises on all subjects are those which presuppose no knowledge at all. But a juster ground of fault with the present book, at any rate as touching its fulfilment of the promise of its title, is that it attempts too much, and while professing economy and fitness for domestic use, involves a number of luxuries undreamed of in the kitchens and dining-rooms of our middle class. That this work is not for them may be guessed after a reference to p. 328, where, to the preparation of a striking pyramid of "potted fat liver," with aspic jelly, it is requisite that there should be ice in abundance, as well as a jar or case or two of Strasbourg foie gras. In the country both are hard to come by, unless in the case of the upper ten thousand and those who, like Mr. Mortimer Collins, spare no expense to ensure long life by good living. Not to abide rigidly by the rule ex uno disce omnes, we may cite the prescription (p. 336) for "Wild Boar's Head." Here the author makes apologies for recommending the wild boar's head boiled au naturel instead of stuffed, because the latter dish, though more luxurious, is also more expensive and difficult. Yet even the simply cooked boar's head involves a good half of a week's preparation; much exercise of care and tact in moistening; gentle boiling; wrapping; unwrapping; surrounding with spices, onions, carrots, peppercorns, juniper-berries, and salt; glazing, and masking with aspic jelly; to say nothing of the imitative tusks of butter, the rosette of aspic jelly that masks the aperture of the skull, and the Cumberland sauce. Non cuisis homini, assuredly, is such a dish intended; indeed we doubt whether at average English dinners the outlay of pains and expense involved in transmogrifying the ordinary roast hare into a monstrosity of ugliness "by the removal of the sinewy skin of the filets and larding them with bacon," as seen in drawing 260; or in spitting six roast thrushes "all of a row" on an iron skewer, so as to give the grotesque appearance of birds with their "paws" in their mouths and flannel jackets round their bodies, would be considered worth the trouble, or would meet the appreciation which we must presume it secures with Mr. Urban Dubois's more critical and distinguished clients in Germany. We forbear from reiterating our protest against the destruction of small birds involved in such dishes as this, and in the "hot lark pie," composed "of thirty larks seasoned interiorly," particulars of which are to be found in p. 365, because as yet such wanton avoidance in the interests of gastronomy is quite exceptional.

But, to do our author justice, it should be acknowledged that from his own point of view he does occasionally give suggestions conducive to a just and not shabby economy. One of our national faults in cooking is to admire quantity rather than quality; to worship bulk and size in fish, fowl, and fowl, and to ignore waste, if by means of it the idea of a graining board can be realized. Now M. Dubois is considerate enough to furnish sensible suggestions for dispensing with whole salmon and whole filets of beef, at dinners where the number of guests is limited. "There is no impropriety," he writes, with an apologetic delicacy for fear of hurting our feelings, "even at a dinner, in serving a piece of salmon as a remove; in the first place because such a piece taken out of the middle of the salmon comprises the best part of the fish; and then, because it is more easily served than a whole fish" (p. 177). After which prelude, he introduces his readers to a trompon of salmon with sauce of anchovy extract, garnished with potatoes cut in balls, and parsley leaves at one end of the dish, and one or two large crayfish at the other. Another and more elaborate variety of the same thing is the trompon of salmon with aspic jelly (p. 183). Again, the middle piece of beef fillet braised à la jardinière, which is suggested in pp. 228-9, is conceived in the right spirit of household cookery, because, whilst it is a very handsome and elegant dish when duly trimmed and larded, "the extremities of the fillet that remain at disposal—i.e., the head and end—may be usefully employed in the preparation of little fancy dishes, which are of high value for the ordinary fare of a household, such as 'tournedos,' 'paupiettes,' or beefsteak pie" (p. 229). Appropos of filets of beef, we may call attention to the "carved fillet of beef, à la Providence," in p. 227, which subverts the interests of economy whilst in appearance tasteful and symmetrical, in that its centre part is disengaged, removed, and carved, and then restored to its place, so as to lose nothing of its "physiognomy." This manner of carving, applicable to other pieces of butchers' meat, tongues, &c., is called "carving en ostie."

It is of course too much to expect that, in preparing beefsteaks and mutton or veal cutlets, the process of "trimming" should be done away with; and perhaps, if the trimmings were honestly husbanded for the stockpot, the well-trimmed cutlet might be generally accepted as more a "thing of beauty" than the cutlet not trimmed at all. It is, however, a lame argument to say that the object of trimming is to give the eaters "neither too much trouble nor too much work," "work" and "trouble" being in our language moreover synonyms. Perhaps it is enough to claim that "trimming" should be confined within the strictest limits; for, indeed, otherwise in the case of a Welsh mutton cutlet (say from Olun or Owmdaudwr) the edible fragment would run a risk of being improved away. With M. Dubois, no doubt, the trimmings would find their legitimate use; and it is one of his merits that, where he can, he economizes both labour and quantities, as in the case of the calf's-head served whole and without boning or faroing (an ugly dish to our thinking, by the way), the recipe for which is good, and the very opposite of extravagant. We spoke just now of the "stock-pot." It is in the pages of such writers as Gouffé or Dubois that one learns to understand its importance in foreign cookery, and to wish that it found more favour amongst ourselves. The process of cooking which its name stock-pot or pot-au-feu represents is simple enough when the secret of keeping the least possible surface of the pot exposed to the action of the fire is had over in remembrance, but the results of it are manifold and appetizing to a high degree. The gourmet's stock-pot, for example, requires a good, fat, stuffed fowl and a piece of brisket of beef; but then, when you have done with the soup tureen, there remains the dish of beef surrounded by the vegetables from the pot, and this may be followed up by the "stock-pot fowl with curry," or "the stock-pot fowl for a salad," which, as well as the beef, has veritably paid a double debt.

We have no room to dwell on the many excellent hints, cautions, and recipes of this concluding volume of the Dubois series, though it may be confidently said that it will be highly valuable to the professional and amateur cook. Such a caution as that of scanning with a critical eye the preparations of vegetables and rice preserved dry for Julienne soup which are to be bought in the shops but which are seldom carefully enough compounded, is no doubt reasonable. Then, if the housekeeper is casting about for a variety in the way of hors-d'œuvre, she may find what she wants in the snipe-crusts, and oyster-crusts, described in p. 126, &c.; in the canapés, which (with an approach to an Irishism), M. Dubois tells us "are something of the species of sandwiches, but of another nature," in varieties of rissoles, croquettes, bouchées, croustades, timbales, and camelons—anything, in short, save the "Larks in their Nests," which may be described as boned larks, with singed heads and glazed bodies sitting in scooped artichoke bottoms, with ready-laid eggs of forcemeat seemingly rendering their incubation objectless. Equally various and pertinent information abounds in the chapters upon fish and butchers' meat, eggs, fritters, vegetables, sweet entremets, pastry, ices, creams, &c.

With the distinct reservation that this book must not be expected to prove an infallible oracle to the distressed housewife of limited means who is wont to consult her fair sisters in the pages of the Queen, and who is ever racking her brains to produce some fresh culinary surprise at no cost for her exigent and too self-indulgent spouse—and that, in fact, in its title "household" means the household of a master or mistress with at least a thousand a year—and no family to speak of—its merits as a book of reference, resource, and suggestiveness for the lovers of good living and refined cookery may be confidently guaranteed.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

MESSRS. HACHETTE have added to their splendid collection entitled Les grands Écrivains de la France an edition of the Cardinal de Retz's well-known Mémoires.* The writings of the celebrated Frondeur include, however, other productions besides his autobiographical reminiscences; and as the plan of the publishers is to print the complete works of each writer, we may expect, in addition to the Mémoires, a series of pamphlets, Massinades, sermons, and other documents which are not so generally familiar to the reader. It is curious that not one of the twenty editions of the Mémoires published before the present one is correct. The first sixteen were printed from copies more or less faulty, and it is not surprising that they abounded in deficiencies, blunders, and absurdities of every kind; but as the last four were prepared from the original MS. preserved in the Paris National Library, the inaccuracies they contain seem rather startling. Some of them are positively ridiculous, and quite alter the sense of the passages in which they are to be found. Thus, whilst the autograph text tells us that "cardinal Chigi avoit été inquisiteur à Malte et non à Munster," the reprint of 1859 describes him as "inquisiteur à Malte et non à Munster." The preparation of the present edition has been entrusted to M. Alph. Fœillet, whose work on La Misère du temps de la Fronde proves that he knows thoroughly the history of that turbulent period. The notes and illustrations are very copious, and each volume closes with an appendix of documents referring to various circumstances in the Coadjutor's life.

As a necessary complement to this work we must mention here M. Marius Topin's essay on Cardinal de Retz himself.† Written with a view to one of the prizes offered by the Académie Française, and having obtained the coveted honour, it has already passed through two editions, and now comes before us once more, duly revised by the author. M. Topin appears to have described with much truth the character of the arch-conspirator who, whilst waiting at Commercy the recollections of his agitated life, might imagine that he was intriguing still. When the Fronde broke out, there can be no doubt that the demand for political reforms was amply justified; the country had been ruined by the financial mismanagement of Richelieu's subordinates, and, seeing one ecclesiastic succeeding to another as Prime Minister—seeing, moreover, Mazarin's decided inferiority to his predecessor as a home administrator, whatever might be his cleverness in dealing with foreign Powers—people were quite ready to rise in sedition against a Government represented by a woman and a boy five years old. M. Marius Topin is of opinion that the opposition of the bourgeoisie to Mazarin was perfectly legitimate, and he reserves all his blame for the aristocracy, whose sole object was to carry out their own selfish purposes under favour of the rebellion which they had done their best to excite. A number of passages from the Mémoires of the Coadjutor bring into strong relief the leading points of his character; and, comparing him with St.-Simon, M. Topin shows how these two distinguished writers help us to understand, as no one else has ever done, the real history of France during the seventeenth century.

Under the title Les Jours d'épreuve ‡ M. Caro publishes a series of articles which have appeared at intervals during the last year in the Revue des Deux Mondes. Comparing the views taken of Germany by Madame de Staël and by Heine, our author endeavours to show that the accomplished daughter of Necker cannot often be trusted in her conclusions. Her remarks on philosophy are extremely superficial, and her general estimate of the Germans is merely the result of her hatred of the despotism which the Government of Napoleon had introduced into France. To a person of liberal ideas, annoyed by Fouché's police, the land of Schiller and Goethe seemed a paradise. M. Caro does not deny that the reign of sentiment, goodwill, and political bonhomie may have existed for a short time on the other side of the Rhine; but it was, he says, soon superseded by the sway of brute force, which is one of the principal elements in the now fashionable Hegelian philosophy. As a rule, Heine, who laughed so much at Madame de Staël's enthusiasm, is, with all his faults, far nearer the truth in his estimate of Germany than was the authoress of De l'Allemagne. The first four essays of M. Caro's volume are taken up by the Franco-Prussian question; the last three treat of the Commune. We need scarcely add that, whilst defending the principle of liberty, or rather because he defends it, M. Caro is utterly opposed to revolutionary tendencies; he says, in fact, that the only chance of existence for the Republic consists in its throwing overboard the wild doctrines of 1793. One of the most interesting articles in this part of his volume is one entitled "La fin de la Bohême," which describes the accession to power of all the déclassés belonging to the literary and artistic world. A nation must have sunk very low indeed when it trusts its destinies to men whose career is nothing but an uninterrupted series of failures.

Whether in literature or in art, in philosophy or in religion, the same question meets us on every side. Whilst everything seems to be undergoing transformation, is there a principle invariable in its nature, as immutable as truth itself, which may serve as a standard whereby to judge the new ideas and doctrines proposed for our acceptance? How is it possible to estimate the value of things transitory by nature if we cannot take as a term of comparison some object essentially permanent? And if, as some say, mutability is inevitable, how shall we distinguish the mutable from that which is everlastingly true? Most persons, remarks M. Janet, only look at one side of the question, and according as they are conservatives or revolutionists they deny the necessity of change, or denounce the folly of repose. Our author thinks that the true solution of the difficulty is to be found in a happy medium; and it is from this point of view that he examines the problems* of the nineteenth century. His book, reprinted from the pages of the Revue des Deux Mondes, is divided into five sections, treating respectively of politics, literature, science, philosophy, and religion. The examination of the first of these is suggested by a review of M. de Tocqueville's writings. The author of L'Ancien Régime et la Révolution believed, as most of our readers know, that democracy was fraught with danger, not only for order, but for liberty; the tendency of modern society was to introduce a kind of despotism which was the more to be dreaded because it would be wielded by a mob always deaf to any voice except that of passion. M. Janet does not share these apprehensions; he believes that the general ideas of liberalism which democracy brings in its train can more than counterbalance the outrebalance of a majority. In like manner he contends that the possibility of conciliating the claims of imagination with the cardinal rules of taste requires little demonstration; if, again, we turn our attention towards the scientific world, we shall see that the warmest champions of the experimental method must give up the fond delusion of solving the problems referring to our moral nature; and, finally, he looks forward to a transformation of Christianity as destined to settle for some time at least the religious difficulty. Such, in a few words, are the views expounded by M. Janet in the volume before us.

M. Odilon-Barrot published some time ago a work on administrative decentralization; his present volume is a sequel to that book †, and the ideas it develops may be summed up in a very few words. He advocates the introduction of the jury, as a rule, in civil cases, leaving to the judges merely the interpretation of the law. Reforms are urgently required in all French institutions, and the magistracy stands in need of them quite as much as the army. It ought to be impossible for any usurper to talk of "pitching the avocats into the river," as Bonaparte did on the 18th of Brumaire; and the best way of making it impossible is to raise the dignity of the magistracy, and to place it beyond the region of political strife.

M. Jules Levallois has some right to be heard on behalf of M. Sainte-Beuve ‡, whose secretary he was for a short time; but we must confess that the publications which have lately appeared with reference to the illustrious critic are by no means calculated to raise him in the estimation of dispassionate judges. His talent, of course, no one would call in question, but he never knew how to be impartial, and he was too fond of knocking down his own idols for the purpose of satisfying a feeling of spite or of jealousy. M. Levallois examines successively in M. Sainte-Beuve the littérateur, the public character, and the man, supplementing his volume by a series of letters which the indefatigable causeur addressed to several of his friends. It is the latter part of this biographical sketch which interests us most, because in the great majority of cases a knowledge of the man is the best clue to an appreciation of the writer. Now even the greatest admirers of M. Sainte-Beuve's talent cannot deny that he was strangely deficient in moral sense, and that he lacked therefore the fundamental qualities of a trustworthy guide of public opinion. M. Levallois expresses a wish that all the voluminous correspondence of his master may one day be printed; but we hope, for the sake of M. Sainte-Beuve himself, that this will not be done; of all contemporary authors he is the one who can least bear to be studied en détail.

A widely different impression comes upon us when we think of Lamartine §. The author of Jocelyn was certainly not without his faults, and some of them are glaring enough; but generosity, self-sacrifice, and patriotism are qualities which atone for many shortcomings. M. de Mazade begins his preface by bewailing what he considers to be the deficiency of really great men at the present time; England, Germany, and France are in this respect, we are told, on exactly the same level, and Lamartine may be called, whether we consider him as a writer or a politician, le dernier des Romains. Biographical details are quite wanting in the volume of M. de Mazade, who aims only at giving the general features of his hero as a poet, an orator, and a statesman. The description of the last few years of Lamartine's life is extremely painful. After having been for a brief space of time the arbiter of his country's destinies, and almost the sovereign of France, to find himself superseded by unscrupulous intriguers, and obliged to struggle with poverty in its most repulsive shape, was a terrible reverse of fortune. The historian of the Girondists soon found that the Republican form of government was not that panacea which would-be politicians had been extolling for eighteen years during the reign of Louis Philippe, and his experience of

* Les Problèmes du 19e siècle. Par Paul Janet. Paris: Didier.

† De l'Organisation judiciaire en France. Par M. Odilon-Barrot. Paris: Didier.

‡ Sainte-Beuve. Par Jules Levallois. Paris: Didier.

§ Lamartine; sa vie littéraire et politique. Par Ch. de Mazade. Paris: Didier.

* Œuvres du cardinal de Retz. Nouvelle édition, publiée par M. A. Fœillet. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

† Le cardinal de Retz; son génie, ses écrits. Par Marius Topin. Paris: Didier.

‡ Les Jours d'épreuve. Par E. Caro. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

public life was more than sufficient to dispel all his illusions as to the capacity of his fellow-countrymen for framing a reasonable code of democratic institutions. The triumph of the Commune, could he have witnessed it, would probably have disgusted him with Republicanism altogether.

M. Michelet* has begun a new series of historical œuvres, which he fondly calls by the ambitious name of Histoire du 19. Siècle. It forms a continuation of his work on the French Revolution, and the volume now before us, beginning with the Directory, takes us as far as the battle of Castiglione. We have already had occasion to remark on the change which manifested itself in M. Michelet's ideas between the publication of the sixth volume of his Histoire de France and his subsequent productions; and yet the imaginative author persists in asserting that he has not altered, and that the point of view at which he places himself in 1872 is exactly the same which he adopted in 1836. The great fault which we have to find with M. Michelet is that he is too fond of drawing grave conclusions from the most trifling data; he is always ready to build a whole superstructure of impossibilities on the very frailest foundation; the gossiping side of history is that which pleases him especially, and the form of gossip he likes most has its model in the œuvres passages of Suetonius or Brantôme. He says himself in his new volume that "l'histoire ne fera jamais rien si elle ne perd le respect," and accordingly all the latter portions of his History of France are nothing but a systematic attempt to drag in the mud the noblest traditions and the greatest names of his country. No one has done so much as M. Michelet to destroy in France the sense of "respect" without which a nation has no enduring life. The present volume contains curious details as to Babeuf, St.-Simon, and the Socialists of the Directory epoch; but the section relating to Bonaparte is simply ridiculous.

M. Jules Barni, M. Daniel Ramée, and Count Agénor de Gasparin, are all very anxious that France should rise from its ashes, and recover its former place in Europe, but the means they propose are not identical. As a determined Christian and a Protestant, Count de Gasparin believes that a return to religion is the only solution of the problem. Without repentance, he says, there is no hope for France, but unfortunately the majority of the French people, the leaders of public opinion especially, scout the very idea of repentance. M. de Gasparin, who makes no secret of his attachment to the Government of Louis Philippe, traces back all the catastrophes through which his country has passed to the Revolution of 1848; he also speaks with remarkable impartiality about the Germans, and concludes that in many respects they ought to be imitated by those whom they have defeated.

M. Jules Barni's Manuel républicain† is a kind of text-book intended to teach French Republicans their duties and their privileges. Published at Tours in M. Gambetta's Bulletin de la République, it is the ideal programme of a state of things which the democrats of 1872, at any rate, do not seem much inclined to realize.

M. Barni's only notice of religious matters in his brochure is, so to speak, of a purely administrative nature; it refers to the question of Church and State, and simply advocates the system adopted in the United States. M. Daniel Ramée goes further‡; with an aplomb which is only equalled by the pretentious character of his style and by the ignorance which he displays, he denounces Christianity, and tacks a chapter of very queer theology on to a book the elements of which have been borrowed from all quarters. It is extraordinary that, with his extraordinary copia fandi, M. Ramée should be so bitter against the avocats. Perhaps, however, it is only what the French call jalousie de métier.

We have received several books of travels which deserve to be noticed here. M. de Chambrier takes us, in his amusing volume, from Neuchâtel to the Bosphorus, passing through Vienna and Pesth.¶ He does not give much attention to politics, but he describes very well the character of the various nations he has visited, and shows that he possesses the qualities alike of an artist, an historian, and a painstaking writer.

M. Louis de Carné did not, unfortunately, live to publish the journal of his voyage to China¶, and it is on his father that the melancholy duty has devolved of introducing to the world this new volume, one of the best of its kind which we have seen for a long time. M. de Carné was only twenty-seven years old when he died, and it is seldom that we find men of his age with such sound ideas on questions of political and social economy. He perceived that a good system of colonization is the only safeguard against the danger arising from the attitude of the working classes in Europe; and as far back as 1864 he declared that, unless France could find for her proletariat an outlet similar to the American Far West, the cause of civilization was seriously endangered. M. de Carné's volume will repay the reader the time he may spend upon it; a great deal of labour has evidently been bestowed upon its composition; and the illustrations are good and well executed.

* Directoire; origine des Bonapartes. Par J. Michelet. Paris: Germer-Bellière.

† La France; ses fûtes, ses périls, notre avenir. Par le comte de Gasparin. Paris: Lévy.

‡ Manuel républicain. Par Jules Barni. Paris: Germer-Bellière.

§ La République; son développement dans l'état et dans la société. Par Daniel Ramée. Paris: Lemerre.

¶ Un peu partout. Par M. de Chambrier. Paris: Didier.

¶ Voyage en Asie-Mineure, et dans l'empire chinois. Par L. de Carné. Paris: Dentu.

The second instalment of M. Jules Favre's Histoire du Gouvernement de la Défense nationale* is perhaps still more interesting than the first. The author aims less at giving a diplomatic résumé than a complete history of Paris during the siege; he brings us down to the Versailles conference which preceded the capitulation of the metropolis and the last days of the Government of National Defence. M. Jules Favre writes with obvious sincerity and good faith; nor does he endeavour in the smallest degree to conceal the faults, the weaknesses, or the difficulties which may be placed to the account both of himself and his colleagues. His work is, so to say, the evidence given by a witness who has lost all his illusions, and who throws around his reminiscences a veil of sadness. The painful attitude of the Government, between the Prussians on the one side and the insurrection on the other, is powerfully described by M. Favre. In November the news from the provinces had given a gleam of hope which the battle of Champigny soon dispelled. Then it was, says our author, that Count von Moltke's proposals should have been accepted, and new negotiations entered upon before the situation became quite desperate. But the fear of irritating the Parisians prevented the Government from even thinking of a compromise, and matters soon went from bad to worse. M. Jules Favre has added to his volume a certain number of pièces justificatives; they are not very new, but they are the necessary appendix of a history which professes to describe the terrible incidents of the Franco-Prussian war.

Since the Crimean struggle the French navy has entered upon a new period of its existence; it formed during that campaign the basis of the operations of the army, and it contributed in a very great degree to the success of the whole expedition. Admiral Jurien de la Gravière† was perhaps better qualified than any one else to discuss this important subject, for he speaks of events quorum pars magna fuit. Not only does he relate the various episodes of the war, but he endeavours to expound the lessons to be deduced from them, and he shows what are the best means of giving to the navy all the efficiency of which it is capable. Enlistment, special schools, institutions of different kinds are carefully discussed, and a voluminous collection of illustrative documents serves to confirm his statements and suggestions.

Amongst the novels lately published Fleurange‡ is the one which has obtained, as it deserves, the greatest success. When we say that it is the work of Mrs. Craven, we shall have sufficiently indicated the kind of entertainment which the reader may expect. We shall take a future opportunity of speaking of it more in detail; at present we will only say that the beauty of self-sacrifice and of devotedness is set forth in a couple of volumes containing a story well told and characters full of originality and vigour.

* Gouvernement de la Défense nationale. Par M. Jules Favre. Deuxième partie. Paris: Plon.

† La Merme d'aujourd'hui. Par le vice-amiral Jurien de la Gravière. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

‡ Fleurange. Par Mrs. Craven. Paris: Didier.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newspaper, on the day of publication.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Communications relating to Advertisements should likewise be addressed.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OR

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 206, JUNE 1, 1872:

Germany. The Ballot Bill. The Washington Treaty. The French Army Bill. The Galway Election Petition. Lord Dalling. The Custody of Infants.

A Manly and Noble Sport. Recent Changes at Oxford. Facing the Academy. V and W. Mr. Harcourt on the Invasion Question. South African Politics. The Salmon Fisheries. The Royal Academy. The Derby.

Hook's Life of Archbishop Parker. Cuning's Colonial Constitutions of the Brinsford Empire. Mr. Baskin and the Fleeting Poem. Life of Sir Henry Lowry. My Wife and I in Queensland. The Household Cyclopedia Book. French Literature.

CONTENTS OF No. 565, MAY 25, 1872:

England and America—The German Empire and the Jesuits—M. Roubert's Resurgence—Mr. Loeman's Bill—Spain—The Spanish Communists—The Times and Irish University Education—Mr. Trevelyan at Liverpool.
Holidays—Italy at Work—Servants—The Nonconformists' Memorial—The Quarterly Playing at Communism—The Rejection of the Swiss Handen reisen—German Catholicism and the Vatican—The Royal Academy—Dallas—Newmarket Second Spring Meeting.
Life of Sir Henry Lawrence—Ordnance Survey of the Peninsula of Sinal—Very Far West indeed—Molesworth's History of England—Lord Kilgobbin—Farley's Modern Turkey—Diamond Digging—Farm Stories—American Literature.

London: Published at 28 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE—THIS DAY and NEXT WEEK.
SATURDAY (June 1)—FOURTH SUMMER CONCERT.
MONDAY—ORCHESTRAL BAND; GREAT ORGAN.
TUESDAY—OPERA, "The Love Spell," at 7; DOG SHOW (First day).
WEDNESDAY—GARDEN LÊTE; DOG SHOW (Second day).
THURSDAY—OPERA, "Robin Hood," DOG SHOW (Third day).
FRIDAY—LAST DAY OF DOG SHOW; ORCHESTRAL BAND; GREAT ORGAN.
SATURDAY—FIFTH GRAND SUMMER CONCERT.
MR. WILLIAM PAUL'S EXHIBITION OF GROWING ROSES DAILY.

Admission, Monday to Friday, 1s; Saturdays, 2s (or by Ticket purchased beforehand, 2s 6d.); or by Quines Season Tickets.

DUBLIN EXHIBITION (1872) OF ARTS, INDUSTRIES, and MANUFACTURES, and LOAN MUSEUM OF ART TREASURES under the immediate patronage of Her Majesty the QUEEN will be OPENED Wednesday next, June 5, 1872, by H.R.H. the DUKE of EDINBURGH, K.C.
Tourists' tickets by all railways.

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-COLOURS.—The SIXTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION is now OPEN at 5 Pall Mall East, from Nine till Seven. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

ALFRED D. TRIPP, Secretary.

DORÉ'S GREAT PICTURE OF "CHRIST LEAVING THE PRETORIUM," with "Triumph of Christianity," "Christian Martyrs," "Francisco de Rimini," "Neophytes," "Titania," &c., at the DORE GALLERY, 55 New Bond Street Ten to Nine. Admission, 1s.

UNDERGROUND JERUSALEM—An EXHIBITION OF WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS by WILLIAM SIMPSON, illustrating the Recent Excavations and Explorations, Pall Mall Gallery 45 Pall Mall (Mr. THOMSON'S) Ten to Six. Admission, including Descriptive Catalogue, 1s.

ELIJAH WALTON'S COLLECTION OF OIL and WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS, now ON VIEW, at his GALLERY, 4 Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, Westminster. Admission, 1s, including Catalogue. Open Daily from Ten till Six.

OLD BOND STREET GALLERY, 25 Old Bond Street.—The EIGHTH EXHIBITION OF PICTURES in OIL and WATER COLOURS is NOW OPEN. Admission 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

G. F. CHESTER Hon. Sec.

MISS GLYN'S SHAKESPEAREAN READINGS.—Miss GLYN (Mrs. E. S. Dallas) will continue her SHAKESPEAREAN READINGS at the Hanover Square Rooms, on the following dates at half past Eight: Friday next, June 7, from "The Merchant of Venice"; Tuesday, June 18, from "Romeo and Juliet"; Friday, June 20, from "Measure for Measure"; Tuesday, June 24, and 25, at Mitchell's Royal Library, at 11 Chappell & Co.'s, at the Rooms of Miss Glyn; at Mr. Carter's Hanover Square; and the usual Agents.

SPIRITUALISM or CHRISTIANITY.—GERALD MASSEY'S Fourth and concluding LECTURE, "Christianity as hitherto interpreted; a Second Advent in Spiritualism," at George's Hall, Langham Place, June 2, at Three o'clock. Admission, 6d. and 1s.

ARTISTS' BENEVOLENT FUND Established 1810.—President, Benjamin Bond Cabell Esq. F.R.S. The sixty-third ANNIVERSARY DINNER will be held at the Freemasons Tavern, Great Queen Street, Line's Inn 1 mile, on Saturday, June 8. R. N. Fowler, Esq. M.P., in the Chair. L. VOLING, Secretary.

INDIAN CIVIL ENGINEERING COLLEGE, Cooper's Hill. By Order of the Secretary of State for India in Council. NOTICE is HEREBY GIVEN, that a COMPETITIVE EXAMINATION will be held in July, 1872, for selection of CANDIDATES for admission to this College. For further particulars apply by letter to the Secretary, Public Works Department, India Office, S.W., or to the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, S.W.

India Office, September 7, 1871.

INDIA OFFICE, SEPTEMBER 27, 1871. By Order of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Notice is hereby given that Appointments to the INDIAN PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT of ASSISTANT ENGINEER, SECOND GRADE, Salary 4,300 rupees (about £400) per annum, will be available in 1872 for such Candidates as may be found duly qualified. For further particulars apply by Letter only to the SECRETARY, Public Works Department, India Office, S.W.

CLIFTON COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIPS.—The following will be open to Competition at Midsummer:
1. One or more of the value of £50 a year (equivalent to both Board and Tuition free), tenable during the holder's stay at the College.
2. One of £20 a year, open to boys under Seventeen.
3. One or more of £25 a year, open to boys under Sixteen.
4. One or more of £25 a year, open to boys under Fifteen.
For Numbers 1 and 4 an allowance for age is made in favour of young boys.
The Examination will commence on Wednesday, June 19 at Nine A.M.
Further information can be obtained at the HEAD-MASTER the College, Clifton, Bristol.

THE COLLEGE Isle of Cumbrae.—There will be room for a few STUDENTS from the ENGLISH UNIVERSITIES during the Long Vacation. Early application is desirable. Address, The Rev. THE PRINCIPAL, the College, Isle of Cumbrae, or Greenock, N.B.

FOLKESTONE.—Mr. W. J. JEAFFRESON, M.A. OXON (formerly Principal of the Elphinstone High School, Bombay) will continue, with the assistance of a Cambridge Honour-Man, to prepare PUPILS for the Universities, Indian Civil Service, West India, and all Competitive Examinations. Terms and References on application.

HANOVER.—PRIVATE TUITION.—The ENGLISH H. CHAPLAIN & Co. with Mathematical Honours undertake the care and instruction of FOUR PUPILS. Vacancies shortly. Address, Rev. N. G. WILKINS, Hanover, Weymouth.

TUITION.—A MARRIED CLERGYMAN, experienced, will have TWO VACANCIES in October for PUPILS to PREPARE for the UNIVERSITY. Terms liberal. House large, in small and healthy parish. Address, C. W. WILKINS, 10, St. James's Street, London.

EDUCATION in BELGIUM.—MR. OGER LAURENT has a limited number of YOUNG GENTLEMEN who intend to learn MODERN LANGUAGES without interruption to their English Studies. The establishment is situated close to the Park at Brussels, and is constructed on strict hygienic principles. The diet is of the best quality and unlimited. Terms for Pupils above the age of Twelve, £25; under £20 per annum. For references, &c., apply to E. G. SCHREIBER, Esq., AVENUE VICTORIA, Brussels.

EDUCATION by the SEASIDE.—PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN. French and German constantly spoken. Excellent instruction in health and moral training of Pupils; they are carefully prepared for the Universities. Highest testimonials given and required. Terms, as to the Gentlemen, for references, &c., apply to E. G. SCHREIBER, Esq., AVENUE VICTORIA, Brussels.

GENTLEMAN, B.A. Lond. (Honours), and now Scholar of the University of Cambridge, is desirous of taking PUPILS in English or Mathematics, or in both, at his residence, 10, St. James's Street, London. Highest testimonials given and required. For references, &c., apply to E. G. SCHREIBER, Esq., AVENUE VICTORIA, Brussels.

ST. PAUL'S COLLEGE, Stoney Stratford, Bucks.
(Two miles from the Watlington Station, L. & N.W.R.)
Victor—The Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of OXFORD.

Concili.
The Ven. Archdeacon EICKERTY, D.D., Hon. Canon of St. Paul's Church, Oxford; and Proprietor of the Lower House of Convocation.
CALEDON GEORGE DU PRAE, Esq. M.P., Wilton Park.
JOHN O'BRIEN HUBBARD, Esq., Addington Manor.
The Rev. RICHARD MORRIS RUSSELL, J.P., Rector of Southamptons; and Inspector of Gates College, Cambridge.
Warden—The Rev. WALTER M. HATCH, M.A., Fellow of New College, Oxford.
Sub-Warden—The Rev. JAMES W. KNIGHT, late Vicar of St. Dunstons.

Assistant-Masters.
The Rev. JOHN HENRY WILKINSON, M.A., late Deputy of Magdalen College, Oxford; FRANCIS WOODGATE MOZLEY, Esq. M.A., late Scholar of New College, Oxford; WALTER GEORGE GUILLEMAUD, Esq. B.A., late Scholar of New College, Oxford; JOHN PICKFORD, Esq. M.A., late Scholar of Brasenose College, Oxford; and Professor of Sanskrit, Madras.
HARRY G. SEELY, Esq. F.L.S., F.G.S., St. John's College, and the Woodroffe Museum, Cambridge.
WILLIAM ROBERTS, Esq. F.C.S., F.R.G.S., F.R.A.S., &c.
AUGUSTINE AGLIO, Esq.
WILFORD J. ANNESLEY, Esq. B.A., and Mus. Doc. Merton College, Oxford.
The Rev. EDMUND MARTIN GELDART, M.A., late Scholar of Balliol College, Oxford.

Medical Officer.—A. D. MACKAY, Esq. M.B., Worcester College, Oxford.
The COLLEGE OF ST. PAUL has been established in order to provide for the sons of Gentlemen a thorough education, similar in tone and character to that of the old Public Schools, but more economical and better adapted to the requirements of modern times.

The Religious instruction is in strict accordance with the doctrines and principles of the Church of England.
The College Buildings consist of Masters' Houses, Chapel, Dining Hall, School Room, Class Rooms, Dormitories, Private Studies, Bath Rooms, Lavatories, Nook Ward, and all necessary appliances for the accommodation and comfort of Two Hundred Boys. There are also ten acres of playing fields attached to the College.

The inclusive Fees for Board and Tuition, (Washing, Medical Attendance, Stationery, use of Scientific Apparatus, and other Educational Appliances, are Sixty Pounds a year. These fees are received at the commencement of every Term.
The Senior Boys have the privilege of Private Studies.

The course of instruction includes English Grammar and Composition, Drawing, History, Logic, Mathematics, and Physical Science. Greek and Latin, French and German Languages, and Literature, and such other subjects as are generally recognized in the Competitive Examinations and at the Universities.

In the arrangement of the work regard is paid to the probable vocation and future of individual boys. Practically young boys are first grounded in English Grammar, Arithmetic, the elements of French and Latin, and gain a general knowledge of Geography, History, and the simple facts of Science. But after attaining a certain age and position in the College, a boy is allowed a choice of subjects; and with this view the College is arranged into a Classical and a Scientific Department.
In the Classical Department the instruction comprises all the essentials of a sound and liberal education, and is mainly regulated by the requirements of the Universities. Transactions from Greek and Latin Authors, Composition, Logic, and the practice of English Writing are the main elements; but scope is also given for the attainment of a knowledge of Modern Languages and the higher Mathematics, a certain latitude of choice being allowed within these limits.

In the Scientific Department chief importance is attached to Modern Languages, Mathematics, and the Sciences, the instruction being specially adapted to boys intended for the Medical Profession or for scientific pursuits. In addition to the ordinary routine, Lectures are delivered and practical instruction is given daily in Chemistry, Physics, Animal and Vegetable Physiology, Mineralogy, Geology, and Botany, the subjects being graduated to meet particular requirements.
Every boy in the School is under the special charge of one of the Masters, who acts as his Tutor, to whom he has free access, and to whom he can apply for advice and assistance in cases of difficulty. The Senior boys also receive from their Tutors private instruction and individual help in the preparation of their work, and especially in Composition.
The boys attend the Daily Services in the Chapel. A short form of Daily Prayer is sung at 8 A.M. and at 1 P.M. On Sundays and Festivals there are special services and sermons.
There are three School Terms beginning about January 21, April 21, and September 8. There are Vacations of five weeks at Christmas, a fortnight in April, and six weeks in Summer. In the Scientific Department chief importance is attached to Modern Languages, Mathematics, and the Sciences, the instruction being specially adapted to boys intended for the Medical Profession or for scientific pursuits. In addition to the ordinary routine, Lectures are delivered and practical instruction is given daily in Chemistry, Physics, Animal and Vegetable Physiology, Mineralogy, Geology, and Botany, the subjects being graduated to meet particular requirements.

It is required that a term notice shall be given before the removal of a Pupil.

Candidates for admission may obtain the necessary papers on application to the Rev. the Warden.

CONTINENTAL TOUR.—A GRADUATE OF CAMBRIDGE who is reading for the Bar an experienced Traveller and thorough Linguist (having made a special study of the Foreign Languages in the countries themselves) wishing to visit Constantinople and the Bosphorus, would be glad to accompany a YOUNG GENTLEMAN on a Foreign Tour of some months. Would not object to make up a Party of Two or three or as to lessen the expense. Address, GUYVER, New University Club, St. James's Street, S.W.

TO SWITZERLAND, for Six Weeks from the Middle of July.—Rev. R. M. BELL (cantab) proposes revisiting Zermatt and Thun, accompanied by Mr. J. F. HAM R Junior Student of Christ Church and THREE or FOUR PUPILS. Moderate Reading. Knapsack and bag. Address, 21 Cavendish Road West, Regent's Park, N.W.

MILITARY and INDIAN and HOME CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.—Two experienced TUTORS receive PUPILS for the above. Terms moderate. Address, MATHEMATICAL, 14 Mount Street, Grosvenor Square.

A CAMBRIDGE B.A. (Mathem Honours) wishes to undertake the TUITION of TWO or THREE BOYS for the next few months, during a part of which he proposes travelling on the Continent. Can teach Classics and Mathematics. Address D. W. O., Beeching's Library, 45 Upper Baker Street.

OVERLAND ROUTE.—THE PENINSULAR and ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY BOOK PASSENGERS and receive Cargo and Parcels by their Steamers for

	FROM SOUTHAMPTON.	FROM BRINDISI.
GUJARAT ...	Every Thursday, at 2 p.m.	—
MALIA ...	Every Thursday, at 2 p.m.	Every Monday, at 6 a.m.
AFKANDRIA ...	—	—
ADEN ...	—	—
BOMBAY ...	—	—
COAL ...	—	—
MAHRA ...	—	—
CHALUPA ...	Thursday, May 2, at 2 p.m., and every alternate Thursday thereafter	Monday, May 20, at 2 p.m., and every alternate Monday thereafter
PEKAN ...	—	—
SINGAPORE ...	—	—
CHINA ...	—	—
JAPAN ...	—	—
AUSTRALIA ...	Thursday May 9, at 2 p.m., and every fourth Thursday thereafter	Monday, May 20, at 2 p.m., and every fourth Monday thereafter
NEW ZEALAND ...	(Cargo only)	—

And all Ports at which the British India Company's Steamers call.
An abatement of 50 per cent from the charge for the Return Voyage is made to Passengers who have paid full fare to or from Ports Eastward of Rangoon re-embarking within Six Months of their arrival, and 10 per cent to those re-embarking within Twelve Months.

Through Tickets to Brindisi can be obtained of LEBRAU & Co., 8 Buller Street, E.C. (South Italian Railway Office).

For Rates of Passage Money and Freight, which have been much reduced, and all other information, apply at the Company's Office, 125 London Wall Street, London, or Oriental Steam Navigation Company, Southampton.

SOUTHAMPTON.—THE SOUTH-WESTERN HOTEL, at the Terminals of the Railway, and opposite the Dock. Splendid Public Rooms, and numerous Suites of Apartments. Billiard Room, Hot, Cold, and Shower Baths. Fixed and moderate Charges. Tariff forwarded on application to LINCOLN & CATERWOOD, Proprietors.

THE GREAT WESTERN HOTEL
(Snow-Hill Station), BIRMINGHAM.

"One of the most elegant, comfortable, and economical hotels in the three kingdoms."—Field, July 21, 1870.
"From experience gained by repeated visits, we can assure to be able to testify to the exceeding comfort of this hotel. We have much pleasure in recommending it."—Advertiser, October 24, 1870.

"An establishment remarkable for its high, commodious, respectable charges, and general comfort."—Illustrated London News, 17, 1871.

BRIGHTON.—BEDFORD HOTEL.—This hotel is situated in the most beautiful and healthy part of Brighton, and is one of the most comfortable and economical in the town. It is situated in a quiet and healthy part of Brighton, and is one of the most comfortable and economical in the town. It is situated in a quiet and healthy part of Brighton, and is one of the most comfortable and economical in the town.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 867, Vol. 33.

June 8, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH AMERICA.

GENERAL SCHENCK'S letter to Lord GRANVILLE, written with the sanction of Mr. FISH, removes the doubts which had been raised by the language of the Supplementary Article. If the previous course of the negotiation had been more satisfactory, it would have been evident that the last clause of the Article extinguished the claims which had been formally condemned in an earlier paragraph. If the Senate differs on this point from Mr. FISH, the Article will not be ratified; but it is not at present known whether the two Governments will be able to agree on the wording of the document. If a common understanding is at length reached, there ought to be no practical difficulty in arranging any necessary adjournment of the arbitration. Whether the result of the litigation will be the establishment of friendly feeling between the countries is still uncertain, for the dispute on the Indirect Claims has confirmed the American people in their conviction that a large amount of damages will be recovered by the owners of vessels or of cargoes which were destroyed by the Confederate cruisers. It is highly probable that a decision in accordance with the facts and with the law will cause profound disappointment; but it is not necessary to anticipate the result of the arbitration which may now be regarded as possible. Again and again it has seemed hopeless to preserve or rekindle the dying spark, but it has at length assumed a brighter appearance. The final impulse has been given by the motion and discussion in the House of Lords, which induced Lord GRANVILLE to invite an explanation from the American Minister. There can be but one opinion of the expediency of dropping the debate; and notwithstanding the result, it would perhaps have been better if the House of Lords had been contented to exercise patience for a few days longer.

The debate will be examined in the United States for the purpose of finding in it arguments and admissions which may be used against England; and those who for any reason wish to break off the negotiation will not fail to quote any passages which may indicate that one House of Parliament profoundly distrusts the Government. It was hardly worth while to make the conventional statement that the object of Lord RUSSELL and his supporters was to strengthen the hands of Lord GRANVILLE. A formal direction to a Government engaged in a negotiation, avowedly founded on a suspicion that vigilant supervision is necessary, implies a want of confidence. Mr. GLADSTONE himself is in part to blame for any embarrassment which may be caused by the motion and debate. His explanations on Monday last were elaborately confused and ostentatiously evasive; and the vehemence with which he repudiated the assumption that he could communicate any information was not calculated to satisfy the House of Commons or the country. It would be absurd to expect that a Minister should give an explicit answer to every question which may be asked; and perhaps there may be advantages in the ambiguous and circuitous form of reply which renders it unnecessary to give a direct refusal to certain inquiries. The Senator FISH, who was a master in the art of keeping himself out of danger, would not have been so far from the mark if he had said that he would not give any information which might be used against his country. It is not necessary to give a direct refusal to certain inquiries. The Senator FISH, who was a master in the art of keeping himself out of danger, would not have been so far from the mark if he had said that he would not give any information which might be used against his country.

be submitted to the Geneva tribunal. It would have been expedient to satisfy a doubt which may perhaps have been unfounded by a distinct repetition of the pledge which has been repeatedly given. The latest opinion of the law officers, and the case to which it was an answer, might also have strengthened the plea for delay, if it had been clearly explained in either House. Lord WESTBURY on a previous day recommended Lord GRANVILLE to submit to the law officers the question whether an arbitrator was, in default of instructions from the parties, bound to exhaust the matter of reference. When Lord GRANVILLE directed a case to be framed in the very words which had been suggested, Lord WESTBURY courteously observed that another proof had been given of the inanity of the Government. It may be presumed from Lord GRANVILLE's statement that he had been advised that an arbitrator was not in all cases bound to exhaust the matter of reference. General SCHENCK's assurance has now superseded the necessity of the Joint Note of which Lord GRANVILLE spoke on Monday. No arbitrator is entitled to adjudicate on any question which is not submitted to him by both the parties; and the English agents will now be able, in the improbable contingency of a dispute on the question, to prove that the claims are not presented by the American Government for consideration. The only issues which they can try are, first, whether the English Government failed in the discharge of any duty with reference to the cruisers; and, if the question is resolved in the affirmative, what damages, if any, have been incurred on account of each separate vessel. The failure of performance of the duties of a neutral cannot be determined by an inquiry into its consequences; and if, in opposition to the best opinions of English lawyers, the Arbitrators should decide that there has been any failure of duty, the damages would be limited to the pecuniary claims preferred on behalf of the United States. Nothing in the Treaty would justify a hypothetical award of consequential damages.

A singular and unfortunate error in a date seems to have been the determining cause of Lord RUSSELL's refusal on Monday to withdraw his motion. One of Mr. FISH's despatches, written on the 4th of May, before the Supplementary Article was framed, bore in the published copy the date of the 14th. The correction makes the despatches less intelligible, for it was difficult to understand how Mr. FISH could accuse the English Government of a covert attempt to attain the object for which alone they have been openly contending. If the despatches were anterior to the proposal of the Supplementary Article, their tenor is strictly consistent with all Mr. FISH's previous communications. In his impulsive manner Mr. GLADSTONE assured the House of Commons that the despatches had not been communicated to the press by any member either of the Executive Government or the Senate. Lord GRANVILLE more cautiously stated that the publication was not the act either of the President and Cabinet or of the Senate. It is perfectly certain that some member of one of these bodies must have betrayed his trust, and it appears that the Senate has been making some inquiries on the subject. General SCHENCK prefers the statement that the publication was due to the enterprise of the press, which in American instances would mean that the New York Herald had paid a handsome price for the document. As the Senate has not hitherto been supposed to be liable to pecuniary corruption, it seems more reasonable and more respectful to believe that the despatches were published for the purpose of breaking off the negotiations; and it may be assumed that the publishing was well calculated to accomplish its object. The disclosure of Lord RUSSELL's admission that the Supplementary Article would be delivered to the Senate on Monday, but of the immateriality of the of Lord DERBY and Lord CAIRNS, and of the attack of Lord SALISBURY on the Treaty itself and on the proposed Arbitrators who have been selected. The English Commissioners would perhaps have preferred a different selection; and it may be presumed that the Americans insisted on Brazil for the fanciful reason that it was on the Western side of the Atlantic, and on Switzerland because it was a Republic. It is not open to England after accepting the tribunal to question its competence, and it is unlucky that a protest against an undue extension of the reference should be accompanied by an invective criticism of the qualifications of the arbitrators.

Lord DERBY and Lord CAIRNS will have done much to confirm the Americans in their belief that the Indirect Claims were, according to a plausible interpretation, covered by the Treaty, and that they were not waived by the Protocol. In his earnest advocacy of the American version, Lord CAIRNS boldly declares that the only amicable settlement for which the claims were to be waived was the proposed payment of a gross sum of money. Lord DERBY added the weight of his authority to the contention that the "claims generically known as the Alabama claims" might be construed as including the indirect claims in dispute. Lord WESTBURY, who has in all previous discussions on the subject taken an active part against the Government, seems to have been convinced, either by the opinion of the law officers, or more probably by his own mature reflections, that the Supplementary Article would prevent the Arbitrators from exhausting the reference by an inquiry into any claim for consequential damages. The effect of Lord GRANVILLE's argumentative and forcible answer to Mr. FISH will be greatly weakened by the damaging admissions of Lord DERBY and Lord CAIRNS. It might perhaps have been prudent in the first instance to reply to the outrageous pretensions advanced in the American case that the English Government would not proceed with a reference to which it had never intended to proceed, and to which it has been pressed to consent. As a different course of the case is followed, it is unlucky that two principal members of the English Opposition should adopt Mr. FISH's view, and approve upon his arguments. A few days will decide the fate of the Treaty; and in the meantime it is useless to record the many untoward circumstances of the negotiation.

FRANCE.

THE wearisome nature of the details of current French history is apt to disguise the very great novelty of the experiment in government that is being made in France. Affairs are now managed there in a fashion to which there is no parallel. The Executive Government is very powerful in its own sphere. It controls the whole administration of the country; it conducts foreign affairs almost without any control being exercised over it. Considerable personal respect and deference is shown to it, or at any rate to its Chief. But it is not supported by any majority in the Assembly. The Assembly and the Executive are two independent powers which treat with each other as if on equal terms. So long as it was believed that M. THIERS was indispensable, he could, in the last resort, force the Assembly to yield to his wishes. But it is generally understood now that M. THIERS, though very useful, is not indispensable; and if he chose to resign, his resignation, it is thought, might be accepted without the country being thrown into confusion. On all matters of great importance the Assembly acts entirely for itself. It frames projects of law, and passes them or alters them without paying any serious attention to the wishes of the Government. M. THIERS is believed to retain all his old prepossessions against universal military service; but he has to look on in silence while the Assembly is passing clause after clause of a Bill obliging every Frenchman to serve for five years in the national army. General TROCHU, with great reason as it seems to us, has in the last day or two made a powerful speech against this long term of compulsory service, and thinks that three years ought to be the limit. But it is to the Assembly, not to the Government, that he addresses his arguments. Again, the Budget of 1873 is soon to come on for discussion, and a Committee of the Assembly has been appointed to examine and report on it. M. THIERS is a Protectionist of the old school, but three-fourths of those appointed by the Assembly to sit on the Budget Committee are Free-traders. The Assembly will really frame the Budget for itself, and it will in all probability frame it on principles diametrically opposite to those which the Government is disposed to favour. No contrast could be more marked than the contrast between such a state of things and the state which obtains under Constitutional Monarchies like England. Here the Government frames all important measures, and if it cannot carry a fair proportion of the measures it proposes, it vanishes altogether and gives place to a Government better able to carry what it thinks ought to be carried. In the United States the Executive and Legislative powers are quite distinct; but the Executive and the majority of the two branches of the Legislature are elected by and represent the same political party. The Executive as a general rule works in harmony with the Legislative power, because the two powers proceed from the same source and are responsible to the same set of persons. In France the Assembly and the Executive stand apart from each other, and are under no other responsibility than that imposed by the fear lest they should become so unpopular in the country as to provoke a civil war or a coup d'état that might upset either or both of them. The Assembly is a legislative body, and it legislates; it not merely approves and amends laws, but it frames and originates them. The Executive is the Executive; and it sets itself resolutely, and with very great success, to oppose any invasion of its province on the part of the Assembly. It is true that two such parts of a great governing body cannot wholly stand aloof. M. THIERS tries hard very often to get the Committees of the Assembly to adopt his views, and on many questions the action of the Assembly is largely determined by the preliminary exercise of the PRESIDENT's influence. Every now and then he speaks in the Assembly, and his opinions have there all the weight that they would in any case have as the opinions of M. THIERS, and something more in virtue of their being the expression of the views of the PRESIDENT. The Assembly, on the other hand, has prevented the Government from making Paris once more the seat and centre of administration, although perhaps the decision of such a point is strictly a matter within the province of the Executive. Still, although there may be exchanges of influence of this sort, and compromises may occasionally be imposed by the one power on the other, the essential features of this very novel and interesting experiment in governing are untouched, and the Legislature and the Executive each move in their own path.

Whether this curious state of things is destined to endure, whether we have something new, and at the same time of permanent value, in political life in this co-ordination of independent powers, as to which the received opinion of theorists has hitherto been that either they must be impelled by the same springs of action, or else one of them must be subordinate to the other, it is far too early as yet to say. It is more important for the moment to watch what are the present effects of the political arrangement; and those effects may be spoken of in very favourable terms. The moderation and good sense both of the PRESIDENT and of the Assembly have visibly increased since their relation to each other has been defined, and it has been recognized what part each has to play. If there were two things on a profound knowledge of which M. THIERS especially piqued himself, they were finance and the art of war. He had perfectly persuaded himself of the truth of the theory that what is good for England is not the same as what is good for France in finance or in anything else, and that it is the speciality of France to thrive best under Protection, just as he does not for a moment deny that it is the speciality of England to thrive best under Free-trade. He has written a history of the Great NAPOLEON, and has fought the battles of that eminent person so well on paper that he can scarcely realize to himself that he did not fight them in actual life. Yet M. THIERS has learnt to sit smiling and patient while the present rulers of France adopt principles of finance and military arrangements which he thinks totally wrong. The Assembly has improved immensely since it felt it had real power to use, and that, if it used it in a moderate manner and consulted the wishes of the country, it might within certain limits have its way and rule. The Assembly of to-day is almost another Assembly from that which met at Bordeaux. It is even very different from the Assembly which met after the autumn recess last year. It is not distracted by party intrigues. The schemes for the immediate restoration of Monarchy have died away. The Orleanists and the Legitimists of the White Flag no longer affect to settle the terms on which they shall make France their own. M. ROCHER had his say on behalf of the Empire, and has gained nothing by saying it. The Assembly is beginning to recognize the way of distinct leaders. The Duke of AUMALE, the Duke of AUDIFFRET PASQUIER, General CREMER, and M. GAMBETTA have made their eminence felt, and now look on as what they have to say. The main reason of this change is that the Assembly has got real work to do, and has framing and tranquillizing influences of having to do real work. To decide how France shall maintain its financial equilibrium, and to remodel the national army, are two as grave matters as any set of men could be engaged in considering; and the Assembly has not to criticize, to reject, or to amend schemes of dealing with these grave matters—it has to deal with them itself. It cannot shelter itself behind the name of the Government, and throw all the blame of bad measures on M. THIERS. It has to act, and to act under a very great sense of responsibility; and the consequence is that it listens very readily to any one who has really got anything to say to it that is worth hearing; and it will listen to objections which it thinks are worth attending to. M. GARNIER, for example, who objected very strongly to a clause in the Army Bill providing that in certain cases the authorities might defer the time at which young men should be obliged to begin their service in the army, and who justly urged that such a provision would open the door to all kinds of jobbing and political favouritism, got such important modifications introduced that he declared himself almost satisfied. He wanted still further modifications, went to a division, and was beaten by a large majority. But the noticeable thing is, that he who was a year ago described by the PRESIDENT as a raging madman, is now listened to, speaks most rationally, gains some points, loses others, and has risen, or sunk, as people may choose to call it, to the position of a useful and influential member of a working body.

With regard to no subject is the growing moderation of the Assembly more conspicuous than on matters connected with religion. If men can be rational and moderate about religion, they can be rational and moderate about anything. In England there are many excellent and worthy persons who rise up and lie down every day in the profound belief that the working of the 25th section of the Education Act is the only really important subject of human interest. If such is the feeling as to the green wood of English Nonconformity, it is easy to conceive what must be the feeling as to the very dry wood of French Ultramontanism. But the Assembly is evidently impressed with that which impresses all laymen who have practically to decide on questions connected with religion, and that is the enormous difficulty of knowing what to do in such matters, and the wisdom of acting slowly and cautiously in so fiery a region of politics. The Bishop of ORLEANS during the progress of the Army Bill made a very eloquent speech in favour of religious instruction as the basis of the education of the young soldiers of France, and of the necessity of imbuing the army of the future with a grave, humble, reverent, and Christian spirit. He, like many other Frenchmen, recognized and acknowledged how different was the stamp of the Prussian army in this respect from the stamp of the armies of the Second Empire. But if he chose to ignore the main and fundamental difficulty which besets all action in France with regard to religious education, his hearers could not ignore it. The Bishop wishes the education of the army to be religious; he says that the Prussian army was more religious, or at least had been more drilled into religion, than the French, and that this was one cause of the easy defeat of the French army in the late war. As a general proposition, the great majority of the Assembly would of course agree with him, and would say that religious education, being the best basis for life in general, is also the best basis for the life of a soldier in particular. But when it is asked what is meant by religious education, then the answer in France is that religious education means education given by priests on the principles of the Syllabus. But these principles are directly opposed to the principles on which modern society in France or elsewhere habitually and avowedly acts. The case of Prussia, so far as Prussia is a Protestant country, is totally different. There is no collision between the religious and the political teaching of Protestants. They have got their own way, which Roman Catholics pronounce to be a foolish and illogical way, of reconciling religion with modern thought. But nobody in France has got any such way, and most Frenchmen would hardly despise the notion of having it. The consequence is that religious education after the Ultramontane pattern cannot be favoured by the Assembly without the Assembly at the same time dreading lest the youth of France should be brought up to have all the principles on which the Assembly itself is habitually acting. And yet the Assembly has no wish, and certainly has no power, to take education in France out of the hands of the priests. The consequence is, that the Assembly has done the best thing it could do. It has listened, held its tongue, and gone on to work at some smaller subject which it could treat in a satisfactory manner.

A year ago the Bishop of ORLEANS would have roused the frantic passions of the Whites and the Reds. Now he is listened to in respectful silence, and then the Assembly turns to practical work. An Assembly which can have thus improved may fairly be said to have forgotten something and learnt something since its career began.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND PUBLIC BUSINESS.

TWO months are all that is left of the Session, and the notice-paper of the House of Commons leaves but little doubt how these two months will be spent. The Scotch Education-Bill at present stops the way, and is likely to stop it for some time longer. When that is disposed of the Mines Regulation Bill has to be considered, and a measure affecting such powerful interests is not to be easily hurried through Parliament. The approaching expiration of the Act which regulates the trial of election petitions explains the importance assigned by Mr. GLADSTONE on Monday to the Corrupt Practices Bill, and Mr. Justice KEOGH's manifesto at Galway will give every Irish member something to say on the merits of the system which it is proposed to make permanent. A good many nights will have to be devoted to Supply, which is already greatly in arrear, and one or two of the questions arising out of Supply are calculated to provoke considerable debate. When due precedence has been given to all these subjects, what are the chances of the Public Health Bill becoming law this year? The inquiry may not have much interest for politicians, for sanitary legislation has nothing to do with party contests, but it has very great interest for the nation at large. Every year that passes without any adequate provision being made for the universal supply of pure air and pure water means so much added to the preventible mortality of the country—it means, that is, so many more women left widows, so many more children left orphans, and, as the inevitable result, so much additional pauperism. A prince who allowed his territory to be wasted by invaders, when he had the power to prevent it, would rightly be held guilty of the blood so unnecessarily shed. What shall be said of the nation that allows its territory to be wasted by disease when it has the power to stay the enemy's hand by legislation?

It is true no doubt that there are some exceptional difficulties in the present case. The Scotch Education Bill might, in the nature of things, have very well been postponed to the Public Health Bill; but Scotland has had some reason to complain of Parliamentary neglect, and it is of the highest importance that no one of the three kingdoms should have any just cause to feel aggrieved in this respect. The Mines Regulation Bill deals with evils resembling in one main feature those against which the Public Health Bill is directed. Human life is as much endangered by preventible accidents under ground as by preventible diseases above ground, and in the case of the miners there has been an understanding that some law for their protection shall be carried through this Session, which operates as a virtual pledge on the part of the Government. The Corrupt Practices Bill has an equal claim of another kind on Ministers. It would be an act of conspicuous carelessness to allow the machinery for trying election petitions to wear itself out by lapse of time without taking the necessary steps for its renewal. Thus the position of the Public Health Bill, and the improbability of its becoming law this Session, which results from that position, is perfectly explicable. It is nobody's fault, and everybody's misfortune.

If the Mines Regulation Bill had not already found its way into the House of Commons, the simplest solution of the difficulty would be to introduce it in the first instance in the House of Lords. Indeed it is hard to say why, when Mr. BRUCE took to lightening his labours by sharing them with Lord KIMBERLEY, he did not make over this measure to his colleague rather than the Licensing Bill. If some part of the Government programme must be abandoned, the Licensing Bill would be as little missed as any. Supposing the choice to lie between the Licensing Bill and the Public Health Bill, we suspect that in the long run the latter will do more to prevent drunkenness than the former. If we can make people healthier, accustom them to breathe a better atmosphere, and free them from some of the pestilential surroundings with which in their present homes they are too often familiar, one great source of temptation to drink will be taken away. The Public Health Bill could not have been introduced in the Lords. It is a measure proceeding from and embodying the experience of an aggregate of departments, and as such it must be kept under the eye of the Minister who has the charge of those departments. But the Mines Bill is a measure of a wholly different kind. It introduces no new principle; it simply makes existing legislation effective. If this had been taken out of the way the ground would have been clear in the Commons some time sooner than it now can be. The Public Health Bill would have stood third instead of fourth in the list of Government measures, and at this time of year the difference between third and fourth is probably the difference between passing and not passing. Unfortunately, however, this easy way out of the difficulty is already closed. While a Bill is still in the brain of its author it can make its first start in either House. But when once the Government have made their choice there is no possibility of reversing it. The Mines Regulation Bill has been introduced into the House of Commons, and in the House of Commons it must stay till the Third Reading bids it go up higher.

Supposing, then, that the press of other business makes it impossible to pass the Public Health Bill in its integrity, can any compromise be devised which shall be preferable to giving it up altogether? To the success of such a compromise two things are necessary. The maimed Bill must ensure some appreciable part of the advantages which would have accrued from passing the entire Bill, and it must not contain any provisions which are likely to be hotly contested. It is possible, we think, to reduce the Public Health Bill to proportions which shall conform to both these requirements. As it stands, the Bill does three things:—it creates new local sanitary authorities; it invests these new authorities with new powers; and it gives the central authority certain additional facilities for compelling the local authorities to do their duty. Out of the ninety clauses of which the Bill consists, not much fewer than seventy deal exclusively with the second of these three objects, and it is upon those clauses that most of the fighting is likely to take place. Every line, for example, of the clause which prohibits the putting of polluting liquids into streams will be hotly contested. That some clause of this nature is urgently required in the interests of the public health is undoubted, but in all probability the attempt to pass such a clause at the end of a Session would be fatal to the Bill which contains it. But the clauses constituting the Board of Guardians the sanitary authority in all rural districts, and the Town Council, the Improvement Commissioners, or the Local Board, the sanitary authority in all urban districts, and vesting in these bodies all the rights and powers now exercised by the existing sanitary authorities, might, so far as appears, be carried without much difficulty. This of itself would be a very great improvement on the existing state of things. It would create in every district of England a single sanitary authority armed, under the Acts already in force, with very extensive powers of taking care of the public health. No doubt experience has shown that these powers need to be supplemented. But experience has also shown that when the existing sanitary authority is disposed to make full use of its powers, it can do many things which are ordinarily left undone. The effect of creating a single authority in every part of the country would probably be to bring a good many districts into that comparatively healthy condition in which a few at present are. Amongst the Boards of Guardians there are a fair percentage who do their work well as regards the relief of the poor, and who will be equally anxious to do it well as regards the care of the public health. At present they are not the sanitary authority, and consequently their good intentions go for nothing. If they are made the sanitary authority, we at least secure that the sanitary laws as they stand will be well administered. If therefore these clauses were detached from the Bill and carried through by themselves, some substantial gain to the cause of sanitary improvement would be effected at once—a gain which, like the Local Government Board Act of last year, would redeem the Session from the charge of barrenness as regards sanitary legislation. If, in addition to this, the clauses giving the central authority additional powers to make the local authorities do their duty could be passed, a further gain would be secured; and as these clauses do but carry out in form, in some respects less startling, a principle already admitted, there is a fair chance that they would not be seriously opposed.

THE KOOKA EXECUTIONS.

THE official despatch in which the Government of India passed judgment on the executions that followed the Kooka outbreak last January has at last reached England, and it is possible to see exactly what were the reasons on which that judgment was founded. The facts of the case were apparently as follows. On the 15th of January the Kookas, a sect half robbers, half fanatics, made an attack on the small Mussulman settlement of Malehr Kotla. They were repulsed without difficulty, and Mr. Cowan, the Deputy Commissioner charged with the immediate superintendence of this tiny native State, on his way to the scene of action on the 16th found that so completely was the attack at an end, and so ready the support afforded by the neighbouring native princes, that he telegraphed to the Bengal Government that no troops were necessary. He also telegraphed for leave to execute four men by way of example, without trial. Mr. Forsyth, Commissioner of Umballa, his superior officer, was at Loodiana on the 16th, and sent a note to Mr. Cowan telling him to keep or send all the prisoners to a fortress called Sherpur, and announcing that he was coming on to Kotla with all despatch. Mr. Cowan on the evening of the 16th reported to Mr. Forsyth that tranquillity had been completely restored, but that he proposed making a great example in order to inspire terror. Early on the 17th a large number of prisoners arrived from Sherpur, and the importance of the whole movement is strikingly attested by the circumstance that these prisoners had surrendered to a force of six men. Without having received any answer to his request to the Government to be allowed to execute four men, and after having received Mr. Forsyth's directions to send the prisoners where they could be kept in safety, Mr. Cowan, entirely on his own responsibility, proceeded in the afternoon of the 17th to execute without any form of trial forty-nine of these prisoners, many of them wounded and helpless men, by blowing them away from guns. After a great part of this barbarous work was finished, but while six or seven men still remained alive, Mr. Cowan received positive official orders from Mr. Forsyth to proceed only in due course of law. Nevertheless Mr. Cowan, thinking it would produce a bad impression if he seemed to hesitate, had these remaining six or seven men shot away. Without authority and without trial he executed more than forty men the day after he had declared that tranquillity was restored, and he went on to execute six or seven more, in spite of the direct prohibition of his superior officer. On the 18th, Mr. Forsyth received intelligence of these executions, and suddenly his whole tone was changed. He wrote to Mr. Cowan as follows:—"My dear Cowan,—I fully approve and confirm all you have done. You have acted admirably." On the same day he also learnt that the native authorities of Kotla had tried after their fashion and condemned to death sixteen more of the prisoners, and he immediately gave the necessary assent to their summary execution. He afterwards states that certain native officials had strongly pressed on him the wisdom of firmness, and that he had gathered information which pointed to the insurrection being of a more serious character than had at first appeared. But he allowed that his main reason was that he wished to back up Mr. Cowan. A wholesale execution had been carried out in order to produce a particular effect, and he was not inclined to spoil the effect by saving the lives of sixteen Kookas. He therefore added his sixteen to Mr. Cowan's forty-nine, and he and his subordinate hoped that the natives around would be duly and wholesomely impressed by the execution of a grand total of sixty-five Kookas.

The Government of India comments on this extraordinary transaction in language to which no exception can be taken. No doubt Mr. Cowan and Mr. Forsyth acted for the best, according to their lights at the time. They thought the occasion an admirable one for reading the wild people of the North-West a lesson which they would not quickly forget. They both appear to have been much influenced by the fact that not long ago twelve murderers of a kindred sect had been executed in due course of law, without the Kookas having benefited by the example. The law would not suffice, and therefore they must have recourse to something stronger than the law. This was their defence, and this was the ground of the severe censure the Government had to pass on them. As they thus raised a point of supreme importance in the administration of Indian affairs, it became necessary that the Government should settle it for them, and for the instruction of all its officials. The reign of England in India is a reign of law, and the law must be assumed to be strong enough for all purposes. Of course, if these men had been out doing while fighting had been going on, or in an attempt to resist the capture of themselves or others, there would have been no more to be said. Their deaths would in that case have come about in a perfectly lawful way, quite as much as if they had had a trial lasting for weeks and had then been executed. It is also possible that if an execution of a virulent and dangerous character had been going on, an act otherwise unjustifiable might have been justified as an act of war. Or, if it had been impossible to guard the prisoners, and they had been endeavouring to force their way out, it might have been necessary to use very strong measures to prevent such an attempt succeeding. But none of these elements of justification were discoverable in the Kooka case. Both Mr. COWAN and Mr. FORSYTH honestly allowed that the insurrection was totally at an end long before the executions were ordered. The prisoners were as helpless and as harmless as so many sheep. There was not the slightest reason whatever to apprehend any new danger. The executions were not a measure of self-defence in any way; they were simply and solely meant to show people of the Kooka stamp that it would not do for them to break the spell of English law. They were authorised on grounds which habitually determine the conduct of a great many Governments in the world. To execute in a very terrible manner sixty-five helpless men in order to create a general panic is exactly the policy which would naturally commend itself to high officials in Turkey or in Tunis. Something of the same sort may indeed be said of much more civilized Governments. Hundreds of perfectly innocent men were seized and shipped off to Cayenne under the Second Empire, in order to strike terror into the Republican party, and hundreds of helpless people of both sexes, many of them entirely innocent, were shot down last year in the streets and suburbs of Paris, after all danger from the Commune was over, in order to give the Reds a lesson. What the Indian Government says in the most forcible and explicit language is that such proceedings may do for other Governments, but will certainly not do for it. The law, and nothing but the law, must prevail in British India; and the Government explains what it appears some of the officials require to have explained to them, that to do right on this head is to pursue the best and wisest policy. The English in India are but a handful of foreigners, and they rule not only because, though few, they are strong, but because they convince the innumerable millions they govern that they rigidly adhere to the rules of justice. The choice is between terrifying a few Kookas and alienating the vast mass of the people. Unless we can govern India by resting on the law, we had much better clear out of it for our own sakes; but it is certain that sooner or later, if we govern in any other way, we shall be forced to leave it.

So far therefore as regards the general mode in which the Indian Government has treated the Kooka case, nothing could be more satisfactory. It has laid down rules of a sound and wise policy, and has freed itself from all suspicion of an inclination to think lightly of a departure from those rules, even though those whom it has to censure have otherwise shown themselves excellent officers, and have been led astray by nothing but an excess of zeal. But it is very difficult to account for the great difference of punishment which it has awarded to Mr. COWAN and to Mr. FORSYTH. Mr. COWAN has been dismissed the service. This is a very heavy punishment. It cuts a man off in his chosen career; it makes him forfeit all that he has gained by long years of honourable exertion; it makes it exceedingly difficult for him to gain his bread for the rest of his days. It deprives him of occupation, honour, hope, and almost of subsistence. Possibly it was not too heavy a punishment. It needed a severe example, and one that would not quickly be forgotten, to make the servants of the Government understand the fundamental principles of British rule, and to convince the natives that no one, of whatever rank, will be suffered to set those principles at naught. Such was the punishment of Mr. COWAN; and what was the punishment of Mr. FORSYTH? He was a Commissioner in the Punjab, and he is now a Commissioner in Oude. This is literally all the punishment he has received. He has lost neither rank, nor occupation, nor a day's pay. All that has happened to him is that the Government records its opinion that he ought not again to be employed where, as at Umballa, he had to act as the adviser and regulator of small native States. That is not considered to be his line. His line is something more in the Oude way, where his independent judgment is likely to be less taxed. So far as any reason is given for this curious diversity of punishment by the Government, it is attributed to the fact that Mr. FORSYTH did not actually go beyond his legal powers, whereas Mr. COWAN did. Mr. FORSYTH had the legal power to ratify the decision of the native authorities, while Mr. COWAN certainly had not the legal power to blow forty-nine men out of guns. But this is a very technical mode of looking at the matter. The real offence which they both committed was the violating in a public and signal manner the cardinal maxim of English rule in India. Mr. COWAN blew forty-nine men out of guns, and when Mr. FORSYTH, his superior officer, heard of the proceeding, he at once pronounced it admirable, and stated that he heartily approved of it. The next day, after some time for reflection had gone by, Mr. FORSYTH virtually signed the death-warrant of sixteen men more, not because any proper means of discovering their guilt had been taken, but because he wished to go on producing wholesome feelings of terror, and to show that he was ready to stand by Mr. COWAN. Neither of them had acted otherwise than in honest, though most culpable, error. Either of them might in all probability make a most useful public servant in another part of India. In a court of law possibly Mr. COWAN might be held more responsible than Mr. FORSYTH. But the Government did not deal with the case as a court of law would. It had to punish two officials who, at the cost of many lives, had shown a total want of apprehension of the right principles of governing, and it punished the inferior official in the very severest manner it could, while it did not punish the superior officer—who, of the two, was the most called on to know how government should be conducted—in any way that can be called punishment at all. It rebuked him, and that was all. It rebuked Mr. COWAN, but then it also stripped him of everything. Either Mr. COWAN was treated too severely or Mr. FORSYTH too leniently, and it is to be regretted that the appearance of injustice thus created should have in some degree diminished in India the force of that appeal to the high principles of justice which was made in so vigorous and dignified a manner by the Indian Government in its general remarks on the case.

SPAIN.

THE loyal and peaceable inhabitants of Biscay profess to be extremely indignant at the amnesty which has been granted by Marshal SERRANO to the Carlist insurgents. It is admitted that the rank and file of the rebels may be advantageously pardoned; but the professed friends of the Government argue that the guilt of the chiefs, especially of the priests, deserves severe punishment. It is not improbable that SERRANO may have been influenced by the clerical character of some of the chiefs. Although it may be plausibly contended that the clergy are more blamable than other promoters of civil war, the feelings and prejudices of the people might have been dangerously excited by the execution of a dozen priests. The Carlists will probably hereafter boast that the Government was afraid to provoke them to despair; but surrender, even on the most favourable terms, may be regarded as a confession of defeat. The rebellion, though it seems never to have been formidable, might have become extremely troublesome; and it is not surprising that the Commander-in-Chief, especially at the moment when he had become Prime Minister, should prefer the pacification of the disturbed provinces to the exaction of penalties which may perhaps have been merited. The insurgents have done nothing to justify a movement which could only have been excused by a possibility of success. The Pretender and his brother, though they at one time entered Spain, have wholly disappeared; and, according to a probably unfounded rumour, one or both of them is dead. It may be hoped that they are at least convinced that it would be wanton cruelty to engage their adherents in another insurrection. The Duke of MADRID may be excused for entertaining youthful illusions which have probably been fostered by those about him from his infancy. It will be well for him to have learned that nations in modern times, even when they care little for an actual Government, cherish no irrepressible yearnings for the return of their legitimate and august masters. The heir of the old French dynasty more wisely contents himself with occasional proclamations of his willingness on due invitation to resume the government of his dominions, and to hoist once more the white flag of his ancestors. In both countries the partisans of indefeasible royalty form but a powerless minority. It is also probable that, even in the most backward provinces of Spain, industry and prosperity have perceptibly encroached on the domain of internal war. A moderate amount of comfort disinclines a man to the hardships of fighting, even if he happens to be exceptionally indifferent to danger. At the same time that a large class is becoming devoted to peaceful pursuits, the changes in the practice of war have rendered almost impossible the resistance of undisciplined bands to regular troops. In the petty campaign which has just ended the insurgent bands seem to have been uniformly beaten, and the small amount of their losses indicates their anxiety to retreat as soon as possible whenever they found themselves in presence of the enemy. The victory was almost too easy to justify the titles and rewards which will probably be bestowed on SERRANO.

It remains to be seen whether the early suppression of the rebellion will have the effect of seating King AMADEO more firmly on his uneasy throne. It is something to have proved that the Carlists are not formidable adversaries, and to have ascertained that the Republicans, though they may coalesce at elections with their bitterest enemies, are not yet prepared to engage in a joint insurrection which, if it were successful, must of necessity be followed by a civil war between the victors. The army also has, in a trifling campaign, proved its fidelity to its colours, and it may probably feel some additional attachment to a cause for which it will be assured that it has performed glorious achievements. The political conditions of the country are not in themselves reassuring. Since the accession of the King and the death of PRIM, no Ministry has survived for many months, and during the expedition to the North SAGASTA has followed the example of his numerous predecessors. It is not understood on what grounds he satisfied himself that he was no longer able to resist his opponents. He had represented a coalition of the moderate parties, but the Progressists who originally followed his fortunes discovered that they would be excommunicated by their party if they persisted in their schism. On the other side, ZORRILLA, who had served with SAGASTA and under PRIM, became more and more ready to ally himself against his rival with the extreme parties, not excepting the Republicans. It is said that, on the fall of SAGASTA, the leader of the Opposition has simultaneously retired. SAGASTA naturally professes to support the new Ministry, which includes some of his colleagues and followers. For the first time since the September Revolution the Moderates or Conservatives have undertaken to form a Government of their own; nor can it be disputed that they include among their number some of the most popular and respected politicians in the country. SERRANO has always been considered a man of honour, though he was at last driven into rebellion against the QUEEN. As head of the army he has no rival commander to fear; and he has the advantage of having for some time held the highest rank in the State while supreme power was exercised by PRIM under the title of Minister. Admiral TOPETE is also a gallant officer and an honest politician, though he was one of the most pertinacious opponents of the selection of the Italian candidate. As long as it was possible to maintain the struggle TOPETE openly avowed his devotion to the Duke of MONTPENSIER; and it is said that the Montpensierists have coalesced with the supporters of the QUEEN's son, on the understanding that he shall be declared heir to his uncle, and probably that he shall marry his cousin. Nevertheless TOPETE may be trusted to maintain his allegiance to the reigning King as long as he holds office in his name. It is something to find a Spanish statesman who is not a mere adventurer; and probably both SERRANO and TOPETE regard the maintenance of order as more important even than the choice of a dynasty.

In the first changes of his Administration the King, full of the constitutional theories which he had studied, was careful to examine the comparative Parliamentary strength of the incoming and outgoing parties. On one or two occasions he formally consulted the Presidents of the two Chambers; and he more than once refused to accept resignations which were tendered. By this time he has probably learned that constitutional government is but imperfectly established in Spain, and that he may consider himself fortunate if he can find Ministers capable of governing on any terms. If he remains on the throne, he will probably find it necessary to take a more active and personal part in public affairs, and to govern as well as to reign. If he could win the affection and confidence of the army, he might probably become comparatively independent of contending factions; and there is at present no reason to suppose that he would abuse any power which he might acquire. Incessant changes of Government may be tolerated, though not admired, in an Australian colony, where legislation and government occupy but a limited province, and where there is at present no genuine difference of political opinion. In Spain they imply the determination of all parties to pursue their respective interests without consideration of the permanent welfare of the country. A Parliament which is incapable of dividing itself into two or three defined sections is, as King AMADEUS has more than once told the Cortes, not capable of controlling a constitutional Government.

The discussions in the Cortes seem to become more and more intemperate, and a motion of ZORRILLA and MARCOS for censure of the conduct of SERRANO is said to have been drawn "a terrible scene." There is too much reason to fear that the Parliamentary system will be permanently discredited in Spain by incessant violence and intrigue. Revolutionists of a modern school which would prefer an undefined kind of intellectual despotism are already using as an argument against the English Constitution the failure of some of its foreign copies. The alternative is likely to be rather faulty government than any more refined form of absolutism. The exultation of Republicans and admirers of universal suffrage at the weakness of the Spanish Monarchy is utterly shortsighted. If a Republic were established in Spain to-morrow, it must derive its title from some popular Assembly, which would immediately reproduce the factious dissensions of the Cortes. During a short revolutionary period the dominant party may, as in the case of the French Convention, succeed for a time in preserving the show of representative government, while it at the same time suppresses opposition by force. An attempt to establish a Reign of Terror in Spain would instantly result in civil war, which again would terminate with the supremacy of some military leader. It was the misfortune of Spain as of France to pass without an interval from absolute monarchy to a form of government in which the popular will was supposed to be supreme. The consequence has been in both countries that loyalty to persons and to Constitutions has disappeared in the midst of incessant changes. It would probably be better for Spain if FERDINAND VII. had never altered the BOURBON rule of male succession, or if in later times the misgovernment and personal scandals of Queen ISABELLA had been tolerated or restrained without any form of dethronement. Plausible sneers at traditions and political fictions are best answered by reference to the example of countries in which the most approved methods of government have been deliberately selected. No community seems capable of permanently worshipping an idol which it has deliberately manufactured for itself. The best thing which could happen in Spain would be the consecration by lapse of time of the title of the present King.

THE SCOTCH EDUCATION BILL.

THE House of Commons was in a soberer mood on Thursday than on the night when, amidst the wild cheers which announce an unexpected Opposition triumph, it decided to reverse the educational policy of 1870, and to make the State directly responsible for religious instruction in elementary schools. It is the weak point of general resolutions that they have afterwards to be carried out by particular amendments, and matter of fact discussions in Committee have a strange power of tempering theological zeal by political discretion. It would have been extremely inconvenient to the Conservatives if, by forcing the withdrawal of the Scotch Education Bill, they had pledged themselves to settle the question on principles which, however dear they may be to a mythical Scotch people, have the inconvenient characteristic of being rejected by the great majority of Scotch representatives. The pleasure of seeing the Government landed in a ditch, which may have kept some Liberals from voting against Mr. GORDON's Resolution, can never be trusted to secure their absence when it is no longer possible to plead ignorance that their votes are wanted. The result of these various influences was seen in the majority of forty-four which reversed the former decision of the House, and left the religious difficulty to be settled by the School Boards. If the people of Scotland are resolved to have the Bible and the Shorter Catechism taught in every parish school, they will have no difficulty in giving effect to their wishes. A national majority is made up of local majorities. The interesting feature in Thursday's debate was the desire shown by Dr. BALL and Mr. HARDY to reserve to themselves the right of being inconsistent. Dr. BALL would not "pretend" to say that if this were not a Bill relating to Scotland he "would altogether support the course proposed" by Mr. GORDON. Certainly it would have been idle to pretend anything of the kind. Dr. BALL has had a principal share in accustoming us to the curious spectacle of the same man being Denominationalists in England, advocates of the Universal teaching of a single creed in Scotland, and Secularists in Ireland. He would have all religions taught in one of the three kingdoms, a particular religion in another, and no religion in the third. Dr. BALL would have been better advised if he had ended his explanation at this point, and not gone on to say that, "if they were" to have regard to the feeling of the people of Scotland, he "believed they should adopt the commandment." The feeling of the people of Scotland is not a feeling which can be when discussing Scotch education. It invests what he says with an air of candour and impartiality, and marks his noble superiority to local prejudice. But he ought always to have in view the day when he will be asked to extend to his own country the charity which has begun abroad. Mr. HARDY had a different difficulty to deal with. Mr. GORDON had done his best to show that his amendment was not really a move in favour of dogmatic religious teaching, but simply in favour of Bible teaching. Mr. HARDY cares far too much for religion, and has far too clear a conception of what teaching religion means, to have any faith in such a distinction. Accordingly, though he voted with Mr. GORDON, he took care to explain that he did not think with him. He repudiated all sympathy with unsectarian religion, and declared that religious education was impossible unless it was based on some definite set of tenets. So that Dr. BALL, who dislikes dogma, supported the amendment "because it excluded dogmatic teaching"; and Mr. HARDY, who values dogma, supported the amendment, although his former colleague had just declared that it was "simply a 'homage to the Scriptures'—in other words, to unsectarian education.

The Bill is indebted to Sir E. COLEBROOKE for the importation of one of the most valuable characteristics of the English Education Act. The cumulative vote, as applied to the election of School Boards, may be defended by arguments quite distinct from those which are employed to justify its application to Parliamentary elections. A School Board has none of those accidental securities for the representation of minorities which are afforded by the constitution of the House of Commons. In the latter case the minority in one constituency is the majority in another, and as the House is made up of representatives of all the constituencies taken together, the aggregate minority has a certain rough assurance that it will be able to make its influence felt. But a School Board, except in a few large towns, is composed of representatives from a single constituency, so that if the minority cannot obtain a representative under the cumulative vote, it can never be represented at all. It is no comfort to a Roman Catholic minority in a Highland parish to know that in some Southern borough their co-religionists have been able to subject a Protestant minority to a similar exclusion. What it wants is the power to protect itself against local oppression, and nothing but some approach to proportionate representation on the School Board will confer this. Whatever form the education of the country may ultimately assume, the necessity for the cumulative vote will remain. If the School Boards had to administer a purely secular system, a religious minority would need to be represented in order to ensure that it was really secular—that it gave no advantage to the religion of the majority, while professing to leave religion altogether alone. In Scotland it is even more essential than it is in England that religious minorities should have this protection. The number of School districts in which a distinctively Presbyterian education will be given will probably be very large, and Roman Catholic parents will have no confidence in the fair working of the conscience clause unless there are Roman Catholics on the School Board. Nor is it only on theological grounds that the cumulative vote ought to be retained. Minorities, as Mr. FOSTER said, may be worthy of representation on educational grounds. An undiluted reproduction of the poorest and most ignorant ratepayers is not likely to favour enlightened theories of popular education, when enlightenment means, as in the first instance it usually must mean, an increased expenditure. In this respect also it is important not to lose sight of the distinction between the House of Commons and a School Board. In the former case the object to be attained is not only the good government of the people, but the good government of the people by themselves. In the latter case, the object is the education of the people, and the participation of the people themselves in the process is only important so far as it is a help to the attainment of this object.

A great part of Monday's and Tuesday's debates was given up to the consideration of details which have little interest except for Scotchmen. The Government were certainly right in refusing to surrender the administration of a large Parliamentary grant to a body not responsible to Parliament, and the concession made by the LORD ADVOCATE seems to ensure that the Scotch Education Department will be kept fully acquainted with the opinions and wishes of the Scotch people. Mr. GORDON defended his proposal to limit the creation of School Boards to towns on the ground that it only carried out the principle of the English Act, which "was to supplement 'educational means where they were deficient, and not to 'destroy or supersede those already in existence.' But the parish schools of Scotland differ altogether from voluntary schools in England. They are supported by a charge upon property, and any improvements that are effected in them must be accompanied by an increase, and as a necessary consequence by a redistribution, of that charge. The adoption of the amendment would have introduced an anomaly to which there is no English parallel—the existence side by side of two classes of rate-supported schools under two different systems of management. Mr. GORDON did not explain how he proposed to carry out the compulsory clauses of the Bill without the intervention of School Boards. So far as is apparent from the notice-paper, he would have left these clauses as they stand, in which case their operation, as modified by the amendment refusing School Boards to country parishes, would have been limited to towns. Perhaps Mr. GORDON would not have been sorry to have virtually destroyed compulsion by a side wind.

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON ON MONARCHY.

IN an Essay on Monarchy in the current number of the Fortnightly Review Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON gives his Republican friends nearly the same advice which was not long since offered in a more angry spirit by Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH. Through the greater part of the article Mr. HARRISON adopts an ironical or humorous manner. Notwithstanding his preference for Republican forms, he has a kind of lingering sympathy with the traditions of Royalty; and of the present occupant of the throne he always speaks with personal respect. He only loses his temper when he refers to the Saturday Review, which in this instance at least has always been juster and more dispassionate in its appreciation of Mr. HARRISON's character and ability. Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH recommended a postponement of the attack on the Monarchy, because he thought it easier and more desirable to commence with the destruction of the Church and the House of Lords. In his vehement dislike of both institutions he accused the English clergy of combined cruelty and meanness, and he charged the aristocracy with the vice of gluttony, on the authority of a scene in Lothair where a fantastic nobleman proposes to eat breakfast before going to bed after sitting up all night at a ball. Mr. HARRISON confines himself for the most part to his immediate subject; and while he strongly disapproves of the permanent maintenance of English Royalty, he deprecates impatience for change, on the plausible ground that the revolution is in substance accomplished already. "In the truest sense of the word," he says, "this country is and has long been a Republic, though a most imperfect Republic, it must be allowed. The Republican form, the object of such hopes and of such fears, is important enough, but it is, after all, a matter of administrative adjustment." A calm discussion of the advantages and disadvantages which might ensue if the form corresponded to the alleged fact is perfectly legitimate. It was not permissible to raise the discussion in the presence of a large and ignorant audience on the frivolous pretext of the pecuniary cost of the Court. Mr. HARRISON wastes some eloquent indignation on the inflated language in which conventional loyalty lately found expression. If a community "in the midst of Republican realities retains a monarchic pageant," it is not to be expected that all writers and speakers should either agree precisely with Mr. HARRISON in his distinction between substance and ceremony, or rigidly abstain from the assumption that all parts of the Constitution are equally real. The nonsense which American politicians of all parties talk about the unerring wisdom of "the people" is as insincere as the most eloquent commentaries on Royal processions, and it is more mischievous. It is unsafe to affirm any general proposition as to the morality and utility of political fictions. In the historical change from living organisms to fowls it is difficult to ascertain the exact point at which vitality becomes extinct; and it sometimes happens that the original mould has adapted itself to a new and vigorous growth. Institutions which have been gradually and unconsciously transformed have the great merit of deriving their character from natural causes. Mr. HARRISON complains that the real ruler of the State is deprived of a part of the dignity and power appropriate to his position by the accident of his bearing the title which properly designates the Minister or servant of the reigning king. If the objection is well founded, it furnishes a practical argument in favour of a Republic; but it may be questioned whether a Master of the Palace or a Faithful is practically embarrassed by the existence of a system superior in the background. The Japanese, who seem to have a sounder political instinct than any other Eastern nation, lately effected a revolution by disinterring their nominal Sovereign from the august seclusion in which he and his sacred ancestors had vegetated for several centuries. In the meantime the unquestioned rights of the Mikado had never prevented the Tycoon from exercising the functions of government.

The gravest reason against a formal revolution is the uncertainty of the alternative which might be substituted for Constitutional Monarchy. In the first instance it would seem that the decapitation of English society and political organization would leave below it a commonplace copy of the United States or the colonies; and an America or Australia without a large proportion of land to the population would be an unpromising experiment. To some observers the recent illustration of the spirit of American diplomacy would alone render the prospect of an English Republic of the same type intolerable; and there is no security for the maintenance in England, under the supposed conditions, of the order and material prosperity by which the United States are happily distinguished. Mr. HARRISON justly asserts that "there is no necessary connexion between Republic and ballot-boxes, stump oratory, and the rule of the masses. Nothing is more mindless than the common assumption that there is no Republic possible but that of our American brethren. Every sinister feature of their public life is due to the fact of their national origin, not to the fact of their having a Republic. We, however, here repudiate that as the type of the Republic, of which it is in many respects a very inferior example." "The present writer," Mr. HARRISON says again, "has never confounded Republic with democracy. It is not he or his friends who would teach the people the Gospel of Equality, or the Revelation of Universal Suffrage. It is not they who have held up the United States as the eternal model of a Republic, for in many things we hold it to be one of the worst." It is scarcely worth while to inquire whether an ideal Republic would be preferable to the present English Constitution. It is perfectly true that great and orderly Republics, exempt from instability and from vulgarity, have been found historically possible; but the ideal models of Republican parties in the present day are either the United States or the Paris Commune. Refined philosophers dream of nobler forms of political society; but the physical force which could alone realize their aspirations would be wielded by democratic agitators. The political artisans long for the equal division of property; while Radical Dissenters would be content with the abolition of establishments, of rank, and of titles; and Irish demagogues would endeavour to combine the theories of Papal Rome with the practice of the city of New York. Whatever may be the case with Mr. HARRISON and his friends, the bulk of English as of American Republicans, while they dislike the pageantry of the Crown, abhor with far more genuine earnestness the participation of gentlemen in public affairs. The Convention which the other day rejected the candidature of Mr. ADAMS because he was thought to be a statesman and an aristocrat, faithfully represented one of the ruling principles of American politics. The Gospel of Equality and the Revelation of Universal Suffrage have become inseparably associated with the name of a Republic. All that portion of the community which desires that political and social elevation should in some degree coincide has, like the Athenians and the Romans, a prejudice in favour of hereditary rank which is found not to be incompatible with the recognition of personal eminence. It is by a sound instinct that the opponents of modern democracy attribute political value to alliance with a dormant Royalty. In Mr. HARRISON's eloquent words, the QUEEN "who occupies the throne of the great Normans, of the EDWARDS, of ELIZABETH, of CROMWELL, of WILLIAM of ORANGE, the successor and kinswoman of heroes, receives a halo from the glories of that historic seat," and the friends of the imperfect social and political order which at present exists cannot afford to dispense with the influence of the Crown on the popular imagination.

It is natural that Mr. HARRISON, as an earnest advocate of sweeping social changes, though not of sudden revolution, should wish to establish a closer correspondence between reality and appearance; but, before the old trunks are rootful, it is prudent to watch the undergrowth which is ready to take their place. The Socialist, the Jacobin, and the manager of caucuses and primary assemblies are waiting for the destruction of the Monarchy. It is because the danger is thoroughly understood in all parts of the Continent that existing Governments which command neither sympathy nor respect are nevertheless sustained by the common consent of all the classes which have property to lose. The Spaniards have no reason to love either an absolute or a nominally constitutional throne; but they elected by large majorities representatives pledged to Monarchy, when neither the Cortes nor the constituencies could contrive to discover a King. It is probable that France would not at this moment be called a Republic if there had been one dynasty of Pretenders instead of three. Even the anarchical little States of Greece and Roumania deliberately copy the institutions of their neighbours, in the belief that hereditary royalty affords some kind of security for permanence and order. Mr. HARRISON, who calls himself a Republican Conservative, justly remarks that an historic Republic is comparatively safe from revolutions; but a Republic established in England by the only party which desires it would not be historic. It is not perhaps an inspiring task to struggle with little hope of ultimate success against the progress of French or American democracy and universal suffrage; but the efforts to delay and mitigate an apparently inevitable evil are as honest, and perhaps may be as useful, as the bold and comprehensive projects of sanguine reformers. In checking the downward course it may not be dignified to catch at a bramble or a decaying bough; but a more precipitate descent would only reach the bottom sooner. The communities which have the uncontrolled opportunity of taking their own course have everywhere selected a dead level; and their example is not encouraging to those who may be unwillingly compelled to follow them.

MR. JUSTICE KEOGH AND THE GALWAY ELECTION.

IN pronouncing that Captain NOLAN was disqualified to be elected for the county of Galway on account of the intimidation which had been practised by his agents, Mr. Justice KEOGH reserved for the decision of the Irish Court of Common Pleas the further question whether the seat should be given to Captain TRENCH, the candidate who was in a minority at the poll. It was argued by the counsel for the latter that he was entitled to the seat, inasmuch as it was known to most of the electors before they voted that Captain NOLAN was disqualified. It was not only notorious that intimidation was being exercised on NOLAN's behalf, but a formal notice of his disqualification on that account was posted by Captain TRENCH's orders in prominent positions, and was also served on a great many electors. To this the other side replied that, although Captain NOLAN's disqualification was confidently asserted by his opponents, the electors were not bound to believe it until it had been proved before a competent tribunal. The question for the Court of Common Pleas was therefore whether the electors who voted for Captain NOLAN were fully aware of his disability, and threw away their votes deliberately, and whether the seat should be assigned to the other candidate. A judicial decision on this question must necessarily turn on a number of technical points; but although there can be no doubt that gross intimidation was practised, it is not certain that this intimidation was essential to Captain NOLAN's success, and that he would not have had a majority without it. It is not improbable that the reason why the priests exerted themselves so strenuously, and above all so openly and demonstratively, as they did, was in order to cast into the shade other causes which might be operating in Captain NOLAN's favour, and to convey the impression that it was above all to themselves that he owed his election. However that may be, Captain NOLAN accepted their assistance, and must bear the consequences of their disgraceful violence. He has lost his seat, but one of his brothers has been chosen to oppose Captain TRENCH at the next election.

Mr. GLADSTONE has been asked what action the Government mean to take upon Mr. Justice KEOGH's judgment, and he has answered very properly that they can form no opinion on the subject until the judgment is presented to them in an authentic form. It suits the convenience of the Roman Catholic clergy to assume that the only question to be determined is what shall be done with the Judge who tried the case. Mr. Justice KEOGH enjoys at this moment the agreeable distinction of being the best abused man in Ireland. He has been repeatedly burned in effigy; meetings have been held to denounce his "scandalous judgment," and to petition for his instant dismissal from the Bench; and both in newspaper articles and speeches he has been assailed with a warmth of vituperation and invective which makes his own bombastic periods seem cold and tame. Cardinal Cullen has taken up the matter, and on Thursday presided at a meeting in Dublin which was intended as a "special manifestation of clerical opinion." An address to the public was adopted, depicting the great scandal of "a Judge, a professed Catholic, elected "in the ermine of calm reason and matured judgment," having dared from the Bench to attack the clergy of his Church. The justice of the judgment is not directly impugned. It is admitted that possibly it may be "the stern logical outcome of the evidence," but the Cardinal and his clergy prudently decline to enter upon any argument as to the facts of the case. It is obvious, however, that if the Galway priests were guilty of the conduct imputed to them, "religion has been blasphemed," not by the Judge who condemned these outrages, but by the men who disgraced their cloth by committing them. The object of the agitation is very apparent, and the Government can hardly be simple enough to be misled by it. The Roman Catholic clergy and their partisans naturally resent Mr. Justice KEOGH's judgment, and the vehement, and in many respects injudicious, language in which it was conveyed supplies a convenient pretext for attacking the Judge, and distracting attention from the real question at issue. It is suggested that Mr. Justice KEOGH should be required to resign, and Archbishop McHALE thinks it is imperative that an Act which has been used against the priests should at once be repealed. It may be admitted that the prosecution of a number of ecclesiastics, some of them of high rank, for misconducting themselves at an election, would be an unpleasant spectacle for their order, and would establish a precedent which might cause them some inconvenience hereafter. There seems to have been a hasty assumption on the part of the priests that the Corrupt Practices Act was directed exclusively against the landlords.

It is stated that Mr. Justice KEOGH does not admit the literal accuracy of the reports of his judgment which have appeared in the newspapers; but there is a sufficient agreement between them to show that on various points he used needlessly strong and offensive epithets, and that he went out of his way to touch upon matters which he would have done well to avoid. The tone of the judgment is certainly not what in this country would be considered a judicial tone. Much of it is in very bad taste; it is full of irrelevant allusions, and grotesque extravagance of language; and in reading it one is irresistibly reminded of that flavour of whisky and potatoes which is said to have been perceptible even in some of BURKE's most ambitious speeches. It is impossible to deny that the judgment would have been more satisfactory if it had been calmer and more temperate; but judicial eloquence in the sense in which it is appreciated in England is not usually cultivated by Irish lawyers. The literary style of the judgment is, however, a comparatively trifling matter. The really important question is whether the findings with which it concludes are borne out by the evidence. There has been no suggestion that the trial was not a perfectly fair and patient one. It lasted for fifty days, and the evidence which was brought against the priests was altogether irresistible. It is necessary to remember that the arts of clerical intimidation which had been practised at the election were again employed to keep witnesses away, and to deter those who came from speaking out. The court was daily packed with priests, and the witnesses had to give their testimony in the face of men of whose power to injure them they were perfectly aware. The proceedings were diversified by assaults on witnesses who had told too much, and more than once the Judge had to interfere for their protection. It may be assumed that on the whole the evidence presents a comparatively mild version of the intimidation which was brought to bear on the electors, and that it was in reality much worse than it was said to be. But even on this partial and reluctant testimony it is impossible not to see that the priests behaved in the most outrageous and intolerable manner; and it cannot be seriously pretended that men who are officially reported to have been guilty of criminal acts should escape the consequences of their misconduct because the Judge who reports them is not so nice as he ought to be in his choice of epithets. We need not discuss Mr. Justice KEOGH's personal character and political antecedents. In the first place, they have nothing to do with the case, and in the next place, it is evident that the Roman Catholic clergy thought him a very good Judge as long as he did not run counter to their purposes. Indeed it is expressly stated in Cardinal Cullen's manifesto that it was to the priesthood that "he owed his ermine." The one question of paramount practical importance is whether the facts proved in the course of this inquiry justify the charges which have been made against the Galway priests.

There is one observation which Mr. Justice KEOGH appears to have made, and which has been somewhat unfairly turned against him. He is reported to have said that "no steadier, no safer or more legitimate, influence than that of a landlord over his tenant could be used;" and this has been construed into a justification of the landlords' interference with freedom of election. It is evident from the context that the Judge was speaking only of legitimate influence, the influence of the clergy on the one hand, and of the landlords on the other; and he expressly stated that both kinds of influence had their uses, and were not only allowable but desirable. The charges of intimidation which were brought against the landlords who supported Captain TAZNECH were of the most trivial kind. One gentleman wrote a letter to his agent which was intended to be read to the tenants, pointing out that they enjoyed many favours which he was not bound to grant, and which he should feel himself at liberty to withhold if they behaved in an unfriendly manner towards him at the election. Intimidation of this description might perhaps be more correctly described as a determination in the future to abstain from bribery, but nothing seems to have come of the threat except the dismissal of a herdsman. It appears also that after the election Lord CLANRICARDE was seized with a prejudice against the loaves of a baker named SNODGRASS. These are surely very small matters. It is evident that landlords in Galway, as in other parts of Ireland, have been accustomed to expect that the votes should go with the land; and that they still think it very hard that when rents are 25 per cent. below GRIFFITH's valuation their tenants should vote against them. The Land Act has greatly diminished the authority of landlords over the persons to whom they let their land; but it would appear that, as a rule, they have hitherto been in the habit of influencing their tenants rather by bribery than by intimidation. Human nature being what it is, it is probable that the attitude which the tenants appear to be disposed to assume towards the landlords will lead the latter to fall back upon their legal rights, and to regard the relation between the two classes as a purely commercial one. How long the priests will be able to maintain the influence which they are endeavouring to wrest from the landlords it is difficult to say. A small farmer who was examined at the Galway trial said he thought that "for eternity the people should place confidence in the priests, but for the public welfare in the landlords"; and the reporter adds, that "the evidence of this witness was listened to with great interest, from the fact that he was apparently an humble and uneducated man, from whom such comparatively deep thinking would scarcely have been expected." It is probable that this comparatively deep thinker has not laboriously directed his mind to the philosophy of the Syllabus and of the recent dogma of infallibility; but the Irish priesthood will perhaps discover that by their interference in political affairs they are for the moment increasing their personal influence at the expense of their spiritual authority. What is most bitterly resented in Mr. Justice KEOGH's remarks is the independence of his criticism on the policy of the Catholic Church, and it is evident from Cardinal Cullen's manifesto that some alarm is felt lest this independence should be shared by a considerable section of the laity.

PLANNING HOLIDAYS.

THREE-FOURTHS of the pleasure of a holiday lie in the planning of it. There are hosts of people who could never get through life at all if it were not for perpetually dreaming of the little breaks of sunshine which enliven it. The tutor clears his way through a quagmire of examination papers by anticipations of the "Long." The serjeant glances at the last volume of the Alpine Club, and plunges with a smile of comfort into his pile of briefs. A whiff of sea air seems to cool the hot brow of the City merchant as a thought of the coming outing floats in upon the worry of the dog-days. The dreariest routine in fact is lightened by the consciousness that a good time coming lies at the end of it. There is nobody who has not some cherished romance which gives a tinge of fancy to his life; the soberest Evangelical dreams of a restoration of the Jews, and even Sir Cornwall Lewis—if fame may be trusted—used to play at governing an ideal kingdom, where everybody knew Greek and lived up to the standard of the highest political economy. What his kingdom was to the hard-headed statesman the holiday is to the hard-headed man of business. When it comes, it comes no doubt in a definite way, and becomes practically as much a matter of routine as his briefs or his day-books. But before it comes it constitutes the romance of his life. So long as he can plan his holiday there is "a sense of something interlarded" through all the weariness and drudgery of everyday existence. The brightness and vastness of the world throws its glamour over Mincing Lane. We can go, as long as we are only planning our voyages, just where we like. We read the story of the eruption in the Times, and are off in fancy to Vesuvius. A present of gloves transports us to the Highlands. We put down "the Earl and the Doctor," and flit away with a perfect indifference about time or money to the coral-reefs of Polynesia. And then there is the delicious freedom to change and vary our holidays as we please. Every one knows the terrible sense of compulsion which haunts the actual holiday, the regret which wakes up the moment we are fairly embarked on it, the knowledge which bursts on us of far prettier excursions the moment it is too late to undertake them. But so long as the holiday is a dream we may change it as often as we please. We are troubled with no sense of responsibility, with no difficulties about Johnny's school bills and the balance at the banker's; we have to submit to no humiliating compromises with the langued forces of the family. The world is all before us where to choose. A moment will come perhaps when the doctor will put a stern finger down on the health-station he has chosen for our prison-house, or when the wife will demur to our favourite haunts as "too dull for the girls." But so long as wife and doctor let us alone we have it all our own way, and it is the sense of having it all our own way which gives such a special pleasure to "planning holidays."

No doubt there are a good many people to whom the notion of planning holidays will seem the very reverse of pleasant—people who pique themselves on having no plans at all, and who linger to the last moment in a flutter of change. Practically such people go just where other people go, and do exactly what other people do, but they bug themselves on the fact that they might go elsewhere and do quite differently if they pleased. And so in all anticipations of holidays they revel in the vague. The least attempt to fix them to a meeting at any definite spot, or to being anywhere at any definite time, is resented as practical and unpoetic. They tell you frankly that they hate "being tied down." One day they are wild about the delights of the Pyramids, and the next day they are button-holing Don Sombrero, and are curious about the climate of Andalusia. With perfect consistency they decline a through ticket at starting, and console themselves in the hour of sea-sickness by resolving to throw over Belgium and take a peep in the Pyrenees. But all this means, not that they are really averse to planning holidays, but that they like to retain as long as they can the liberty of changing their plans. It makes in fact little difference as to the pleasure of holiday-planning whether our plans are definite or indefinite. To the Alpine climber the charm of his anticipations lies in the difficulty and delicacy of the combinations they require. To catch the right guides, to hit the right side of the inaccessible, to seize the right minute for the attempt, are all so many delicate problems which, if he never manages to solve them in reality, give him an exquisite pleasure by their easy solution in his dreams. There is almost a thrill of excitement in contriving how the last week of Sessions may leave us an hour to catch the steamer for Reykjavik, or speculating how to visit the Geysers and still be back at the opening of Term. There is enjoyment even in the elaborate preparations of the systematic tourist, in his choice of the proper places to visit and the proper people to see, in his elaborate inquiries and careful docketing of information, in the number of his jottings from guide-books, and the "hints for investigation" which vary his notes. It is a pleasure which culminates in our plans for the Nile. There is the right moment to start and the right moment to return. There is the wind that blows up stream to a certain day, and the wind that blows down stream with equal pertinacity. There is the name of the one honest dragoman to be got from our friend, a name which our friend is willing enough to give, but reluctant to spell. There is the right donkey-boy and the wrong donkey-boy, the slightest confusion between whom will make Cairo a paradise or a purgatory. We have to learn the dodges of the Reis and the ways of the crew, to be coached as to the extortions of the Sheikh of the Cataracts, and the proper backsheesh for Beni-Hassan. Nile-planning is one of the most absorbing sports in the world, whether in the end one goes up the Nile or not. The mere reading for it is a world in itself. Our table is littered with Lepsius and Wilkinson. We know the latest researches of M. Mariette. We are able to air a pretty knowledge of hieroglyphics at the last garden-party of the season. We have our theory of the dynasties, and talk in a patronizing way of pylons and obelisks. Sport, too, throws its enchantment over our dreams. We eye our Manton, and pity the poor creatures who will be lingering about the corners of pheasant coverts when we are potting ibexes and crocodiles. We inquire at the Zoo into the habits of hippopotami, and study the vulnerable parts between the bars. It matters very little whether we are never destined to see a hippopotamus or read a cartouche on a tomb. The holiday is as it may be, but the pleasure of planning the holiday remains the same.

To the family man, indeed, the pleasure is more limited than to the bachelor, but then he has pleasures of which the bachelor knows nothing. It is something to see the altered tone of the wife of one's bosom as the holidays draw near. The acerbity, the occasional tone of dictation, pass into a gentle deference and a playful humour. The old contests are waived, and the bugles sound even over the grievance of limited allowances or grudging bonnet bills. Peace spreads her wing over a household whose calm is only broken by faint and delicate suggestions of the pleasure of a "holiday together" on the moors, or by fancy pictures of a family circle at Scarborough. A dexterous diplomatist, indeed, may very early in the spring avert threatening storms by casual hints as to the delights of Baden-Baden, or may lure a wretched partner from stage to stage of submission to his masculine caprice by a series of vague hints of a winter at Rome. On the other hand, it is only a husband who has to face the difficulty of actually planning the family holiday. No doubt an ingenious person can get a fund of amusement out of the varying wishes of the members of his household, can pit mamma's longing for Harrogate against his daughter's antipathy to "invalid places," and finally step in at a moment of general exhaustion and carry off single-handed the honours of the day. But, as a rule, he is regarded as the common enemy and oppressor of all. It is his business to be economical, and on the question of economy the British mother and the British daughter are at one. No consideration of expense will reconcile the one to the absence of pleasant partners, or the other to the discomforts of a cheap lodging-house. Sly references to the cost of club life deepen into a storm of indignation over the general selfishness of men, as Paterfamilias discloses his little plan for an autumn settlement at Muddbank-on-the-Sea. The whole household shudders at the thought of anticipated rheumatism, of uneatable dinners and abusive landladies, of months of dullness and boredom varied only by donkeys and shrimps. The obstinacy of the banker who refuses to allow any over-drawing is regarded as a mere ruse on the part of a despotic and hard-hearted parent. Sneers accompany his calculations of the railway fares, and his hints on the advisableness of "for once" trying a second-class compartment. The household grimly expresses its wish to stay at home, and refuses to take any interest in planning holidays which are no holidays at all.

But we are not quite sure that even the economical holiday is not better in prospect than the sorry expedient of a round of country visits. There is little pleasure to be got out of a series of perpetual joggings from one house to another, where the only planning can consist in ingenious devices for curtailing one's stay at places that bore one, and avoiding by a dexterous arrangement of dates any possible collision with people whom one hates. The most ecstatic fancy can conjure no sort of excitement out of the prospect of meeting over the table at the manor the faces one is recognizing in Pall Mall, or of lounging down a country lane with the girl who is nodding to one in the Park. That holiday planning of this sort goes on is certain enough, but it is holiday planning of a very low and joyless sort. But even this has a lower deep. Holiday planning degenerates into a fiendish infliction when it dies into a toting for invitations, into bothering Lady Barencreas for a week at Stonecrop Hall, or joggling the memory of the single peer who in a luckless moment once muttered vaguely how glad he should some day be to see his old school friend at his country house. But it is odd to see with what zest and pertinacity the process is carried on. Former repulses are forgotten, the humiliations of the last vacation are remembered no more. However certain he may be of being invited with the ruck, and cooped up in the dulllest of prison-houses with a brace of old dowagers and the country doctor, a "constant visitor" revels in a thousand golden speculations of pleasure, and of the wit and fashion amongst which he is about to figure. He invents repartees which are never called for, and treasures up little anecdotes which are destined to die before birth. He dreams of a round of social successes, of a rivalry for the pleasure of his company, of pressure to "stop longer" and not run away so soon. Perhaps, as we said before, the pleasure is in the dreams themselves. For one month he is a dull, disappointed unit among the people "one must invite." But for six months he has been the favoured guest of the noble and the great. It is something to dream, as the song says, that we live in marble halls. Even if a dry reply to the insinuating little note announces that the "box" is full, it is something to have enjoyed the moors in prospect. A week of anticipated salmon-fishing or a hoped-for battue is perhaps more really enjoyable than six days of wading through Scotch streams with the aid of bare-legged gillies or watching for hours at the corner of a shabby cover. But it must be owned that pleasures of this sort require a robust imagination if they are to be dreamed year after year, and that there are few forms of holiday planning so trying to temper and good taste.

PAGAN ASPECTS OF CHRISTIANITY.

THE ecclesiastical mind of England has of late got plunged into controversies which carry us back to ages which ecclesiastical controversialists must not be allowed to have wholly to themselves. To an exclusively theological view no period of history seems richer than the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. Those ages are the very paradise of theological controversy. They are the days of theology in the very strictest sense. The disputes of other ages, say the Iconoclast controversy or the vast mass of controversies which we jumble together under the name of the Reformation, had commonly more or less to do with man's practical duties towards his Creator or towards his fellow-creatures. Even within the time of which we speak, there was one dispute, the Pelagian dispute, which, as having as much to do with the human as with the divine nature, had more in common with disputes of a practical kind. But this was a Western dispute, a controversy between Britain and Africa. The true native land of pure theology is the Eastern half of Christendom, the lands where men spoke the one language which has the power of distinguishing with sharp precision the minutest shades of theological difference. There are the true home of the controversies of those specially controversial ages; there arose the heretics whose eternal doom we are bound to pronounce thirteen times in the year; and there arose the fathers of orthodoxy who made of the words which were uttered another from the cradle, but never fully made, words of the life of heresy. The quarrels between Constantine and Paganism are a time so fertile both in heretics and saints that men are sometimes tempted to speak as if none but heretics and saints lived in those days, and as if three centuries and more of the world's history had only an ecclesiastical existence. Or, if men look at those days at all in their secular aspect, they are tempted simply to despise the weakness of the decaying Empire, to turn away from the spectacle of shifting Emperors and invading barbarians, of the rule of eunuchs and favourites, and the ten thousand crimes of the courts of Byzantium and Ravenna. We need not say that this is no adequate view of the true middle ages, of the transitional period of the world's history when the Roman and the Teutonic elements still existed side by side in all their distinctness, and had not yet been welded together into a whole different from either. But it is worth while to see how religious controversies looked in those days in the eyes of that large class who were neither saints nor heretics. The course of history carries us so suddenly from heathen persecutions under Diocletian to ecclesiastical disputes under Constantine, that we are apt to think that all mankind, or at least all the inhabitants of the Roman Empire, were actively engaged on behalf either of orthodoxy or of heresy. We are apt to forget how long mere Paganism went on. We are apt to fancy that, as soon as Constantine set up the Labarum as his standard, the whole Roman world followed his example, and that men no longer disputed whether Christianity were true, but only what was the true form of Christianity. But things were far from changing in this sudden way. Everything indeed shows that Christianity was the advancing, and that paganism was the declining, religion. But the advance and the decline were gradual. Down almost to the end of the fourth century it was hard to say which was the established religion of the Empire. Except Julian, every Emperor was a Christian, and it should be remembered that, while Constantine and Theodosius acted as zealous Christians long before their baptism, Julian was not only a baptized man, but had something of an ecclesiastical tinge about him, having in his youth—though, to be sure, he never got beyond his youth—publicly read the Scriptures in the congregation. But, on the other hand, baptized and believing Emperors, both orthodox and heretical, continued to be invested, like their heathen predecessors, with the office and badges of the High Pontiffs of the old religion. It was Gratian who first felt any scruple as to such conformity with a false creed, and his scruple was of evil omen. It was a well-hazarded prophecy, if it was really uttered as a prophecy, that, if Gratian refused to be Pontifex Maximus, there would before long be a Maximus Pontifex.

But, if Christianity was the religion of the Roman Emperor, it was at least not the religion of the Roman Senate. It is curious, in the fourth and fifth centuries, when the despotic system of Diocletian and Constantine was fully established and when legislation went steadily on the rule that "Quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem," to see how the Roman Senate won back again some small portion of its old authority. Even the Senate of Constantinople seems to have acted now and then; but the Senate of Constantinople was overawed by the constant presence of the Emperor. In the West, on the other hand, when the Emperor lived at Milan or Ravenna while the Senate went on in its old place at Rome, it often happened that in sudden emergencies the Conscript Fathers had really to act according to their own wisdom. But, down to the reign of Theodosius, the Conscript Fathers were a decidedly heathenish assembly. They vigorously protested against the disestablishing decree of that orthodox Emperor, by which sacrifices to the old Gods were not forbidden, but were no longer to be offered at the public cost. Later still, when Alaric was at their gates, men fell back, not indeed on the genuine worship of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, but on some strange rites from Etruria. No other story better brings out the strange mixture of creeds and feelings at the time. The Prefect of the city consults the Bishop, the first bearer of the famous name of Innocent. His answer, if we may trust the spiteful heathen Zosimos, was the most striking example on record of that "habitual sacrifice of private conviction" which some say is the highest duty, if not of a Bishop, yet at least of a statesman. They were to do the idolatrous rite, but to do it privily (ὁ δὲ πρὸς τῇ πόλει συνεστὶς ἐκπρόσθην τῇ αἰετῇ ποικιλομένους δόξας λόγους ἰσχυρῶς αὐτοῖς ποιεῖν ἔπεισε). To understand this answer, whether really given or not, we must remember that to the mind of Innocent the Gods who were to be called on to save Rome were no mere non-existent beings, no mere creations of the fancy. They were devils, living and powerful; the point of the answer is, that the Roman patriotism of the Bishop carried him so far, that he was ready to see Rome saved by the help of devils rather than not see her saved at all. But the sacrifices would have no virtue unless they were done publicly; the Senate went up into the Capitol and did all things decently and in order, but no man, the heathen historian tells us, dared to have any share in their doings.

The revival of paganism under Julian bears its witness both ways. Except that the fires of persecution were not kindled, it has much in common with the reign of Philip and Mary in England. It has much in common with it, both in the case with which the revival was made and in the case with which it was got rid of. If men's minds had not been floating between the old system and the new, if there had been a large and zealous majority in favour of either, the change either way would have been far more difficult, whether in England or in the Roman Empire. And when, after the death of Julian, victims are slain, and the usual rites of divination are gone through on behalf of the Christian Jesus, we are reminded of the fact that Elizabeth was crowned with the old ceremonies, and that mass went on, being said in English churches, till the summer of 1559.

Both in England and in the Roman Empire there were, during the time of change, many zealous supporters of the old system and many zealous supporters of the new. But in the Roman case it should be noticed what a deep effect the new system had on the old. Before Christianity finally uprooted paganism, it in a manner Christianized it. The paganism of Julian was not simply a system of State ceremonies and poetical tales. It had become a creed; it was a system of faith and morals. Take the history of Zosimos, written in the fifth century, when paganism was fast vanishing. To him the worship of the Gods of Rome was not the subject of playful verse which it was to Horace, nor the matter of state policy which it was to the augur of Cicero. His faith is as firm, his orthodoxy is as rigid, he is as undoubting in his belief in Divine Providence and Divine vengeance as the most fervent disputant on the Christian side. He hates Christianity; but it is not with the blind hatred of earlier times; he clearly has some knowledge of its doctrines, and he even borrows its language in denouncing it. He laments the departure of Constantine from "the right way"—a formula which he must surely have learned from his enemies; he has his confessions of the truth; he has his signs and wonders, his special interpositions for the punishment of irreverence; he has his general theory "De Gubernatione Deorum" in the plural, as carefully thought out and as firmly believed in as ever Salvianus had in the singular. Of Christianity and its professors he never speaks without some expression of sectarian dislike. In short, in Zosimos the Christian disputant met with a fanatical enemy as bitter, and no doubt as conscientious, as himself.

From Zosimos let us go back a generation or two to Ammianus. We conceive that classical purists will cry out if we say that Ammianus Marcellinus, the historian of the campaigns of Julian, has really a right to rank very high, within one or two of the top, among the extant Latin historians of Rome. Between him and Tacitus the gap is filled up with the dreary repetitions of the Augustan History. But Tacitus, as well as Livy and Sallust, is not a writer contemporary with what he writes about. And daring people are nowadays beginning to say that Tacitus wrote with a party object, and is not to be implicitly trusted. But Ammianus was a contemporary, and, in a large part of his story, he was a spectator and an actor, an officer in Julian's army. If we look at his matter, his thorough trustworthiness, his keenness of observation, we might put him in the highest class of writers; if we look at his detestably complicated and affected style, we might put him in the lowest. But what we are concerned with is the way in which he looks at Christianity. In this respect he has pretty well reached the state attributed by Principal Tulloch to Mr. Burton, that of a "pitiless impartiality." He clearly was not a Christian himself; he always speaks of Christianity from the outside; but he always speaks of the religion itself with respect. He clearly felt the sublimity of Christian martyrdom; he speaks with reverence of those who laid down their lives for their faith. He despises the Christianity of Constantine, in whose hands it had become an old wife's fable ("anilis superstitio"), but he says that Christianity itself is a "religio absoluta et simplex"—words which are not very easy to understand, but which are clearly meant to be respectful. He strongly blames the pride and luxury of the Bishops of Rome, but in the same breath he bears witness to the simple and useful lives of the Bishops of smaller places. Theodosius, whom Zosimos pursues with all the bitterness of controversial hatred, he calls "princeps perfectissimus." But his strongest expression of admiration is bestowed on the tolerant policy of Valentinian, who hindered the professors of either faith from molesting the professors of the other. Something must be allowed for the different circumstances of the time of Ammianus and of the generation of Zosimos. Ammianus must have written or revised his book under Theodosius; but it may well have been before the public sacrifices were forbidden, in short before Christianity was, strictly speaking, the established religion of the Empire. Zosimos wrote when things had altogether gone against the old Gods. But it is plain that we see in the two writers two widely different lines of thought with regard to the advancing creed. Ammianus is an indifferent philosopher; Zosimos is a fanatical partisan.

Claudian seems to represent a third state of mind. There is indeed something wonderful in the sight of a poet singing the praises of a Christian prince, in the very generation which saw the final triumph of Christianity, not only without introducing a single Christian expression or idea, but with the most lavish use of the machinery of the old mythology. The position of Claudian was different from that of the poets of the Augustan age; it was different from that of a modern poet who drags in classical illustrations. If Virgil and Horace did not very fervently believe in the religion which they professed, at all events neither they nor those about them believed in any other; and they at least did the part of good citizens in professing to believe the religion of the commonwealth. If a modern poet talks of Jupiter and Apollo, no one suspects him of believing in them; his poetical talk about them is consistent with the most devout and orthodox belief in another faith. But when Claudian prays Jupiter and the other Gods to prosper the arms of Honorius, it must have sounded to every devout Christian as a direct invocation of the devil and his agents. The way of putting Christianity utterly out of sight, as it had never been heard of, is far more wonderful than either the fierce hatred of Zosimos or the cool indifference of Ammianus. It would be interesting to look through the remains of some of the more fragmentary writers of the same age with the same object. Eunapios, for instance, hates Christianity as fiercely as Zósimos, while in Malchos and Olympiodoros we seem, from such little light as we have, to have calm outsiders of the school of Ammianus.

A far more difficult question is that of the religion of Boëtius in a later, and of Prokopios in a still later, generation. The philosophic Consul and Patrician was for ages looked on as a saint and a martyr, as a theologian who confuted heretics, and who died for his faith at the bidding of an heretical prince. Yet it is well known that the Consolation of Philosophy does not contain a single expression of Christian faith or Christian hope, for surely such a phrase as "angelica virtus" proves nothing at all. It is a speaking fact that when Alfred translated Boëtius for the edification of Englishmen, he had to Christianize him in the process. We feel convinced with Dr. Stanley, in the Dictionary of Biography, that the theological writings attributed to Boëtius cannot possibly be the work of the author of the Consolation. Boëtius the Patrician must have been, if not a Pagan, at all events not a Christian. At the same time there can be no greater witness than the writings and the life of Boëtius how deeply Christianity had leavened both the faith and the practice of many who still stood outside the Church as a religious community.

As for Prokopios, the wonderful passage near the beginning of his History of the Gothic War looks as if the contemplation of theological controversies had driven him into pure theism and contemptuous toleration. Christians, he says, were endlessly disputing about the nature of the Godhead. But he holds it for madness to try to define things which the human mind cannot understand. He, Prokopios, is convinced that God is all-powerful and all-good, and he can go no further. As for anything else, let each man, clerk or layman—καὶ ἱερεὺς καὶ ἰδιώτης, the reference to Thucydides is obvious—say what he pleases. Prokopios was perhaps a scoffer; certainly he shows no signs of any special devotion. But this passage really only puts in another shape what the pious Salvianus had already said, perhaps without knowing it. The author of De Gubernatione Dei would not take upon himself to pronounce that Ulfilas and Athaulf would without doubt perish everlastingly. He thought that such good people as the Goths, heretics as they were, would have some chance in the next world. Perhaps his notions really came nearer to those of Prokopios than he would have liked to acknowledge.

NOVELS AND NOVELISTS.

FEW Englishmen failed to be affected by a lively pang of regret when they read the announcement of the death of Mr. Lever. Those to whom he was personally known had to lament the loss of one of the kindest and most vivacious of companions. An immensely greater number regretted the death of a writer whose earlier works are indissolubly associated with some of the pleasantest recollections of their youth. We can never forget the days when we turned from what we were pleased to call our studies to be animated by the rollicking high spirits of those Irish officers and students and squires who played such mad pranks through the pages of Harry Lorrequer and Charles O'Malley. It is so short a time since we had occasion to speak of the literary merits of his work, and to express the hope, so speedily disappointed, that he had not taken a final leave of his readers, that we shall not now dwell upon the special characteristics of his stories. There was at any rate nothing in them which could rightly cause him a serious regret, and there was a vast amount that had contributed no scanty addition to the stores of innocent amusement in the world. The final farewell to so prolific a writer may, however, suggest a few reflections upon the nature of the intellectual food which is now provided in such marvellous abundance for all persons who can spell out words in print.

Some of the general causes which have contributed to the extraordinary growth of this branch of literature are obvious. Of all forms of literary art, the novel is the one which lends itself with the greatest facility to the expression of every possible variety of emotion. The decay of the drama, upon which so many ingenious theories are put forward, is probably owing in great part to the greater flexibility and easier publicity of this new mode of expression. If Dickens, for example, had lived at any time before the opening of the eighteenth century, he would naturally have become a dramatist. Whether he would have produced better or worse literature is an open question; but he would have been hampered by the necessity of satisfying all the complex requirements of the stage, and he would have appealed in the first instance only to the small circle of London playgoers, instead of reaching at once the whole educated population that can read English. It is no wonder that when the modern novel had been fairly elaborated, and an appreciative audience prepared, it should have speedily risen to a wide popularity. There is nothing that cannot be put into the shape of a novel with perfect facility. A set of stories has been written to illustrate theories of political economy; others develop schemes of political or social reform; innumerable stories are written to demonstrate that the Church of Rome is the Scarlet Lady, that Catholicism is the one system that can satisfy the aspirations of the soul, and that the High, or Low, or Broad Church, or no Church at all, should be the object of our passionate loyalty. A whole army of writers has attempted to awaken in us a love for the romantic beauties of the past; and another to call our attention to the phenomena which are to be found in different strata of modern society. Sometimes a novel is the cry of distress of some one who finds the world too hard for a sensitive nature; and sometimes it is the calm, photographic reproduction of a set of observations which appear to have been carried on with absolute scientific indifference. Everybody can write a novel, and most unmarried ladies, at any rate, have written them; for novels reflect, with almost equal ease, every possible mood of thought, and every conceivable shade of speculation upon all topics in heaven or earth. People of a pedantic turn of mind are apt to lay down rules for the exclusion of all those varieties of this great genus to which they have personally no liking. They object to purely realistic or purely ideal novels; they must not have novels with a purpose, or historical novels, or novels in which any of the commandments are broken. Something is to be said for some of these restrictions, for, undoubtedly, wide as is the range which novels may fairly take, there are some limits to the sphere of its judicious application. We have not yet seen, though we can easily imagine, a novel intended to teach the rules of arithmetic; but we have shuddered at novels which were evidently intended by nature to be fragments of a dictionary of antiquities or sermons on dogmatic theology, or pamphlets on the currency question. Taking, however, a sufficiently catholic view of the question, and admitting that no aesthetic canon should be inexorably enforced against innumerable varieties of the art, some curious questions remain as to the consequences of its boundless popularity.

The commonest objection to the modern novel results from this extreme facility. Both reading and writing novels is favourable to a flabby condition of the mental fibre. The great mass of fiction lies like a poultice upon the human mind, discouraging energetic thought or severe forms of art. Poetry supposes a certain degree of strenuous effort, and an attempt to rise above the dead level of ordinary emotions, but a novel may preserve the tone of common conversation. A novelist, if conscientious, is conscientious in spite of every temptation to the contrary. He will please his readers and save himself trouble by suggesting problems without taking the trouble really to think them out. If he has the ambition of being a social reformer, he paints the bloated aristocracy and the starving proletariat; and, having made his readers weep or curse, his task is ended. He is perfectly content to give up all questions as to the real cause or the true remedy of social inequality as entirely beyond his province. Even when he keeps more strictly within the purely artistic sphere, he has every inducement to take the laxest possible view of his duties. The general public has the same taste in novels that it has in pictures; it likes something pretty, and cares very little for anything elevated. There is not even a tradition that an English novelist is bound to consult the unities or to aim at harmonious effect. Any rambling story, the looser the better, will do for him, and he may diverge from his path at any moment in search of a picturesque effect or a quaint anecdote. Most novels seem to be made by the simple process of emptying out upon the reader, without any serious attempt at arrangement, a collection of all the odds and ends which the author has picked up in his ramblings through the world. The same faults are of course apparent enough in other forms of art, but the peculiarity of the novel is that it gives them a special sanction. Mr. Carlyle says that if literature had no task beyond that of harmlessly amusing languid indolent men, Scott's novels would have just supplied our needs. He is of opinion that something more is wanted, but the "something more" is certainly a rarity in the great bulk of novels. We fear, too, that it must be added, that novels are apt to become intolerable just in proportion as they take a higher aim. It seems to be almost a necessary condition of great success, that the writer should abandon any distinct moral or philosophical purpose, and be content with such indirect lessons as may be indirectly absorbed by readers in search of nothing but amusement. When we see a gentleman lounging on a club sofa studying a novel by the help of a cigar, or observe the masses of cheap literature at a railway bookstall, and the general proclivities of their purchasers, we apply the formula of supply and demand, and wonder whether an art supported by such patrons can fail to quench the best aspirations of any one who practices it. The vigour with which women have seized this method of delivering their sentiments to mankind has perhaps increased this tendency. It is quite true, indeed, that women have supplied more than one of the most conspicuous exceptions to the general rule that novelists do not take their art seriously. Still, the mass of female writers, whether from their defective education or their social position, or from any natural tendencies of the feminine intellect, certainly encourage an unfortunate standard of art. Whether namby-pamby or sensational, which is merely namby-pamby rampant, they are equally marked by inherent weakness. Thackeray complained that since the days of Fielding nobody had been permitted to paint a man. If the objection was only that the flimsiness of British decorum were a trifle too strait, the misfortune might be borne with comparative equanimity; but there is too much reason for saying that the masculine type of character tends altogether to disappear from our picture. We have that miserable substitute which is composed of an excessive sentimental system and a permanent tendency to sentiment; but the characters whom we meet in the modern novel are nearly all women; to some extent, we meet the same thing in the history, but in the latter case the characters are not so numerous, and as well as muscles, and capable of doing something more than making love to pretty young women at an evening party, or crushing a silver cup with his fingers.

By the help of such reflections, it is easy to make out a strong case against modern novelists. Whether their foibles indicate a general want of social stamina in the age would involve a further and a difficult inquiry. It is obvious to suggest, as is frequently done in such cases, that the persons who now read novels formerly read nothing at all, and that if the study of a sensation story in a railway be not a very elevating form of amusement, it is perhaps better than listening to the conversations which used to take place in the old-fashioned stage-coach. Any gleam of intellectual interest, it may be urged, is better than the blank, barren stupidity which would be produced if people whose appetite is only equal to a washy novel had not even a washy novel to amuse them. Or, again, it might be urged that the great mass of literature at any period must always be of an inferior kind. When we compare ourselves disadvantageously to our ancestors, we really compare the average of our performances with the few gems of real value which have escaped the general decay. Even a modern novel is not more insipid than the now unreadable romances in which our ancestors took a strange delight. The modern article has at least the negative merit of being shorter, which, we may hope, proves that we have become more impatient of stupidity. Without discussing such insoluble questions, we may perhaps admit that just at the present moment the art of fictitious writing seems to be rather running to seed. We have at least one great writer and a good many respectable performers now lingering on the stage. But there is ample room for some man of genius to do what was done for poetry at the beginning of the century—to strike a bolder key, and show that the resources of art are not limited to reproducing commonplace conversations or indulging in impossible eccentricities. To prophesy what shape may be taken by the coming reform, if indeed it is coming, is of course impossible; but there are signs of weariness in our existing school which, we would fain hope, may be the heralds of a change. No writer derives a charm from that exuberance of animal spirits which is conspicuous in Dickens or in Lever's earlier productions. The mine seems to have been worked out; but, as it is really inexhaustible, that can only mean that it is time to be hitting upon some fresh vein of sentiment. Such writers as those we have mentioned seemed to be writing because the world struck them as intensely amusing, and because they could not restrain the utterance of the fresh emotions which it created. Most of our present authors seem to derive their impulse simply from a foregone decision to write a novel, good or bad; but they either take the old paths or make spasmodic efforts to strike out new ones which land them in oddity instead of originality. We grumble steadily, and yet we ought perhaps to remember that the change may be in us as much as in our would-be entertainers; and that part of the charm which the writers of our youth possessed may have been owing to our youth rather than to their writing. Who shall decide? We presume posterity will have that duty, and we wish them joy of the task.

THE RETURN OF THE GOTHES.

IF we are not the most cultivated and æsthetic people in the world, it is certainly not for want of travelling. Hordes of barbarians have been arriving daily among us from the South of Europe in obedience to the law which requires them to spend in town the three months of the season. Many persons, no doubt, are under the impression that Italy belongs to the Italians, and that the language spoken there is Italian. A visit to that country during the past spring would have speedily undeceived them. At Turin or Bologna the traveller might have imagined himself to be at Swindon or Peterborough; the scene is one of wild confusion; troops of English and Americans precipitate themselves upon the trains, careless of the claims of previous occupants; hats they sit upon, coats they displace, umbrellas they ignore. Italians conscious of their strange and dépayés appearance shrink into the background. The timid traveller wishes for annihilation as he hears a group of six Americans, all under twenty-five years of age, and all apparently unconnected by any ties of relationship, asseverating that "now is the time to make a rush." Daughters flit to and fro in dusty dresses. Fathers hurry forwards and backwards, struggling with bundles containing a stick for every day in the month, the waifs and strays from which would enable them to be traced from city to city. Newly married couples clinging to each other's hands and their travelling-bags, dropping first one and then the other, are trying to find their courier, who is trying to find them. The refreshment-room is full to overflowing, and the Northern tribes gaze with avidity and astonishment at a sight for which their own wildernesses have so little prepared them. The officials, taught by experience that they have no business on the scene, placidly look on, sometimes muttering unintelligible words in a language in which they are never addressed, and which no one pretends to understand. Temporary companionship with these excited hosts does not explain the cause of their migrations. Their appetites are superb, so that health cannot be the object in view. Art can have but little to do with it; for they can only just distinguish brick from stone. It may possibly carriage an Englishman is asking what the Apennines are, and whether the inhabitants have been engaged in any war during the last twenty years, which gives rise to much interesting speculation. In another corner a girl is reading Deedeker aloud, not with great rapidity, as a succession of twenty-eight tunnels interrupts the enunciation of as many words. All these heterogeneous elements find themselves at the close of the day in the same hotel, an hotel which they have called into existence, and which, were it not quite insupportable, would deserve the praises lavished upon it. All kinds of conveniences abound; electric bells which ring a quarter of an hour after they are desired, and indulge in spontaneous vagaries in the dead of night; servants who, in their wish to perfect themselves in the pronunciation of the English language, refuse to speak their own and are wholly incomprehensible. The courtyard is a den of omnibuses from which discordant sounds are ever rising; every half-hour fresh loads arrive, disgorging more barbarians and brass-bound trunks, which become more involved in inextricable confusion; the family courier is explaining that nine packages are to be taken upstairs, and seven left below, and spends the rest of the evening in ineffectual attempts to sort the sixteen. The hotel is "famed for its good table-d'hôte," and eight greedy persons give up in consequence the seclusion of their own rooms to sit in the gilded barn where dinner is served. The object is to get rid of the unwary guests in as short a time as possible, and the foolish conversationalist may easily find himself three dishes in arrears, causing no inconsiderable detriment to his digestion in endeavouring to hurry through a cold Mediterranean fish, a hash of brains, and mutton that is not mutton, in the five minutes which are allowed him. How many ruined constitutions may not accuse the master "of a recently enlarged and redecorated hotel"! Nor is the night a time for repose; there is an early train at half-past four o'clock, and two Englishmen at three begin to splash about in their portable baths, while the waiter has roused every occupant of the same story from forgetfulness of the numbers of those who were going. The next day brings round the same cycle of pleasures, and the same struggles, until Florence has caught a violent cold, and the Chianti has disagreed with her father, so that they are obliged to remain two nights in some town which deserves the careful study of two months.

The opening of the Mont Cenis Tunnel has effected a revolution; four or five days is a long time to give to a journey from London to Rome, and there is enough English atmosphere in the latter town to make one doubt the truth of Horace's dictum. "Rome est la ville où l'on aime. Quand on a une passion, c'est là qu'il faut aller en jouir; on a les arts et Dieu pour complices," wrote one of Balzac's heroines. Could the modern Englishman be forced to soliloquize in the palace of the Cæsars, and explain his reasons for being there, they would probably be of the following nature:—"I came here because I was told I should find all the advantages of an English watering-place, and my country neighbours were going too. I belong to a club where I can discuss the Tichborne case and receive my opinions from my own newspaper. I keep my digestion in order by hunting three days in the week, and if I do not jump over stone walls, at least I do not ride over the hounds. Marsala is very like sherry, much cheaper, and is certainly stronger than I thought it was. My wife and daughters like seeing churches, and I think sculpture very interesting. I have seen sixteen studios, and shall try to get to the Vatican before I go on to Naples." At times, however, he looks sadly depressed. The tropical rain which set in the morning after his arrival goes on for three days without any intermission; the Pincian is reduced to a muddy pulp, the streets are turned into torrents, and only a few archaeologists can be seen on their way to investigate the fifteen churches one under the other at San Clemente. Perhaps it snows or hails, and the traveller may listen to the asseverations of the Italians that such an occurrence has not taken place for forty years; and if it is his first experience of the climate, he may possibly believe them. The Club is damp, and dismal stories are told him. Some fragment of a columbarium has resented the intrusion of hounds and horses, and an enthusiastic sportsman has broken his collar-bone in full view of the Alban hills. Some one else has been robbed in the Campagna, and four others seized with fever. Of course it was their own fault; what so easy to avoid? You have only to wear precisely the right clothes during every change of temperature, never catch a chill, never expose yourself needlessly to the sun, observe careful rules with regard to diet, obtain excellent rooms on the second floor looking to the south, never be out at sunset, and never get wet; these simple precautions, with the aid of a strong constitution, will enable the traveller to preserve his health at Rome. Full of these and similar details the father creeps in fear and trembling to his hotel, where he finds his wife anxious to know who is the best chemist and who is the best doctor, in case Florence's cold should become worse. They have stood for hours in damp vaults in thin boots; nothing will warm the dingy rooms looking northwards on to a bank of earth about five yards from the windows. Even these cellars were found with the greatest difficulty, and there is no prospect of obtaining better. Crowds pour in every day, filling every available garret, driving from hotel to hotel in search of a bed, not unfrequently in vain. The watering-place increases its price, and pillages its visitors. A modern capital is a charming thing, and the adjuncts of a Court and diplomatic establishments are not without a certain value; but their evil meditations as they bring their households with them.

The new street is necessary, is doubtless an improvement, as it destroys the tortuous alleys and decaying buildings; but in its progress it pulls down here a campanile, there a window of the fourteenth century. The sound liberal who is awakened in the morning by the shrieks of newspaper vendors and by the groans of barrel-organs—for Italy, so prodigal of her favours in this respect to other countries, still keeps a sufficient supply at home—may for a moment regret the consummation of Italian unity, and remember the days when all such noises were forbidden. While one Serene Highness drives over him on the right hand, and another on the left, he may wish to recall the time when the city was not quite so fashionable; when the poor could economize there; when, if the dinners were as bad, and the beef as tough, there were many pleasant people to eat them; and when the gardens of the Ludovisi were not closed—a loss no less irreparable to students of nature than of art. On the other hand, scores of new shops are opened, displaying an endless choice of photographs and mosaics, countless boxes of which are despatched to New York. The influx of ignorant travellers has given rise to renewed activity in the fabrication of works of art, and an unparalleled sale of rubbish has been the consequence. Mec tibi orant artes! All sorts of objects are kept in stock to tempt the amateur, who has not even sense enough to observe that the picture might have been better had the painter taken more pains.

The American is a better prey than the Englishman, who generally possesses at home a select assortment of relics of travel. Most country houses present some indication of Italian tours in the shape of copies, alabaster figures, or marble tables, the collection of some erratic grandfather who however probably saw more and understood far more of Italy than any of his descendants. He went to Rome for four or five months, not for a fortnight; felt that he was in a strange country; inquired solemnly into the habits of the natives, their customs, and their mode of life; made abstracts of the conversations he held; wrote long accounts after the manner inculcated by Bacon; perhaps did "sequester himself from the company of his countrymen, and diet in such places where there is good company of the nation where he travellith; did upon his removes from one place to another procure recommendation to some person of quality residing in the place whither he removeth." These accounts were published on his return, and were very likely read with interest by the untravelled world. Now hardly anybody takes letters of introduction to foreigners, few of whom indeed speak English with fluency. If the guest is conversant with no language but his own, it may be doubted whether he derives much pleasure from climbing up the hundred steps of some vast palace to find a society which has no characteristics of its own, and whose gossip is singularly like that of any other watering-place. Besides, when Bacon wrote, and our ancestors printed their letters, neither Murray nor Haedeker had published their admirable summaries, and they could have little foreseen the day when Englishmen and Englishwomen, by the aid of a courier, would be enabled to see Florence in three days, Bologna in two, and Ferrara in a single morning. Then the hours were not mapped out for them with a stern hand, and they gave perhaps one or two to the study of what was in those times the prevalent language of the country. Travellers are much too busy in these days to do anything of the kind; besides, what would be the use? The writers speak American wherever they go; there is no modern literature to read, and as for the classics, Tasso is too dull, Dante too difficult, Ariosto too long, Boccaccio too improper. The result is that not more than one Englishman out of a hundred displays a greater familiarity with the language than is evinced by the question "Quanto?" which he pronounces as he stretches across the buffet and shakes a brioche in the face of the alarmed waiter. Were he to stay in a town two days longer than was necessary to see its churches, he would feel that he was wasting his time. Perpetual motion is his destiny. He would be more likely to sleep at Tuxford on his way to Edinburgh than to break his journey at an Italian town where there was no English chemist. Balzac's heroine would hardly find a quiet corner in which she could pursue her studies. "I can't abide Venice, there's no noise nor bustle here," was the criticism of one to whom the avenues of New York presented the acme of enjoyment. Rome will become more crowded and more expensive each succeeding year, and fewer salons will remain open to those who come in search of society. When the dual government which now exists comes to an end, the resident English will be at a loss for topics of conversation, and will be deprived of the opportunity of committing many harmless indiscretions in opposition to the Government of the country, by which they show their interest in politics, even if they do not directly influence the proceedings at the Quirinal.

Travelling of the kind we have described cannot be said to promote a knowledge of the arts or to aid the critical faculty. The family which has seen Bologna in two days, and other towns with similar celerity, returns to England with minds which resemble blurred photographs, and health impaired by the most treacherous of climates. Italy and its enjoyments are for those who leave the beaten track, who content themselves with the spectral light in the pine woods of Ravenna, and who learn from the scenery in San Vitale and San Apollinare how lovely and how simple was the Christianity of the sixth century. Among the badini only they may enjoy uninterrupted quiet, be the sole possessors of some Renaissance palace at Vicenza or Ferrara, watch the light and shadows of the Euganean hills from Este, and study Torcello before its restorations are completed. Five years hence few monuments will remain unscraped and unrestored; half the most exquisite treasures in Italy are losing their distinctive character, and the traveller will regret, when too late, that he spent his days in going to meets at the Due Torri, and his evenings in reading English magazines.

DRAMATIC LITERATURE IN FRANCE.

NO visitor to the French Plays can fail to be impressed with the fact that they come from a country in which the drama still holds its place in the national literature, and the dramatists are writers who, in their several degrees, have some respect for the quality of their art and the critical taste of their audiences. This is evidently a state of things which has almost ceased to have a parallel in England since Mr. Macready's management at Covent Garden, and subsequently at Drury Lane. In those days, which now seem so far off, there were excellent companies not only at what were called the Patent Theatres (for we may include Madame Vestris's management at Covent Garden in the epoch to which we refer), but at the Haymarket; and there were dramatic writers, both in tragedy and comedy, whose productions, if not destined to take rank as classics, were nevertheless works of serious merit and intention, and entitled to consideration in a purely literary sense as works of feeling, of imagination, of invention, or of style. They deserved the attention of cultivated critics on other grounds than those of stage effect or theatrical success. Some of them had a noble and elevated aim in the presentation of human passions purified and exalted by the conflict with human destiny, or of an ideal of self-sacrificing heroism or virtue; some gave to picturesque or romantic episodes of history the charm of poetic diction and dialogue; some threw the genial and kindly glance of the social moralist on the manners and the foibles of the world around them; some satirized the pleasant vices or ridiculed the fashionable follies of the age; some, with a more unrestrained and farcical humour, caricatured the vulgarities of a class or the eccentricities of some new variety of the human species; while some were content to reproduce the everlasting types of the comedy of life. There was not among them all perhaps a ghost of the tragic genius of the Elizabethans, whom they were too prone to imitate, or a spark of the reckless vigour of the comic dramatists of the Restoration, or a smack of the animal spirits of Colman and his contemporaries, or more than a faint suggestion of the fresh and happy animation and tenderness of Goldsmith or of the dazzling brilliancy of Sheridan. But there was something of a literary sense and a literary purpose in their work, and in most cases there was a clear title to originality. Such as they were, they were not adapters but creators; and, to borrow a figure from a French poet, if the cup from which they drank was a small one, it was their own. Since Lord Lytton wrote his last comedy, and Mr. Boucicault wrote his first, they have had no successors on the English stage; and we look in vain for so much as a second Jerrold, or Talfourd, or Sheridan Knowles. The author of London Assurance has become a very able and successful "original adapter," or a composer of effects for the scene-painter and the machinist. Mr. Tom Taylor is scarcely to be pronounced an original dramatist, and Mr. Charles Reade is best known to the stage as a borrower from his own works or from abroad. The regretted Mr. Robertson composed very pretty charades; but charades do not constitute a dramatist. In round terms there is an almost absolute divorce in this country between literature properly so called and the stage. If the Dramatic Authors Society should be disposed to question the accuracy of this statement, let them refute it by a list of their own productions during the last quarter of a century. Perhaps it is sufficient to note the number of English plays of French extraction within this period, and to recall the just but fruitless endeavours of French dramatic authors to establish some sort of direct or indirect claims under a fair Copyright Treaty upon the profits of British piracy. English authors have often and reasonably pressed upon their brethren in the United States the injury and discouragement to American literature which the absence of international copyright has caused by the cheap and plentiful supply of all the latest novelties from the London market. It has probably not occurred to our "dramatic authors" that the literature of the English stage may have suffered a similar disadvantage from the cheap and plentiful supply of original adaptations from the French. At any rate, whatever may be the cause, the result is indisputable. We have playwrights in abundance, but no dramatists to speak of, for the most successful piece of the season, Pygmalion and Galatea, will scarcely be cited as an exception; we have any quantity of adaptations, more or less deformed and spoilt in the process, but no native or original dramatic literature. Let us turn to France and contemplate a very different scene, and one which is not calculated to inflame the honest insular self-complacency of the British literary patriot.

Since the great Revolution French dramatic literature has undergone many transformations. In this respect it has shared the fate of the political Government, and followed with fidelity the tastes and manners of each successive epoch in a country where every decade is an epoch in itself. Under the Revolution and the Empire classic tragedy prevailed at the National Theatre with the literary divinities of Racine and Corneille. Greek and Roman tragedy, with the language of the Court of Louis Quatorze, made democracy heroic and Imperialism sublime. Under the Restoration tion the classic tragedy survived; under the Monarchy of July Romanticism struck it a blow from which nothing less than the powerful and electric genius of a Racine could have saved it for a few years of precarious convalescence. The Second Empire could not restore it; even a French public, in spite of all its gaiety the most enduring in the world, could no longer tolerate the solemn Alexandrine platitudes of the classical imitators of Corneille and Racine, disdained by men in helmets and togas on a stage representing a severely classical interior on which the curtain never fell. The public wanted life, reality, movement, and passion, something that would stir the senses and the blood, instead of those bowigged and awful shapes of antique and imperturbable bores. Victor Hugo gave them all this in his dramas, and splendid excesses of poetry and rhetoric besides. Alexandre Dumas (the Elder) gave them the romance or the masquerade of history in cloaks of all colours, heroes and great ladies who broke all the commandments in magnificent costume, and committed all manner of transgressions against the moral and social law in the language of saints and martyrs. Sometimes he showed them the Court life of the old French Monarchy and aristocracy in undress—a life in which all the men were wits and gallants, and all the women were adorable sinners; sometimes he dramatized society as it ought to be in a revolutionary age, and drew the tears of the pit and gallery by depicting in agonizing situations the triumph of unrestrained passion over the prejudices of the Code. He had a host of followers and fellow-workers, who, if not all masters of their art, were more than mere craftsmen, and who worked in a sincerely literary spirit. Perhaps it is owing to the system of instruction, to the comparative limitation of the careers of educated men, to the absence of commercial enterprise and the emigrating spirit, that there are so many young men in France who bring to the stage qualities of style which lend a certain literary cachet even to their lightest productions. For example, compare an English burlesque with the libretto of the Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein and La Belle Héloïse; the former is coarse slang and imbecile doggerel; the latter has something of the Aristophanic vein in the audacity of its satire, in its touches of sentiment, in its bitter buffoonery, in the artful negligence of the writing. Scribe, who under the Restoration and the Monarchy of July was the founder and the chief of a school of writers of genre pieces, ingenious little sentimental comedies of contemporary middle-class life and manners, was not indeed a master of style, as he was of invention and construction, and it became the fashion among certain critics towards the close of his career, when he was getting out of fashion, to laugh at his "French"; yet there is not a play of his, however slight and trivial in form and substance, that does not deserve a place in the library of French dramatists, and that may not be read with advantage by a foreign student of the language of everyday life and conversation. And the same may be said of his principal coadjutors. These delicate little comedies and those vaudevilles with couplets are now completely superseded; no audience in Paris would listen with composure in 1872 to a party of ladies and gentlemen interspersing their dialogues with tags of rhyme sung by cracked voices to some old barrel-organ tune. The Parisian audiences of the present day demand a stronger and more stimulating diet. A long course of political disenchantments and catastrophes has made them bitter and uncompromising realists; and what they insist upon in their dramatic literature nowadays is a keen and biting irony, a penetrating and pitiless observation of the minor miseries and absurdities of human life, or a moral lesson in favour of law and order, conveyed under the disguise of the most pungent cynicism. The continual influx of provincial visitors to the capital has no doubt in Paris, as in London, vitiated the critical sense of theatrical audiences, and impaired in some degree the quality of the actors and of the dramatists. It is within the last twenty years that this change for the worse has taken place, yet it would be unjust to attribute it to the Second Empire, which has since enough to bear without being held accountable for the demoralization of dramatic art.

Under the Second Empire four dramatists of considerable power and reputation may be said to have flourished—M.M. Alexandre Dumas the Younger, Emile Augier, Octave Feuillet, and Victorien Sardou. Three of these indeed had already a nascent reputation before the Empire, but it grew to maturity under the third Napoleon; and the fourth, and perhaps the most renowned of them all, belongs altogether to the Imperial period. It is known that the exemplary author of the Dame aux Camélias and the Viola de Noce esteems himself nothing if not a moral teacher and reformer, and we believe him to be perfectly sincere in his conviction. M. Emile Augier, although a favoured guest at the Tuilleries as well as at the Palais Royal, satirized unsparingly in his most successful pieces the tendencies and predilections of a dominant party at the Court; the principal characteristics of his plays are a wholesome earnestness of moral tone and feeling, and a vigorous grace of style, which amply justified his election to the Academy. His brother Academician, M. Octave Feuillet, also an intimate guest of the Palace, is as decided and sincere a moralist in his own way as M. Dumas the Younger. But his way is different. He shows vice its own features, and sometimes the features are rather too seductive; but he invariably vindicates the social law in the last act by punishing the offenders, whom, it may be added, he delights to make odious and contemptible, if not ridiculous, even before their punishment arrives. The worst of it is that M. Feuillet generously pardons his virtuous characters also, and has no respect for the probabilities of actual human experience when for poetical justice in his drame.

excusable if he showed the slightest respect for probability in his plots, which are usually as fantastic as they are disagreeable. We must except, however, from this remark, a charming little piece, Le Village, in which we believe he had the practical assistance of M. Ragnier. M. Feuillet is an Academician, and therefore beyond criticism as a writer; but there is enough of fascination in the nervous power and delicate grace of his style to make amends for the moral effluvia which it often betrays. While we are in Academician company we may here say a word about M. Legouvé, the collaborator of M. Scribe (an Academician also) in the drama of Adrienne Lecouvreur. The best writing in that play was always attributed to M. Legouvé, all the merit of the construction being assigned to M. Scribe. There is perhaps not much for either to boast of in the performance, if too severely judged; but no foreign critic who is tolerably well acquainted with the literary language of France will deny it a place in dramatic literature, or dismiss it as the handiwork of a couple of playwrights.

M. Victorien Sardou, however, is the most thorough dramatist by temperament and instinct who has appeared in France since the death of M. Scribe. We are not of course comparing him with the giants of the Romantic school, but only with writers of his own category. In the art of painting we do not compare a Terburg with a Rubens; and M. Sardou is in some sort the Terburg of the modern French stage. Apparently he does not pretend to be a moralist, or rather he is content to be a dramatic writer before being a moralist; but for marvellous ingenuity of construction, infinite dexterity in conducting a complicated plot and disentangling a skein of seemingly insuperable difficulties, and sustaining a rapid fire of easy epigram and laboured repartee, and especially of repartee barbed with feminine finesse and shot with a careless but unerring aim, the author of Les Pattes de Mouche and Nos Intimes is unsurpassed. On one occasion, in his drama of Puterie, founded on an episode in the revolt of the Netherlands and produced a year before the Franco-German war, he rose to a higher strain of sentiment and passion; in his latest work, Rabagas, he has lent the framework of an interesting plot to a double-edged political satire of inimitable truthfulness and audacity, and so cunningly contrived that all parties think all parties assailed and insulted by it but themselves. M. Sardou, who, we believe, has old German blood in his veins, has all a Frenchman's lightness of hand; but he hits hard and straight, and we know no play of his in which he hits at random, or in which the moral leaves anything to be desired at the fall of the curtain. We say "at the fall of the curtain" with a purpose; because in the plays of M. Sardou, as in those of his eminent countrymen and contemporary dramatists whom we have named, there are undoubtedly scenes and situations which, if detached from the whole argument of the piece, are of a nature to irritate and alarm the least prudish or squeamish audience. There is an amount of realism in the French dramatic literature of the present time which the public to whom it is addressed evidently expect and demand. Indeed the English play-going public demand it also of their dramatists; but what they get instead is a representation of life unknown to any country or society on earth, and a series of the grossest mechanical sensations, as if the dramatist had borrowed all his ideas and his effects from the "accidents and offences" column of a newspaper. The nature of French dramatists is more moral than mechanical; it does not depend on the carpenter or the machinist, but on the collisions of human passion with the social law. It may be that it is the want of a Divorce Court that makes one particular item in the Decalogue so irresistibly attractive to French dramatists; even British Phariseism will not suppose that in this respect the realities of French society are depicted by the realism of the French stage. The distinction between the two countries appears to be that on this side of the water we represent in a law court what on the other they delight to imagine on the stage.

JAMES GORDON BENNETT.

NEW York may be congratulated on having within a short period lost two of its foremost citizens. Fisk was shot a few months ago, and it is perhaps from one point of view an encouraging circumstance that there should be such general reluctance to hang the murderer. James Gordon Bennett has died a natural death, but unfortunately his newspaper survives him. In his own way he was quite as great a man—we are thinking of greatness in its Jonathan Wild sense—as Fisk; but he kept on the safe side of the law, and he was spared the expense of having to share his plunder with the Judges. His career is a conspicuous example of prosperous infamy. An American apologist has suggested that his character might be described as good so far as it went, but "defective." He was shrewd, enterprising, audacious, liberal; "visit him, and you see before you a quiet-mannered, courteous, and good-natured old gentleman, who is on excellent terms with himself and with the world." But beyond that there was a blank. "That region of the mind where convictions, the sense of truth and honour, public spirit, and patriotism have their sphere, is in this man mere vacancy." He was, in fact, an utterly unscrupulous person, who had no desire to do evil for its own sake, but who had made up his mind to push his way in the world, and who was ready to follow any road that seemed to suit his purpose. It was his combination of rare shrewdness and profliggate audacity which rendered his example so corrupting and dangerous. When, in the course of some quarrel, his adversary called him a pedlar, he at once adopted the name. He "peddled," he said, in thoughts and feelings and intellectual truths, and he was going in for a wholesale business in the same line. A pedlar has a prescriptive right to call his wares by such names as he pleases, but the commodities out of which Bennett began to make his fortune were, in plain language, obscenity and personal defamation. The New York Herald, which he invented and continued to manage to the last hour of his life, was at first an obscene, scurrilous print, sold at a cent, printed by stealth on other people's types, and published in a cellar. The office of the Herald is now one of the grandest houses in Broadway; the paper itself is one of the richest literary properties in the world, and it has cast off the revolting grossness of its early years. But it has always been conducted on the same principle—the principle of providing anything that seemed likely to pay, without regard to the moral texture of the article. The justification of the commodity was simply that people were willing to buy it, and Bennett never troubled himself about anything else. He was, as his admirers were accustomed to boast, peculiarly exempt from prejudices. He had no prejudice in favour of filth; he would just as soon sell honest, wholesome literature if more customers could be found for it. The Herald in its original form was akin to the Age and Satirist, except that its nastiness and personalities were more daring and abominable. Bennett, however, was quite shrewd enough to see that this sort of thing could not be made permanently remunerative, and he gradually toned down the open indecency of his journal, at the same time paying great attention to general and especially to commercial news. He had, as we learn from a memoir written by an enthusiastic admirer, studied under Mr. M. M. Noah, an editor of an original and energetic type, and he fully appreciated his master's style. It is stated that Mr. Noah had "a method of publicly calling on certain individuals to pay their debts," which naturally created some commotion in a commercial city. Before Mr. Noah had reaped the fruits of "this remarkable line of policy" he seems to have gone mad, assuming the "insignia of one of the monarchs of the Hebrews," and proclaiming a rendezvous of the Israelitish race at Grand Island, near Buffalo, which put an end to his paper. Bennett was destined to turn the Noahic "method" to more profitable account. It is said that during one of the great commercial panics of New York the Herald announced that on a specified day it would publish a list of all the solvent traders in the city, and after that a list of insolvent traders; and there was naturally great anxiety to be mentioned in the one list and to be excluded from the other. Bennett's biographer tells us that he took a broad view of the advertisement question, and insisted upon being paid for all articles and paragraphs which he chose to include in that category. In becoming less flagrantly indecent the Herald did not become less noxious to public taste and morality. Bennett saw that it did not pay to scandalize the public too much. He continued to pander to prurient appetites and love of scandal, but in such a way that people should have an excuse for reading the paper. He called the nastiness news, and mixed it up with other matter of a respectable kind. He had seen, he said, humanity depraved to its core, and he proclaimed each morning "on fifteen thousand sheets of thought and intellect the deep guilt that was encrusting all society," but it was all for its good. He justified even the infamous advertisements with which his columns teemed.

Bennett, like Fisk, had a keen sense of the value of notoriety. He kept himself and the Herald perpetually before the public. He was systematically aggressive, and occasionally he had to suffer for his insolence and pugnacity, but he never failed to turn it to account as an advertisement for the paper. He was one of the best kicked men in the world, and every kicking was minutely described in his journal next morning for the edification of his readers. Nothing can be more characteristic than the personal narratives of this kind which have been collected by his biographer. "I have to apologize to my kind readers," wrote Bennett on one occasion, "for the want of my usual life to-day. Webb of the Courier met me yesterday in Wall Street, and, by going up behind me, cut a slash in my head about one and a-half inch in length, and through the integuments of the skull." Not long afterwards he has a similar announcement to make:—"As I was leisurely pursuing my business yesterday in Wall Street, collecting the information which is daily disseminated in the Herald, James Watson Webb came up to me on the northern side of the street, said something which I could not hear distinctly, then pushed me down the stone steps leading to one of the brokers' offices, and commenced fighting with a species of brutal and demonic desperation characteristic of a fury." And then he goes on to set off his own injuries—a scratch on the hand and three buttons (valued at sixpence) torn off his waistcoat—against those which he alleges that he inflicted on his adversary—namely, "a rent from top to bottom of a very beautiful black coat, which cost the ruffian forty dollars, and a blow in the face which may have knocked down his throat some of his infernal teeth for anything I know—balance in my favour 39 dollars 94." Once it was a woman who assailed him, and next morning the placard duly appeared—"James Gordon Bennett horsewhipped by a woman! For full particulars see Herald." The biographer draws a touching picture of the dauntless editor sitting in his office after one of these assaults, having his head bathed and plastered, and the wounds inventoried; and dictating all the time an account of the beating for the next day's paper. Bennett had only one object in view, to please the public so that they should buy his paper, and he had early come to the conclusion that the best method of doing so was to gratify the passions and echo the opinions of the hour. "I wish never to be a day in advance of the people," he used to say. "A journal to be great must be with the people, and must work in the sphere of their instincts," was another of his maxims; and he laid it down that the "best intelligence and wisdom is no more than what they [the masses] are willing to have exist in society." He deliberately and for a purely selfish purpose appealed to the worst side of a democratic society, fawning upon the multitude, exalting its prejudices and caprices, and ministering eagerly to its prurient appetites and mean jealousies, and it can hardly be doubted that the result of his labours was to intensify the despotism of majorities and the truculence of the mob. No reputation was safe from his attacks; he sided with every party in turn, and was true to none. He boasted of his independence. "We are independent of every one," he used to say; "like Luther, like Paul, we go on our own hook." His independence extended equally to principles and convictions. One opinion was just as good in his eyes as another; he had no invidious preferences, no embarrassing belief in right and wrong; all he wanted was the sort of opinion that would sell his paper, and if at any time he found he had made a mistake and laid in the wrong article, he never hesitated to change it instantly. His open cynicism and contempt for what he deemed the affectations of sincerity and earnestness perhaps did more harm than his outrages on good taste and public morality. His abominable attacks on private character had not even the justification of honest indignation; they had no other motive than to make sport for the public, and possibly to add to the profits of his paper in another way.

When such men as Bennett and Fisk are mentioned, Americans have a stereotyped reply which they never fail to use. No doubt, they say, these men were scoundrels, and found great scope for their scoundrelism, but they were not received into society. Fisk, it is true, was for a time master of New York, and taxed, robbed, and plundered as he pleased; but respectable people did not ask him to dinner. And so with Bennett; he made a great fortune, and in certain ways exercised enormous influence, but neither he nor his paper had any social standing; the Herald had a vast circulation, but in good families it was not taken in. It seems to us impossible to doubt that these men could not flourish as they do unless there was something congenial in the composition and atmosphere of the society in which they move. Bennett himself was certainly not an American product, for he was a Scotchman, and there is no reason to suppose that his character would have been in any way different from what it was wherever he had established himself. But it may be doubted whether the continued and prosperous existence of such a paper as the Herald is fully accounted for by the accidental arrival of an unprincipled Scotchman in New York. We can only say that in point of fact no such journal, as far as we are aware, has ever made its appearance in any other country. It is only shifting the ground of argument to say that a newspaper of enormous circulation is heartily despised by those who buy it and read it. The truth would seem to be, that the expression of public opinion in America is to a great extent divorced from actual conviction and is enjoyed merely as a stimulant. People there read a newspaper just as they go to a bar for a mint julep or a brandy smash; and anything sharp and strong will answer the purpose. It would be unfair to American journalism to suggest that the Herald is, or was, for we have been speaking chiefly of its past, a fair representative of the press of that country. There are journals of undoubted ability and integrity in the city of Fisk and Bennett, and one of them has lately distinguished itself by a courageous and successful attack on the infamous Ring which at one time had the city at its mercy. But the success of what has been called "Bennettism" is a fact which cannot be got rid of, and which can hardly be regarded as a healthy symptom. Perhaps, indeed, there are some hints of the malady among ourselves which should not be overlooked.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

IT is unsatisfactory to observe the ebb and flow of opinion on questions with regard to which it is eminently desirable to arrive, if possible, at certainty. Thirty years ago it was considered a proof of enlightened liberalism to advocate the abolition of what was usually called in programmes and on platforms the degrading or brutalizing punishment of "the lash." Accordingly this punishment was minimized by administrative and legislative effort, and now members of Parliament and journalists seem to think that they are exhibiting superior common sense by proposing to apply this punishment rather freely to new classes of offences. Speakers and writers appear to derive pleasure from recommending the infliction of a "good" or a "sound" flogging to be continued until the culprit begs for mercy, which probably he would very soon do if he thought there was any prospect of obtaining it. During the last century military punishments became more and more severe, until they had reached a point of almost incredible barbarity. In this century a movement began which has resulted in greatly diminishing the number, and still more the severity, of these punishments. Can it be that the progress or retrogression of ideas on this subject will bring the administration of military law by the end of this century nearly to the point where it stood at the beginning? We do not think that a court-martial would ever again pronounce a sentence of 1,000 or 1,500 lashes, because that would sound too atrocious, but it is quite conceivable that the severity of the punishment might be much increased without greatly prolonging its duration. It is wonderful how quickly people accustom themselves to talk about and even to witness spectacles from which at first they would have shrunk with horror. We are told that already the officers of justice are overwhelmed with applications for admission to witness the floggings of garotters in Newgate, and we have seen in print half-a-dozen descriptions of the room and apparatus, which indeed the reporters seem to think themselves at liberty to describe, even when they have the delicacy to abstain from entering into particulars of the actual punishment. One of the latest of these literary efforts, after a good deal of word-painting had been expended upon the gloomy apartment, and its scanty, but practically useful furniture, stopped with commendable reticence at the point where the writer doubtless believed that the real interest would begin, and merely stated that the warders performed their duty "conscientiously." The taste for these descriptions is, however, sure to be directly or indirectly gratified, and it is sure to increase by gratification; and thus there is an undoubted amount of truth in the argument which was formerly accepted as conclusive of the whole question, that the infliction of these punishments tends to "brutalize" all concerned in them.

It has, however, been almost universally, and, as we think, very properly, agreed that flogging should be inflicted upon the perpetrators of certain crimes of violence, and it is fairly open to consideration whether the list of these crimes should not be enlarged. But having got as far as this, we must ask permission to pull up and consider carefully whither we are going. So much has been lately said about equality between the sexes, that in strict consistency it might be asked whether, if the liability of men to flogging is to be further extended, the liability of women ought not at least to begin? Not long ago the evening newspapers were expending their largest type upon some monster of a woman who had been convicted of an extraordinarily savage assault. If it is right to punish a man with flogging for such an offence, why should it be wrong so to punish a woman? Of course if such offences were shown to be much rarer among women than among men, that might be an argument against the necessity of resorting to such punishment in the case of women. The most recent proposal is that a man should be liable to be flogged on conviction of attempting to extort money from a woman by threatening to accuse her of unchastity, and the author of this proposal has added the astounding suggestion that the complainant in such a case should be exempt from cross-examination on behalf of the defendant. The main proposal may possibly be sound although its author has shaken confidence in his judgment. But let us for the sake of argument suppose that a fanatic of another type desired more effectually to protect men against women, and was ready to propose, with that object, to enact that every woman soliciting a man to unchastity should be punished with one of the instruments mentioned in a Bill now before the House of Commons. We will remove a preliminary difficulty by remarking that female warders might probably be found capable of wielding these instruments "conscientiously." Whatever supposition be made as to the causes which bring women, to use a common phrase, upon the streets, it must be admitted that they are an abominable nuisance when they get there. They not only offend decency by dress and manner, but they openly or covertly solicit to the commission of immoral acts. Really, if one set about it, an unusually good Wednesday's speech might be made in the House of Commons in favour of a proposal for flogging women who invited men in public places to immorality. In a moment of enthusiasm for a pet subject it might even be possible to arrive at the absurdity of contending that it was hard upon a complainant in such a case to be cross-examined as to where he had been dining, and whether he might not have solicited the defendant if she had not made the first advance to him. Another offence for which it might with some plausibility be suggested that flogging would be an appropriate punishment is perjury. At this moment there are persons who would hail such a proposal with delight, and whose only regret would be that it was not brought forward and adopted a year or more ago. And thus we might go on indefinitely until flogging became as common as in the last century, although probably it might not be as severe. If men were brought generally under the lash it is improbable that women would escape, and, of course, boys and girls would be treated by analogy to the methods of correction applied to grown-up people.

The discussion of this subject, although alarming, is not the less ludicrous. The author of a Bill for punishing aggravated assaults on women with the birch or cat is threatened with an address of gratitude and admiration from certain ladies of the class which is sometimes impertinently called strong-minded. We think that these ladies ought, as their American friends say, to "endorse" Mr. Douglas Straight's motion by presenting him with an elegant testimonial which would commemorate in an enduring form the gratitude of the wives of England who by his help were enabled to get their husbands flogged. It appears, however, that there are other strong-minded ladies who, with the assistance of certain feeble-minded gentlemen, are protesting against Mr. Straight's

Bill, and would doubtless protest even more energetically against both address and testimonial. There is certainly something plausible in Mr. P. A. Taylor's protest against "the strange reaction which has set in in favour of cruel and brutalising punishments." But we object to the vague word "brutalising," and we object still more to embarking with Mrs. Fawcett and Mr. Taylor on a general discussion of the "brutalising" effect of the "cat" upon garotters and other perpetrators of violent crimes. This is a sort of discussion which only crops up when society does not happen to feel acutely the necessity of protecting its weaker members against outrages perilous to life or limb. It is assumed that garotters have, as the result of long-continued experience, been proved to be insensible to the terror of imprisonment or penal servitude, and that it was necessary to determine either to let them work their will upon our throats, or to adopt some new form of punishment. Until it is proved that this punishment is ineffectual, we should entirely decline to consider whether it "brutalizes" those who suffer it. Mr. Taylor refuses to believe that any class of criminals are utterly and hopelessly infamous, and brutal, and inaccessible to pity, shame, remorse. We trust that his amiable desire to hope and believe all things for the best may never be shaken by the rude grasp of a garotter's fingers. It appears probable that, in spite of Mr. Taylor's opposition to flogging in general, Mr. Straight will earn the thanks of Mrs. Fawcett by carrying his bill for flogging men who violently assault women. There would be no difficulty in ascertaining the fact whether an offence of this kind had been committed, whereas in the case of offences of other kinds charged by women against men, or vice versa, there is a great and sometimes very alarming difficulty. We hope that enthusiastic legislators will not forget that you cannot unflog a man, whereas if you find that he has been imprisoned on a false charge you can at least let him out of prison. As regards the punishment of husbands for assaults on wives, there would be sometimes a practical difficulty in inducing the wife to give the necessary evidence. It might also deserve consideration that, if a husband knew that he would be flogged for beating his wife nearly to death, he might be tempted to beat her quite to death, on the speculation that the outrage carried to this extent would be treated as evidence of insanity.

THE BUILDERS' STRIKE.

IT is just thirteen years since the great strike in the building trades of London, by which thirty thousand men were thrown out of work, and building operations were suspended for several months. The men peremptorily demanded an immediate reduction of the hours of labour to nine a week—they were then rather less than ten—and struck when this was refused. The masters in self-defence retaliated by a general lock-out, which was maintained for eight weeks, but the strike was not formally abandoned until four or five months later. The result was that the men, after all their sacrifices and privations, were obliged to return to work on the old terms. Since then the Saturday half-holiday has been conceded, and wages have been gradually rising. But the cry for nine hours has now been revived, and there is every prospect of a repetition of the battle. The carpenters in two large establishments have already struck; the house-painters and decorators, the masons, bricklayers, and plasterers are said to be preparing to follow the example of the carpenters; and the masters again threaten a lock-out over the whole trade. It appears that the carpenters are paid 8d. an hour, and that their hours are 56½ per week. They now insist upon a simultaneous reduction of hours and increase of wages. "Nine hours at ninepence" sums up their demands; or, in other words, 38s. 3d. for a week of 51 hours, instead of 37s. 8d. for a week of 56½ hours. If this were granted the masters would have to make every man in their employment a present of something like 7d. a week as an addition to his wages, together with the value of five and a-half hours' work, in all about 4s. 3d. a week. Nor would this be the whole of the masters' loss, for they would also suffer from the enforced idleness of their machinery and other plant during the hours deducted from the working day. It is obvious that all this would involve a very sudden and serious rise in the cost of building operations. We do not happen to be in the secrets of the trade, but we should think it was impossible for any one to go much about London without being struck by the indications of over-building which meet the eye in almost every direction, in the shape of innumerable streets of unfinished, or at least untenanted, houses. There are districts which resemble a city of the dead. One might imagine that the inhabitants had either perished or fled, but the truth is they have not yet arrived, and there are no signs of their coming. Of course the rapid growth of population necessitates a continual expansion of the metropolis, but for the present it would appear that the supply of houses goes beyond the demand. The present moment would seem therefore to be hardly an auspicious one for the demands put forward by the operative builders. It is true that the necessities of some of the employers offer what may be considered a tempting opportunity. The two firms whose men have struck have large contracts in hand, including the new Post Office and Home Office. But even if the men were likely to gain their point for the moment, they could not expect to establish a permanent advance of wages except on the basis of the continued prosperity of the trade; and, if we may judge by appearances, building operations will for some time to come have rather to be curtailed than extended.

It is possible that if the commercial interests of the operatives had alone been in question, the strike would at least have been deferred. There are various indications that, like Napoleon III's attack on Germany, the present movement in the building trade is in the nature of a political or dynastic coup, intended to establish the supremacy of particular leaders, and to distract attention from domestic differences. Recent numbers of the Beehive, the organ of the so-called "working-men" leaders, afford a highly instructive glimpse behind the scenes of working-class politics. It would appear that the working-men who have given up work and taken to political agitation as a more pleasant and profitable occupation are just now in an awkward dilemma. They have been in the habit of contending that there is something about a working-man—that is, about a man who is engaged in common mechanical occupations—which invests him with a peculiar wisdom and intuitive knowledge, and which marks him out as especially qualified to solve all the difficulties of the world by his simple natural sagacity. This has been their platform. It was as working-men that they imposed, or sought to impose, themselves upon society. It was not because they presumed to think themselves superior to other people in education or attainments, in deep thought or laborious study, that they assumed to lay down the law on all questions so authoritatively, but merely because they were or had been working-men, and had at some time or other handled the awl, the saw, or the trowel. But the class in whose name they speak, and whose lofty qualities they profess to represent, is now bent on repudiating them. It is argued, with a good deal of rough logical force which rather disturbs the Beehive gentlemen, that if a working-man is, by force of his occupation, wiser and more gifted than other men, a real working-man who actually works must be much superior to one who has given up work and is only nominally a working-man. It is significant that the working classes have invariably abstained from electing any of the so-called working-men candidates, and it now comes out that the latter are not only passively, but actively, repudiated by a considerable section of the order to which they profess to belong. A well-known agitator has lately been obliged to resign the secretaryship of an important Trade Union; and at a recent meeting in connexion with the present strike a resolution was passed that "it was desirable to show the employers that the men engaged in the trade were quite competent to conduct their own movement without the extraneous aid of parties whose advocacy might be more damaging than otherwise from their prominence in agitation." A writer in the Beehive is horrified at this repudiation of the gentlemen who have been hawking the working-man about the country for some years past. Is there, he asks, in the whole circle of human folly, wide as it is, a more singular example of self-stultification? Can it raise the working classes in the estimation of any one "to any that they have cut off a hand or plucked out an eye"? What does it matter whether a man works at a trade or not if only he possesses "intelligence, devotion to the cause, and general fitness of character"? There is no need for those working-men who repudiate the professional agitators to plead the Judaical justification for cutting off an offending member, because they will naturally argue that the agitator is not a member but a parasite. The difficulty which weighs upon the "working-men leaders," whom the Lord Chamberlain gracefully, but perhaps rashly, recognized as a fourth or fifth Estate, and provided with official accommodation at the Thanksgiving in St. Paul's by the side of Lords and Commons, is that it is only as working-men that they have any pretensions to be listened to, and that, even though they can show that they once answered this description, they are now bound to give place to those who are still bona fide working-men. If they are left to compete in intelligence and general fitness with other classes of the population who may have had the misfortune not to be born to mechanical occupations, it may be feared that they will get on rather dangerous ground. The Nine-Hours' movement will perhaps afford these gentlemen an opportunity of retrieving their position; and it may also be expected to close up the ranks of the Unionists, and to put an end to domestic strife. It appears that the Carpenters' and Joiners' Union is at present divided into two hostile bands, and that it is extremely anxious to obtain new members. One of the calculations of the Committee who are now arranging for the relief of the men on strike is that many non-Unionists will join the Society for the sake of strike-pay.

Whatever may have been the causes at work in bringing about this strike, the question at issue is one which of course will be decided on its own merits, and resolves itself very much into a trial of strength between the contending parties. If the men would be content with an increase of wages, it is probable that they would have no difficulty in getting it; but the reduction of hours is a more serious matter. The practical effect of the engineers' strike at Newcastle last year was simply to establish an advance of pay. The nominal day is fixed at nine hours, but as overtime is allowed, the result is that the men continue to work for as many hours as formerly, only the extra pay for overtime begins to be reckoned somewhat sooner in the afternoon. Assuming the amount of work obtainable to be a fixed quantity, the Unions make it their object to spread it over as many of their members as possible, and at the same time to keep up the rate of payment, so that those who already have work shall not suffer by others being brought in to share it. It is assumed that the men who work overtime take so much out of the common stock of labour, and rob his companions who are too weak or too lazy to keep up with him. The efforts of the Unions are especially directed to put down overtime, piece-work, and that terrible crime called "cheating," which simply means a good workman doing the best he can for his employer instead of being just as little as an idle and indifferent workman. At a recent meeting of the workmen in Woolwich Arsenal to agitate for the Nine-Hours' movement, it was urged that more leisure should be allowed to the operatives in order that they might improve their minds and "compete successfully with the skilled workmen of foreign countries." But it is notorious that there is no European country in which the hours are not longer than in England. In Berlin the carpenters work from six in the morning till seven in the evening, and the system of piece-work is generally followed. Even in the United States the Eight Hours Law is practically a dead letter, and the hours are as long as in our own country. The real object of the present agitation was disclosed by one of the speakers at this meeting, who urged that by reducing the hours of labour they would remove part of the commodity out of the market, and so increase its value. It is possible that under certain circumstances measures to promote an artificial scarcity of labour might for a time be successful; but it will be found difficult to compel the public to purchase what it does not want, and the disposition to purchase naturally depends very much on the price charged for the commodity. As the price rises, the demand may be expected to decline. If it is true that the building trades are at present over-manned, the natural conclusion would be that the superfluous hands should betake themselves to some other occupation, not that the public should be compelled to keep six carpenters or bricklayers to do the work of one. While the men are proceeding on a false principle in endeavouring to produce an artificial scarcity of labour, the employers, on the other hand, appear to be acting very foolishly for their own interests in constantly resisting an increase of wages unless it is forced from them by a strike, or by a threat of one. If the masters wish to counteract the influence of the Unions, they should make up their minds to anticipate demands which are certain to be made, and occasionally to give with a good grace, and from a sense of justice, what is afterwards wrung from them with a heavy fine, in the shape of interrupted trade.

SERMONS.

WE sometimes see advertisements offering assistance to clergymen in composing sermons. The price placed upon this kind of literary ware by those who manufacture it is so moderate that, although curates are badly paid, we seem to discover in the lowest deep a lower deep in the payment which is accepted by those who help curates to perform one part of their work. We do not know whether a recent proposal for opening pulpits to laymen was dictated by a desire to "elevate in the social scale," as the current phrase is, that humble, but useful, class who are commonly called penny-a-liners; but it can hardly be expected that one person should be content, as a permanent arrangement, to do the work while another person appropriates all the credit and the larger share of the pay. It is rumoured that legal opinions bearing the signatures of leaders of the Bar are sometimes written by learned and obscure juniors, who possess more leisure and possibly more capacity for investigating difficult questions than is usually found consistent with a regular expenditure of days in the courts of law and nights in the House of Commons. But the reputation which a barrister acquires among his professional brethren slowly permeates the Temple or Lincoln's Inn, till it reaches the solicitors and even the outer world of clients. There have been some remarkable examples where men who have, as it is called, "devilled" for other men, have ultimately attained such eminence as to employ "devils" themselves. But if we could permit ourselves to entertain the notion of a clergyman keeping a "devil" to write his sermons, we should be obliged to conclude that the industrious but ill-paid and undistinguished deputy, having so poor a prospect on earth, must look for his reward in heaven, if indeed it be not absurd to suppose that a "devil" could find his way there. We have heard lately that "an obscure newspaper reporter out of work" has been employed by the incumbent of a church, some forty or fifty miles from Liverpool, to write sermons for him at the rate of three for five-and-twenty shillings, which, considering the style of work which seems to have been expected, appears to us surprisingly small pay. We cannot help thinking that these matters are managed better in America, where newspaper reporters, not obscure, but eminent in their calling, practically compose sermons, not before, but after, they have been delivered. The Monday's issue of more than one of the New York papers contains reports of sermons delivered the day before in the churches and chapels of that city. Thus in one notorious journal we find a summary of a sermon delivered by the Rev. Dr. Newman at St. John's Methodist Church, to which the reporter appends a statement that "the Doctor's discourse was so erudite that those menial Methodists who expected to be lifted to the third heaven by high falutin' oratory must have been disappointed." We have heard of a heavy-stomached Christian whose spiritual welfare required that he should be shoved, but we never heard before of a menial Methodist who expected to be lifted by high falutin' oratory. Dr. Newman's text, "Be not wise in your own conceits," was a suitable introduction to his sermon, which must have convinced the menial Methodists of their ignorance of many things which the preacher knew at least well enough to talk about.

